6574. Did you ascertain any facts with respect to them?—Yes; I had a gentleman in whom I have the greatest confidence, and who has favoured me with a report of somewhat a voluminous character, but still it is obliged to be so, I think, as embracing the very important question upon which he was requested to get me information, and this is the result of his report. Mr. Murphy, in his evidence at Question 5427, gave the Committee the result of a canvass which had been made in different streets in the borough, and at Question 5428, in answer to the honourable Chairman, he states that they were all householders; and at Question 5430, he again repeats that no lodgers were canvassed. I have gone to the trouble of having most reliable gentlemen sent out to inquire into the truth of this statement, and I have had tables prepared containing the names of all the householders in the different streets mentioned in and adjoining the New Cut (those tables I have with me), and the result is different to what has been represented to this Committee. Mr. Murphy stated that in New-street, which runs parallel to the New Cut, 18 were in favour of entire closing, 10 against it, and one was neutral. According to the return which I propose to deliver in, 25 are against closing, 11 for closing, two neutral, and seven were not at home. With regard to the remark that in the former canvassing no lodgers voted, the gentlemen who called at No. 36, New-street, were informed by the landlord's son (Mr. Ford), that five of them had signed, in that house alone, for closing; in Gray-street Mr. Murphy stated nine were in favour of entire closing, 15 against, and three neutral; the canvass which was made in this street proves this not to be so; honourable Members will find each householder's name and address in all the returns which I propose to deliver in, and in the case of Gray-street, 30 are against closing, seven for closing, two neutral, and two not at home; at No. 31, a house held by Mr. Williams, three men signed the former petition for closing; at No. 32 the name was refused, but the gentlemen were informed that the landlord and four lodgers had signed the other petition. In Wootton-street, according to Mr. Murphy's figures, there were 34 in favour of entire closing, 17 against, and seven were neutral. According to our return, 34 are against closing, 20 for closing, two neutral, and 10 were not in when called upon. The wives were seen in most of these 10 cases where the husbands were not at home; and though some gave their vote against closing, it was not put down, so that every case can be entirely relied upon. In Mitre-street, according to Mr. Murphy's figures, 21 were in favour of entire closing, eight against, and three were neutral. Our canvass proved 19 to be against closing, 14 for closing, three neutral, and four not at home. In Queen-street, Mr. Murphy makes it appear that 26 were in favour of closing, three against, and six neutral. Our returns show 23 against closing, 17 for closing, four neutral, and two not at home. In John-street, Mr. Murphy gives 12 for closing eight against, and three neutral. Our returns show four against closing and five for closing. In Sidwell-place, Mr. Murphy states that eight were in favour of entire closing, four against, and none neutral. The fact is, that there are only 13 houses in Sidwell-place, and of these our figures figures show nine against closing, three for closing, and one not at home. Mr. Thomas Hunter, of No. 9, Sidwell-place, canvassed that street, and the contradictions were obtained in his presence; and when asked how it was that he delivered in such a false return, he made use of the remark "that they were rounding;" which means that the men who had formerly signed for closing were now signing against it. But there is not the slightest truth in saying that they ever did sign the other way.

6575. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] As I understand you, the gentlemen who obtained the signatures in favour of closing, now said that they were coming round?—Yes.

6576. But that your return denies; and you say that there is not the slightest truth in saying that they ever did sign the other way?—With the permission of the Committee I will now deliver in these returns (delivering in the same). I will only say in this point that such facts as these prove the utter worthlessness of the so-called canvass on the other side; those are returns obtained by a gentleman who was associated with the Committee in opposition to the measure previous to its being referred to the Select Committee, a gentleman in whom I have the greatest confidence, who is perfectly prepared to come here and state to this Committee the truth of what I have been saying, and he has allowed me to say that he is prepared to justify every word that he has there said, and that those returns contain the names of every person in the streets to which I have referred, as far as he could obtain them. I did not know that there was one exception, but according to this it appears there is.

6577. Mr. Locke.] Have you anything to say with regard to the returns from the workshops which were mentioned by Mr. Murphy?—Yes; the Rev. G. M. Murphy was again asked, at Question 5432, "The working men as a whole are in favour of entire closing, are they not?" And he replied, "I think they are. If the Committee would allow me I have here the results of a workshop canvass partially on the South of London, with which I am personally conversant." Then follows a list of the different firms which he represented had been canvassed. In the first place there is Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin. They employ 430 men and 70 women, and I have the authority of the gentlemen in the counting-house and several of the workmen for saying that no such canvass took place. The next firm mentioned is that of Price and Co., Candle Works, Battersea. They employ about 350 men, besides boys and girls. No canvass whatever has taken place at his establishment. In fact, no one would be allowed on the premises. Then comes Cockerell & Co., coal merchants, who employ 17 men. I have the authority of Mr. Cockerell for saying that not a single man in the Abingdon Wharf is a teetotaler, and that it is not likely any of his men could have signed in favour of closing on Sundays. Then he mentioned Doulton & Co., Lambeth. Inquiries have been made at the counting-house and in the different yards, and not a single man has been canvassed, though there are 14 men on the establishment out of 240 who are total abstainers. The next is Braby & Co., slate merchants, Bangor Wharf, Belvedere-road, Lambeth, who employ 60 men. Mr. Braby made the inquiry himself of the men in the yard as to whether they had been canvassed or not, and the answer was that they had not been. The only way he could account for such a statement was, that his under-foreman, a teetotaler, was a friend of Mr. Jabez West. The next firm is that of Messrs. Peek, Frean, & Co., biscuit bakers, Dockhead, who employ 600 men and boys. Mr. Colborne, the engager, said that no canvass whatever had taken place on their establishment, or else he must have heard of it. Between 40 and 50 of the men themselves were asked the question and they knew nothing whatever about it. The next is Messrs. Broadwood's piano manufactory, Horseferry-road. I have the authority of the foreman for stating that a paper was left on the establishment for signature; but that every one of the men who signed signed "No," the question on the paper being, "Are you in favour of closing public-houses and beershops during the whole 24 hours on Sunday?" The next is the Phoenix Gas Works, who employ about 700 men. Inquiries were made at the counting house, and also of the men, with regard to the truth of the canvassing, and not a soul in the place had heard of it. In fact, they said it was highly improbable that men who have to work in such heat, and who have been accustomed to drink their beer, would sign to deprive themselves of the privilege of having a glass of beer when they wanted it, for they work quite as hard on Sunday as on any other day. I hardly know what "steamboats on the River Thames" applies to; but there are at least 500 men employed on the Iron and Citizen steamboats, and the Woolwich and excursion boats. Messrs. Gibbs, the leather dressers, could not be found; the next is Messrs. Olneys. Mr. Olney, junior, says that Jabez West knows several of the men in the yard; but that he did not believe any canvass had been made. He could only say that himself and his father had not been asked the question; they employ from 25 to 30 men. The next is Oastler & Palmer, and not Horster, as printed in Question 5433. They employ 300 men, and no canvass whatever has been made. The next is Messrs. Hepburn, and not Hebron, leather dressers. I have the authority of the foreman for saying that no canvass whatever has been made on their establishment. The last is Messrs. Corderoy, fellmongers. The men were asked the question whether any canvass had been made, and they all denied the truth of such a statement, and at the same time declared that if any such canvass had been made it was more than probable that they would have signed for keeping the houses open. The Committee will see that instead of there being 657 men employed as the Rev. Mr. Murphy would make it appear at Question 5433, there are 3,817 men employed; I do not think it is necessary for me to say another word with regard to this matter.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

The Hon. F. H. FITZHARDINGE BERKELEY, a Member of the Committee, Examined.

Hon.
F. H. F.
Berkeley,
M. P.

6578. Chairman.] You have a statement, have you not, which you wish to make to the Committee?—Yes; I wish to make this statement: the Reverend Mr. Matthews, a Baptist minister, and I believe a gentleman of respectability, was examined as to Bristol, and he gave it as his opinion that the community of Bristol were largely in favour of restrictive legislation. Mr. Matthews judged them from some canvass which had been instituted; I have nothing to do with Mr. Matthews on his opinions or his canvass, but he corroborated his opinion by a reference to me. In answer to a question asked him by the honourable Member for Chichester, he stated, in corroboration of the public opinion of Bristol, that Mr. Berkeley had a requisition of 1,500 electors to vote for Mr. John Abel Smith's Bill. At Question No. 6104 he was asked, "Was there an address largely signed presented to Mr. Berkeley upon the subject of this Bill?" That was the question which Mr. Abel Smith asked; to which he replied, "Yes; there was an address signed by upwards of 1,580 electors." Then I say that if the statement is to go forth that 1,580 electors signed a requisition to me to support Mr. Abel Smith's Bill, which is perfectly true, I have a right to have it stated that there were 4,000 electors who signed a counter-requisition, requesting me to do no such thing. Now, we have one thing in evidence, and we have not the other. I likewise may add, that in addition to the body of 4,000 electors who requested me to follow my own will entirely, and not to be induced to vote for Mr. Abel Smith's Bill, there was another body of 500 or 600 electors who sent in their names for the same purpose; I think that statement should stand by the side of the first requisition.

6579. Mr. John Abel Smith.] I do not quite understand what the honourable Member means by saying that there were 500 and 600 in addition to the 4,000?—A number of names came in, as far as I can recollect, in addition to the 4,000, amounting, I think, to between 500 and 600 electors; I cannot speak positively upon that, nor do I rely upon it, but I rely upon the fact that there were 4,000 signatures to the requisition requesting me to do the exact contrary to that which Mr. Matthews, the Baptist minister, stated.

6580. May I ask you whether the address signed in favour of the Bill was not a public one, and published in the papers?—I cannot tell.

6581. You never saw it in print?—I cannot tell you.

6582. Was the other ever in print?—Never.

6583. Was it ever mentioned in the papers?—Not that I know of; it may have been published in the newspapers, but that I do not know.

6584. Your memory does not serve whether it was ever alluded to in the newspapers at Bristol?—The 4,000 was alluded to, I think, in the newspapers, and published in a letter from me, stating what it was my intention to do on that matter.

6585. Can you tell me when that was?—I cannot tell about the date; do you wish me to state what those intentions which I stated were?

6586. No; I do not in the least; but I wish to know whether or not there was any public knowledge of the address which you say was signed by 4,000 people?—There was my recognition of the address publicly made, and it was a matter of comment in all the papers.

6587. It is a very curious thing that I should not have heard of that before?—I thought it a very curious thing that you should not have mentioned it.

6588. I never heard of it before, and I do not think it is generally known?—I do not know that it is not generally known; and I will answer for this, that there is scarcely a witness who comes up here that cannot speak to it.

6589. Mr. Baines.] May I ask whether the requisition from the 4,000 persons was that you would do the reverse; that is to say, vote against Mr. Abel Smith's Bill, or was it that you would exercise your own judgment?—It was, that I would not in any way be biassed by the teetotalers and interested persons who had sent up the former address, but that I would take my own way.

6590. It was not that you should vote against the Bill?—No, but it amounted to that.

6591. Mr. John Abel Smith.] The fact is accurately stated that you did receive an address signed by 1,580 people in favour of the Bill?—Yes, certainly; I have no objection likewise to make the admission that amongst those men were some of the most respectable gentlemen in Bristol.

Mr. THOMAS WINTERBOTHAM, called in; and further Examined.

6592. Mr. Roebuck.] On the last occasion on which you were here giving evidence, you made statement respecting a canvass made on the south side of the river in the various workshops mentioned in your evidence?—I did.

6593. Were the inquiries that you instituted, made respecting that canvass?—There were three gentlemen employed, but one especially, with regard to the workshops, who individually did it, and who is here to-day prepared to substantiate the report which he made to me.

6594. What is his name?—Mr. Rowland; he is here to-day; he has also sent me a supplemental statement of the same kind; I do not know whether you will have it from him or from me; and likewise an additional number of streets and names, such as Mr. Murphy pointed out in his evidence.

6595. Chairman.] Were they procured by this gentleman?—Yes.

6596. Mr. Roebuck.] You have had a long experience, have you not, as the landlord of Peel's Coffee-house?—I have not been at Peel's Coffee-house much more than six years, but I have been engaged in the business altogether 36 years; I have been 29 years in business for myself, and have never been out of it.

6597. During that long period of time, have you remarked any special and peculiar change in the habits of society as regards drinking?—I have seen an evidently marked improvement steadily progressing, and an increase of self-respect in the working classes especially, and a general improvement of a character, that any one who has been identified with the working classes at all, could not possibly have avoided seeing.

6598. I take it that the persons frequenting Peel's Coffee-house do not come under the class of working men?—We have a large number in the front part of the shop that especially come under that class.

6599. How have you the means of ascertaining the general habits and manners of the working classes?—I ascertained those things from almost constant personal communication, not so much within the last four or five years; and also from the observations that I make of them as I see them in public, and the lesser amount of trouble that we have in conducting our business now than what we used to have some 35 or 36 years ago.

6600. As regards what may be called the gentlemanly part of the persons whom we are talking about, there has been a marked change in their habits, I think, within the last 30 years?—I have no doubt that there has, but personally, at that time, I was keeping another description of house, and I had not so much opportunity of forming an opinion of the habits of members of the professions in the metropolis as I have since; with them now I have no difficulty.

6601. At the present time would you not say, generally speaking, that that professional part of society are upon the whole a sober and well-behaved set of people?—Unquestionably.

6602. And that has been under the present state of the law?—Perfectly so.

6603. Has a corresponding, or anything like an equal change in the habits and the manners of the working classes taken place within your 0.69.

recollection?—I am only able to speak of the change in the working classes; as I stated before, I have not had so much opportunity of forming any opinion with regard to the professional classes as I have had these five or six years, independently of meeting them occasionally within my own circle, and at other places; but as a matter of business, I have not had the same opportunity of forming an opinion on their habits and tastes that I have had continuously with reference to the working classes.

6604. With respect to the working classes has there been a marked change within your time in their habits and manners?—Most marked.

6605. Would you say that now, generally speaking, they were a sober well-conducted body?—The majority, most certainly, and a large majority.

6606. I suppose that amongst them, as amongst every other class of society, there are good and bad people?—No doubt about it.

6607. Have you known, or can you tell us whether you think the number of bad people has diminished or increased under the present state of the law?—I think that it has diminished; but I think I stated to the Committee at my previous examination, that I do not attribute that entirely to the present state of the law. I think I gave reasons then, as I have just given them now, with respect to the self-respect of the people, and I attribute it as a very assisting cause to that increase of good behaviour to the facilities that people have of getting away from town on the Sunday.

6609. Have you seen any marked change; it was followed, we are told, by a remarkable diminution of bad behaviour in the streets of London; are you aware of that?—I am no further aware of it than that I hear of it by common report; because, as a rule, I never kept my house open after twelve o'clock at night, under any circumstances. I have been out occasionally after twelve o'clock at night, but I have not been sufficiently out to be able to form any opinion as to any great change having taken place.

6610. Do you recollect the time at which Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was in force?—Perfectly.

6611. Did that Act produce any marked change in the habits of the people?—As far as I saw of the working of the Act it did not produce any marked change, excepting that it produced a great deal of dissatisfaction. I was not aware, nor did anything come within my knowledge, that proved at all that there was any marked change effected by that Act during the short period that it was in operation.

6612. With regard to the efficacy of the means that you have spoken of, as producing an improvement in the habits of the people; I take it that since the repeal of that Act they have been rather increased in their efficacy?—I should think, perhaps, that they have been; but I do not think that there are so many excursions now as there were then out of London; but there has not been the same difficulty with regard to inconvenience arising since the houses were kept open till 11; and therefore it has not been specially brought to my notice.

6613. Do you think that the houses being kept open till 11 o'clock in the evening is a thing that is required by the habits of the working classes?—Yes, by a very large number of them.

6614. Will you explain why that is?—I think it will be in the recollection of the Committee that I stated that there were a large number of persons who were legitimately engaged in their business on Sunday night. I referred particularly to omnibus drivers and conductors, cabmen, stablemen, and those employed particularly in the mechanical portions of the press, compositors, printers, and others. I feel that the taking off of an hour from them would be an inconvenience, especially to cabmen, and omnibus men, and others, who, particularly omnibus men, scarcely have an opportunity of obtaining any refreshment during the latter part of the day, till they are really going or have gone home. They would especially suffer; and there would be a large amount of inconvenience, as it was before, with regard to those who undertake excursions out of London. They would be more especially the classes who would be inconvenienced by it. But, independently of that, a large number of the public who were returning home, assuming the houses to be closed at ten at night, would have either to go without what they would be very much in the habit of taking, or they would have to take care and provide it before that time, leaving it in their house, perhaps, during the whole time they have been away.

6615. Mr. Horsfall.] You stated, I think, that you have noticed a great improvement amongst the working classes with regard to their habits of sobriety; how have you had an opportunity of testing that?—Only by personal observation amongst them; and as I said in reply to a question just asked me by the Honourable Member for Sheffield, the less number of drunken persons coming into the house, and the less amount of trouble and difficulty in doing business. That is the special mode by which I have an opportunity of testing it.

6616. You speak more particularly of your own house, I presume?—I speak of the trade generally. I mix very much amongst them. I am continually amongst them, and continually hearing their opinions and their judgment. I may say, further than that, that I have seen for myself cases where, in my judgment, the husband has been induced to take his wife and family out on Sunday; I have seen them more respectably dressed, and better conducted, and somewhat vie with each other for the same opportunity of giving their families the same enjoyment as others.

6617. You further stated that great dissatisfaction had been expressed with Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—It was so.

6618. How was that shown?—As far as I was individually concerned, it was shown by constant complaints from my customers. It was shown publicly by the difficulties that occurred at Hyde Park, for instance, and certainly by the opinions of a large portion of the public press at that time. The ordinary sources of information, I think, conveyed that dissatisfaction to an extent which, I venture to think, had some influence upon the House of Commons in its repeal.

6619. Did not the Hyde Park riots arise out of Lord Robert Grosvenor's Bill?—I have no doubt that the immediate cause of the Hyde Park riots was Lord Robert Grosvenor's Bill; but the public were then suffering under Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, with all its annoyances, and that rendered a large amount of assistance to the opposition to Lord Robert Grosvenor's Bill, and it made those riots assume the shape that they did assume.

6620. Do you recollect to what hours Mr. Wilson Patten's Act limited the sale of drink?—From five till 10 in the evening, and from one to half-past two in the morning.

6621. Do you think that the same feeling of dissatisfaction would exist under the improved state of society of which you have spoken, if further restrictions were put on?—I think there is no question about it; because I do not think that the dissatisfaction resulted from the drunkards. I think it resulted from those who actually legitimately enjoyed the article with which we were dealing.

6622. Then you would propose no alteration in the present law?—Most certainly, I think there is no necessity for any alteration in the present law, nor do I think it would be of any service.

6623. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] Can you tell me at all the number of licensed victuallers in England?—I think there are something like 60,000; but I am not prepared to answer that question positively.

6624. There is a very large amount of capital invested in the business, is there not?—Very large indeed.

6625. Do not these constant attempts to impose further restrictions produce great inconvenience and annoyance to the trade?—They do so, and they produce a difficulty with property which only those who are actively engaged in the trade can by any possibility conceive. Session after session one attack or other is made upon the interests of the trade; and as sure as notice is given of some movement in connection with it, so sure are there to be changes of houses. What we term a change of houses is a sale of houses, in reality, although they are technically termed changes. I say, so sure is that to be the effect until some decision is arrived at.

6626. Do not you think it hard that men carrying on a recognised and legitimate trade in the country should be exposed to repeated attempts to alter their trading regulations by fresh restrictions?—I think it especially hard. I think it more than usually hard upon a trade which is already subject to some of the most penal laws, certainly as far as property is concerned, that effect any trade in this kingdom.

6627. Therefore, as far as regards the trade, you would be glad to have some settlement of the question by which the trade would be left where it is?—Yes, I should be very glad to have some settlement of the question, certainly.

6628. Have you heard it said in this room that the promoters of this measure, or many of them, only regard it as an instalment?—I have heard that again and again in this room.

6629. Therefore if you and the licensed victuallers generally were even to consent to this as a compromise, you really have no hope by that of being released from the injurious agitation which has hitherto prevailed?—On the contrary, we see certainly that it would lead to further attacks, taking all common sense principles upon which a man can form an opinion.

6630. That is as far as regards the trade; but as regards the public have you any doubt that there are a large number of persons that use public-houses on Sundays for legitimate purposes?—There can be no question about it.

6631. Have you any return as to the number requesting any particular house on any particular day?—I have no specific return upon that subject; but I may, perhaps, just mention this: I am concerning myself, as you will see, entirely to the metropolis and the metropolitan district. There are a very large number of persons who go some six or seven miles to gardens, not public gardens, but gardens that are very excellently cultivated. There is one immediately opposite my own private house, and there has been no difficulty here. I saw the gardener yesterday myself, who assured me that there were 200 persons in that garden on Sunday, and there was not a rose touched, or the slightest possible disorder in it.

6632. Have you any doubt that among the persons who do frequent public-houses on Sunday, the percentage of drunken and disorderly persons is exceedingly small?—I have not the slightest doubt that it is so.

6633. Taking those drunken and disorderly persons, do you imagine that any further restrictions in the direction contemplated by the Bill, would prevent those persons from obtaining drink and drinking to excess?—On the contrary, the difficulty that we have on the Sunday now, more results from those very persons obtaining, at the interdicted hours, and in an evasive manner, the drink that they have had an opportunity of getting; and half the trouble that we get with them, certainly up to two or three o'clock in the day, results from those persons having got it, and coming into our houses annoying us and our customers.

6634. You are of opinion that this would be certainly a violent interference with the usual habits of many people, and that being so, it would lead to evasion?—I think that there is no doubt about it.

6635. It has been stated to this Committee that publicans are promoters of drunkenness for their own interest; do you agree with that opinion?—I deny it in toto. I have heard in this room so many charges brought against the trade, of which I have the honour to be a member, that I think I must hardly expect to get credit in this matter for anything, unless I apply myself to something essentially practical; and I think, perhaps, I may be believed when I say that our interest is so diametrically opposed to drunkenness, that that in itself is a reason. I should like to take, and I could take, for a large number of men employed in our trade, a higher and bolder ground than that; but I will simply explain to the Committee what my view is with regard to this. Experience teaches me that a drunkard is not employed one-third of his time upon the average. Assuming then that we receive from him even the whole amount of his wages, he is really, as a matter of pounds, shillings, and pence not so serviceable a customer to us as a man who legitimately and regularly supplies his family with the articles in which we deal. There is another interested point of view, which I am bound to put in this way, because the charges made against the trade are such that I must put it in an interested way without desiring to take higher grounds. No man who has a drunken man in his house can expect but that he will have the effect of keeping out a large number of people who are a better class of customers; because after all, although a large number of men go into public-houses and take too much, they are a miserable minority as compared with those who continually use the public-houses for what they believe to be legitimate enjoyment, and legitimate necessity; and therefore, all the drunkards are, as a matter of interest, the most dangerous and injurious customers that can come into a house. I may say with regard to myself, and I know that it is so with a large number of the trade as well, that one of the most distinct instructions given to those serving behind the counter, is that they shall, under no circumstances, serve a drunken man.

6636. If this Bill should become law, do not you think that a certain inconvenience would result with regard to the number of legal proceedings which would be instituted, especially with regard to a bonâ fide meal, owing to the great diversity of opinion as to what may be termed a meal; for instance, one man takes a mutton chop, with a glass of ale for his luncheon, and another takes a biscuit, with a glass of ale, or a glass of wine; do not you think that the legal proceedings would be very vexatious, and very numerous?—I think there can be no question about it. When I was under examination on Monday, I stated then what I hope will be the case if this Bill passes into a law, that I hope the House of Commons will define what a bonâ fide meal is; for leaving it open in the way in which it now is, whether it is breakfast, dinner, tea, or supper, or luncheon, or how long a man is to be taking it, or whether the publican is to supply the man during the whole time he is taking it, when he is to begin and when he is to leave off, or what is to regulate the conduct of a licensed victualler, I do not know, unless the House of Commons itself will decide what a bonâ fide meal is, in a manner that cannot be misunderstood in the Act of Parliament which refers to it.

6637. With regard to the petitions which have been presented against this Bill, it has been stated to the Committee that some at least of them were hawked about the street and signed by boys, and by some persons more than once; may I take it from you that as far as regards the great bulk of the petitions presented under the auspices of your society, you, of your own knowledge, can state that that is not the case?—I can only state of my own knowledge the express instructions that were given, which were of the most stringent character, that every petition which came into the office, and was presented through the instrumentality of the protection society, was examined with the most scrupulous care, and the instructions were distinct. I read them in my evidence on Monday. Those instructions were of the most distinct character, and I have no reason to believe, from the reports of the gentlemen in whom I have the most perfect confidence, but that all of those signatures were the bonâ fide signatures of grown-up persons, neither girls nor boys.

6638. Mr. Roebuck.] Have you any account of those petitions that were rejected by you as not having been signed under the rules that you have laid down?—I have no account at present; but I think it more than likely that I could furnish the Committee with an account of those that were rejected, or something like an approaching number.

6639. Can you say that some have been rejected?

jected?—Most certainly; and they have been torn up.

6640. Mr. Knatchbull - Hugessen.] Do you know whether any number of those petitions have been rejected by the Committee of the House of Commons, which has to examine into the authenticity of the signatures, and who do frequently reject petitions from being written in the same handwriting, or bearing upon them internal evidence of not being authentic?—I have watched with great care the publication of the report upon petitions, and as far certainly as I have seen, I do not believe that a single petition was rejected which was presented against this Bill.

6641. Can you say the same of the petitions which were presented for the Bill?—I have seen the report from this House, which distinctly states to the contrary.

6642. Mr. Horsfall.] When did you see that report?—Shortly after its publication. It was an authentic report published by the authority of the House.

6643. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You never heard that beer was given in exchange for signatures to those petitions?—Most certainly not.

6644. You do not believe it?—I do not believe it; and any man who would have stated to the movers of that opposition that they had done so would have been met with certainly an amount of treatment which I think he would hardly have failed to have deserved.

6645. Will you allow me to ask whether you have got before you a copy of your examination last Monday?—Yes.

6646. Will you do me the favour to refer to question No. 6529. My question was, "Do you say that you made a compromise upon that occasion?" and will you be so good as to read your answer?—"A compromise was effected upon that occasion, as I have already stated, on the recommendation of gentlemen of the House of Commons, who felt that there was a danger that we should get the worst that was proposed, and therefore I, in common with others who were acting with me, felt that we were doing our duty to the trade, and doing the best we could do for the public (for there was no public organisation at that time) to accept a certain portion of the closing rather than run the risk of a division of the House upon the whole question."

6647. Will you be so good as to go to the next question, No. 6530, and read your answer to it?—"We thought we did it for the best, and we adhere to it. We did not feel it our duty, having made that compromise, to assist in any movement by which that Bill should be altered; and although a movement was made, in which the public joined and shared, by which that Bill was eventually repealed, we had nothing whatever to do with it."

6648. Then I understand that you accepted that Bill, and you took no means to interfere with its provision?—Most certainly not.

6649. Will you be so good as to look at this paper, and tell me whether you are not the Mr. Winterbotham who was present at a meeting of the licensed victuallers in Birmingham in the autumn of the year 1854 (handing a paper to the Witness)?—Yes, I was.

6650. Will you look at the resolutions which were then passed; they were carried unanimously, were they not?—As far as my memory goes, I could not say; but I have no doubt that this is a correct statement in the pamphlet.

6651. Will you state to the Committee what the nature of the meeting was?—This was a meeting of the central committee of the United Towns' Association of Licensed Victuallers, which was attended evidently by some delegates from London, and myself, it appears, amongst the number.

6652. What did you do at that meeting?—I must refer to this paper for a record of what did; but I have not the slightest recollection to enable me to tell.

6653. Was not it a meeting for the purpose of opposing the Bill?—It was a general delegate meeting, I think.

6654. Was not it for the purpose of opposing Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill?—Most certainly not, in my judgment.

6655. Have you any doubt about the resolutions being carried unanimously, because it is stated here positively so?—I have no doubt but what the statement there is correct; but I should say that I should have taken no part in the voting, being simply a delegate there from London, but I very likely should not have expressed any dissent from those resolutions, because, from what I see of them, I believe them to be all resolutions of truth, from the casual view which I have had of them.

6656. Is not that utterly inconsistent with the fact that you did not oppose the Bill?—I do not see any inconsistency in it at all; what I should call opposing the Bill would be precisely as we have done now, actively engaging in some direct positive course, and communicating with the Members of the House of Commons for the purpose of doing so in a very different mode to the mere passing of a resolution.

6657. Chairman.] You draw a distinction between a public expression of opinion and Parliamentary opposition?—I am drawing a distinction between the course that we ourselves should take with reference to a measure which we were actively opposing; while on the one hand we knew from the dissatisfaction which existed in consequence of the passing of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, that we could not be supporters of that Bill, we felt that we were bound not to oppose the Bill actively, as we should have done had not that compromise been effected.

6658. Mr. John Abel Smith.] But you believe that this resolution was carried unanimously at that meeting: "That, in the opinion of this meeting, one recommendation of the Select Committee so immediately affects the rights, privileges, and comforts of the public at large, especially the working portion of them, that they will never tamely submit to such a restriction which is to entirely close all public-houses at 11 o'clock at night; a regulation too stringent to be carried out in cases where the law now provides differently, and calculated to cripple the necessary convenience, not only of numerous travellers, but of thousands whose occupations or amusements compel them to require refreshment, particularly in large towns after that period;" do not you consider that opposition?—It is not what I should call opposition; I have no doubt at all from the report that I see there, though I have no recollection of it, that that was presented to the meeting, and I could not have found any reason upon earth to have urged against that resolution, when I knew the inconvenience which the public were at that moment suffering; for although this compromise had been made which prevented me ing a party to an organised opposition, I should not have felt myself at liberty to have got up at that meeting, and have praised a Bill which I only accepted for fear that we should get something worse.

6659. Nobody is saying anything about praising the Bill, but you stated, as I understood you the other day, that you had accepted the Bill, and had abstained from all opposition?—Perfectly so.

6660. I ask you whether passing such a resolution in the autumn of that year was not opposition?—It was not opposition in the sense in which I understand opposition.

6661. You consider, when you use the word opposition, that it only means Parliamentary opposition?—That is much nearer than the opposition which I should accept as you put it; but I should just state that I think that my object in the answer which I gave was this, that there had been statements made in this room that the licensed victuallers had got up the riots in Hyde Park; I stated most emphatically that the protection society with whom I was acting, I know had had nothing whatever to do with them; and I stated also, and it will, I dare say, be in your recollection, that another society was formed in opposition to the protection society, because of the acceptance of that compromise, and I have seen this very morning one of the principal men connected with that society, in whose word I can place the strictest reliance, and he told me that they had nothing to do with it.

6662. I do not recollect anybody saying that it was the publicans who made the riots in Hyde Park?—Sitting in this room as a publican a good many things have been said which I recollect, though possibly you might not.

6663. It is very immaterial, I do not care about that at all; I want to ask you whether this was one of the resolutions passed, "That it is clearly shown by Parliamentary Returns that the vice of drunkenness in towns is in proportion to the number of public-houses and the facilities for obtaining intoxicating drinks, and this meets therefore of opinion that the proposal to throw open the trade under certain conditions to all persons who may think fit to apply for a license, is fraught with the greatest moral and social mischief." Do you still hold the opinion that the amount of drunkenness prevailing is in proportion to the number of public-houses?—I entertain this opinion, which would likewise have prevented me from opposing that resolution, that there are already a very large number of public-houses in the town which cannot obtain what I should call a legitimate living, and that they are compelled to resort to practices for the purpose of saving their little capital, and maintaining their families, which, unless there were this large number of public-houses, and the great amount of competition, they would not resort to; and I think were the already large number of houses to be increased by an open trade, I believe the consequences to the trade of which I am a member would be ruinous, and the consequences to the public would be most disastrous.

6664. Although you think, first of all, that if there was an open competition it would be disastrous to the trade, you still do think that the number of houses affects the amount of drunkenness?—I think that wherever there is an over number of houses it has decidedly that effect.

6665. There is nothing about an over number of houses here?—But that is my answer to your question. It is more than possible that I did not so carefully scan that resolution when it was being read at the public meeting, but that is my opinion, that where there is an over number of public-houses it results in inducements being offered by them unduly to do business, and that is disastrous and injurious to the public.

6666. If it is true that public-houses increase drunkenness, do not you think it is a question very worthy of consideration by Parliament, whether on the Sunday there might not be some limitation of drunkenness with benefit to the social habits of the people?—Although Parliament may feel, or Members of Parliament may feel, that the restriction of hours would produce a diminution of drunkenness, still I think that having already had before me the experience of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, I am prepared to say most emphatically that, in my judgment, although it might save some few persons from getting drunk, who would perhaps get drunk by indirect and evasive means, still the amount of inconvenience would be so much larger than the amount of good to be done, that it would be unwise and impolitic in Parliament to attempt to pass such a measure.

6667. Then I quite understand you to think that the benefits derived would be disproportionate to the evil inflicted?—Perfectly so.

6668. I hope you will believe me when I say I am quite aware of your high personal character, and in any question which I put to you I hope you will not believe that I mean anything personal; but with regard to your own business you have two departments of your business, have you not; you have a coffee-house, in the ordinary acceptance of the term, and you have also a drinking shop?—Yes, I have.

6669. And the businesses are separate?—They are separated by means of partitions; a large portion of it, the coffee-house business, is upstairs. Perhaps I may just as well explain that I have in front what we call a general counter; I have attached to that, equally open, only divided by a partition, a luncheon counter, and I have then a passage leading upstairs equally open, and beyond that another luncheon counter; I have given you as nearly as possible a description of the house that I keep.

6670. It used to be more of a coffee-house, used it not?—That is some time since; it had assumed a different character when I took it, but I have turned it into a still more public character than it had before.

6671. With regard to the character of that house, is not the description of people who come to the house, and who use the house on Sunday, utterly different from the character of the people who go, for instance, to the New Cut?—We have two classes of persons; we have at this moment not so much of that class of persons who go to the New Cut as we had before the demolition of the neighbourhood which has been taken down for the new law courts. We had parties passing going to Drury-lane and all those places, and a large amount of low neighbourhood, which was there, and we had a large number of them calling in, and getting off from omnibusses, parting from their friends, going from Fetter-lane into Holborn, Gray's-inn-lane, and so on; and we still have many of them.

6672. Can you give the Committee any idea as to your sale on the respective days of the Q Q 3 week,

Mr.
T. Winter-

week, whether there is more sold on Sunday or Saturday than on other days of the week, and so on?—We sell on the Sunday certainly two-thirds less than on any other day; there is very little difference in the takings during the other days.

6673. If you sell only one-third on the Sunday it becomes a matter of comparative indifference to you as to stopping that portion of the sale?—When I first went to Peel's Coffee-house I found it, as far as trade was concerned, in as miserable a state as any man could conceive, and to the question of Sunday necessarily I gave some attention. I kept my house open on Sunday; and I state, as conscientiously as I ever stated anything in my life, I kept my house open on Sunday because I believed that in the neighbourhood of Fetter-lane, where there are a large number of lodgers, and many men of that description, and in the neighbourhood which we have at the back of us, there was a legitimate want for the article in which we deal, and that I was not justified in closing on Sunday on that account.

6674. The fact is still unquestionable that the amount of injury to be inflicted by legislation upon you as regards Sunday drinking is comparatively small?—It would not be comparatively small taking it in the aggregate; it would be a large item in my profits; but I think I may venture to say that that is not the cause which induces me to take so active a part as I have taken in opposition to this measure, because I could do without it; but I believe that there are a large number of publicans who would be utterly and entirely ruined were it to pass.

6675. Will you point out to me any class of people who would be entirely ruined?—I believe that there would be more harm effected in the houses in the neighbourhood of the parks and houses from five or six miles out of London. When I say the parks, of course I mean the whole of them, all round the metropolis, and very especially Hampstead Heath, Peckham Rye, and other such places of public resort. I believe those persons would have to depend to a large extent for their profits upon the trade which they get on the Sunday during the summer time.

6676. Do not you think that some of the low public-houses would suffer also seriously?—I think that they might suffer and perhaps be less able to afford the loss of it.

6677. It might entail the shutting up of some of those houses?—I believe there are a large number of public-houses that have just that difficulty to live and keep open, that if you take away from them one day's trade out of seven, in all probability it would have the effect which I have stated, of the shutting up of those houses, and the ruin of the people in them.

6678. But as regards the public drunkenness, it would have a good effect?—I do not think that I have said that, nor do I think that I have said anything from which it could be inferred.

6679. I am looking to your resolution?—I think even with reference to the resolution itself, it would not be very extraordinary if I had altered my opinion from that time to this, but I have not done so. I am of the same opinion at this moment as I was when I accepted on the part of the trade with some four or five gentlemen acting with me, which I venture to call a compromise upon Mr. Wilson Patten's Act. I did that, not because I believed in the justice or expediency of the Act, but because the public as a rule never move in such matters until they find themselves inconvenienced, and in consequence of the important recommendations from Mr. Villiers' Committee, as I usually call it, that being so important a question, and those recommendations being that we should be only open from one to two, and from eight to ten, I only accepted that compromise in the fear that we should get a nine o'clock closing, which I think was the first proposition of Colonel Wilson Patten, and I think it was half-an-hour earlier in the day-time.

6680. With regard to that Birmingham meeting, was not there a resolution about petitions?—Yes, it appears that there was a petition for the abolition of the Sunday Closing Act.

6681. Was anything done about that?—I cannot charge my memory at all about it, but if anything was done it was done in the country; it was not done by any authorised society in London, with which I am associated. I am not going to say that it was not done by the society, which I have already told you sprung into existence consequent upon the compromise which we had effected. I had hoped that I had shown sufficiently clearly that I had nothing to do with it; and with regard to the other society, all that I intended to convey to the Committee was, that they, as well as ourselves, had nothing to do with the riots in Hyde Park, but I do not think that I did at all venture to say, and if I did, it would have been a very monstrous mistake, that the other society did not take very active measures to obtain the repeal of that Bill.

6682. But you have made a very important admission, namely, that the trade in London to which you belong, and in which you play so large a part, took no measures to get rid of Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill, by meetings in Hyde Park, or other means?—No, when I say the trade, I mean the trade in London. I have endeavoured specially to separate the two trades. I know positively that the society which was established in opposition to the protection society, did take most measures in concert with other societies in the provinces to obtain expressions of public opinion against the measure; but with reference to the Hyde Park riots, I again repeat that for ourselves we had nothing to do with it, and I had that from the leading man in connection with the other society, who distinctly stated that they had nothing to do with it, and I have the utmost reliance upon his opinion; but I have never intended to convey, nor do I think any words of mine have conveyed to this Committee that the trade in London had nothing to do with the opposition to that Bill; surely, I have never done that.

6683. You confine your observations strictly to those with whom you were connected?—Excepting only with reference to the Hyde Park riots.

6684. Is your house a free house, or is it a brewer's house?—I have no objection to answer that question. I do not know what effect it can have upon the question before the Committee; but it is as free as money can make it, and it belongs to me.

6685. Are there not a great number of low public-houses living with so small a margin of profit that they are obliged to have recourse to all sorts of undue methods to keep themselves going?—I have heard all sorts of wild statements with

Mr.
T. Winter-

with reference to that. I know nothing of it; one-tenth of the statements which I have heard thoroughly and entirely disbelieve; but I really know nothing of houses situated in that way.

6686. With regard to the inconvenience which you allege, in the case of people returning from excursions, in that resolution you state that even 10 o'clock is an intolerable hour to close; and of course, therefore, you object to 10 o'clock closing. Who are the people who come to you after 10 o'clock? First of all, let us take the luncheon house; are there any people who come to you here after 10 o'clock?—Very seldom.

6687. Then it is totally confined to the drinking counter?—Our luncheon counter is open, and there is some cold meat, which sometimes is called for, and sometimes eaten, but not as a rule; therefore the bulk of the business is confined to the drinking counter.

6688. Are those people casual visitors, or are they habitual visitors?—The persons who come here between 10 and 11 o'clock are, to a large extent, persons who are passing through the City on their way home; persons who have been, perhaps, in some of the newspaper offices, or at least have been employed some way in the immediate neighbourhood, and cabmen, and a number of persons fetching their supper beer in their gigs.

6689. Do you contemplate any serious amount of inconvenience by their being restricted to the hour of 10 o'clock?—I contemplate a much larger amount of inconvenience than the Bill would produce good.

6690. That may be your opinion; but do you contemplate any serious or material inconvenience to those people if the hour was restrained to 10 o'clock?—If you are referring to the inconvenience which they would suffer from not getting what they require, I think it would be a large amount of inconvenience. I think it would be an extreme amount of inconvenience to any one walking from a railway station, some half or three-quarters of a mile, perhaps five minutes before 11 o'clock, to find that he could not go in and get a glass of ale or sherry, or a pint of porter.

6691. Why do you think that the same principles which affect every other trade in London should not be applied to publicans?—I think that the special laws which regulate public-houses are widely different from the ordinary laws which regulate ordinary trades, because the principle of the law with reference to ordinary trade is to let them alone, and leave it to their proprietors to do the largest amount of business that they possibly can.

6692. I meant with reference to Sunday closing?—I am endeavouring to reply to the question, by saying that there is just that difference between the trade of which I am a member and an ordinary trade. Parliament, as a rule, makes but little interference with ordinary trades, and leaves to the enterprise and energy of the proprietor of an ordinary trade an opportunity of increasing it, and gaining as largely by it as he possibly can; but, with regard to the licensed victuallers, there are a number of special restrictions and a number of severe penalties, and penalties which are not only inflicted as a matter of money payment, but they result sometimes in the loss of the license, and indeed in the ruin of a man. And along with those restrictions the law has, if I may call it so, established a certain arrange ment that they shall have seven days' trade, whereas, in ordinary trades, people have only six days' trade.

6693. You think it is a sort of concession in consequence of the various restrictions imposed upon the publicans' trade?—I think it is to prevent the pressure from the Parliamentary regulations which first created the trade and then restricted it.

6694. I ought to have asked you before, do you believe that the proportion of Sunday's sale, which you state is the case in your own business, would be a fair list of the ordinary public-house trade in the metropolis?—I really have no means of forming an opinion. Sunday trade differs very materially in some neighbourhoods; there are very large neighbourhoods where the Sunday trade is of vast importance. I am referring to London, not to the outskirts, because there, as I have already stated, it is a question almost of ruin. In other neighbourhoods which are differently constituted, it is not of so great importance. Only those who practically know the working of the trade, can arrive at any conclusion as to particular neighbourhoods how far the Sunday trade is of importance.

6695. Would it not be consistent with the opinions which you have expressed, I think very honourably to yourself, with regard to the effects of drunkenness and drinking in excess, and would it not be in favour of social order, if there were a restriction put upon those houses where the sale was greatest on Sunday?—I believe, in the majority of those cases the most legitimate sale that can possibly take place in our business takes place at houses of that description. A large quantity in the houses that I have described is fetched away at the various meal times, and a large amount is sold, more particularly in those houses to persons who are returning home to their various neighbourhoods.

6696. But the meal time, I imagine, would not be interfered with by this Bill?—No; it would not interfere with that.

6697. Do you believe that almost all the workmen in London dine between half-past 12 and half-past 2?—I should think the majority of them do.

6698. And they all, as a rule, sup before 10?—I should think it very likely. I really have not sufficient information to tell you.

6699. But you have no reason to doubt the fact?—No, I have no reason to doubt the fact; I have no reason to form an opinion either way. I should think it would be so, but I cannot speak positively upon it.

6700. Therefore, no inconvenience would be produced by this Bill with regard to that class?—No; not in the case of those who wanted to dine at home.

6701. It would be cabmen and omnibus drivers, and those engaged upon the press, and those engaged in night occupations, and in various trades on Sunday evenings, which is necessarily a limited number, is it not?—Yes. But there is another very important section of the public who would be very seriously interfered with, whom I have not named, and you have not named, and that is those passing to and fro from excursions and other places, which form a very large and important body of people of all classes.

6702. And you think that the temporary inconvenience to them is not to be set against what might be imagined the public benefit of diminish-

Mr.
T. Winter-

ing drunkenness?—I do not admit that there would be any large diminution of drunkenness consequent upon the taking away of those hours of the night, and precluding persons from drinking in public-houses. I do not think that there would be any large diminution of drunkenness. I have already stated, I think, or I certainly intended to state, that some persons might be prevented from getting drunk by our closing an hour earlier, who, I think, are a very small and miserable minority, but I do not think it would have the effect of largely preventing drunkenness.

6703. Have you not heard a great deal of evidence in this room as to the fact of Sunday drunkenness being considerable, and having a very direct effect upon the comforts and habits and morals of the labouring man?—I have heard evidence in this room given with reference to the trade of which I am a member, perfectly astounding to me. I have heard our trade charged with promoting drunkenness, and I know that to be the exception and not the rule, wherever it is, and a very small exception. I have heard statements that Sunday drunkenness is the cause of all the crime and prostitution that exists in this country. I have heard the suggestion, that when persons die from drinking, the publicans should have to keep their families; and I have really heard such wild suggestions in this room that I hardly know how to accept, in some instances, almost anything that has been said with reference to the trade.

6704. Is it not the fact, that there is the widest possible distinction between such a house as yours and the low drinking-houses that prevail in London?—There is no doubt there is a distinction between my house and the houses existing in the Seven Dials, or in some of the lower neighbourhoods in London; but at the same time there are low people of the same class existing around those houses, and requiring the same amount as respectable persons who come into my house.

6705. I give you credit for wishing to conduct your house as respectable and properly as anybody can do anything in the world, but I believe there is a great distinction, is there not, between your house and the lower class of houses?—There is no doubt there is a great distinction; but I know many houses in low neighbourhoods which are conducted as respectably as my own.

6706. What I understand you to do is to state your conviction, first of all, that the Bill now before this Committee would be productive of great inconvenience, and inconvenience utterly disproportionate to the good which it would do?—That is distinctly my opinion.

6707. Therefore, you think that the inconveniences inflicted would be inflicted on a very respectable and deserving class, who ought not to be exposed to any inconvenience without a clear and equivalent reason?—I do.

6708. Are not the people employed in public-houses very generally in favour of Sunday closing?—That has been received as an accepted notion; I certainly know this of my own knowledge; I have something like six young men engaged in my business; whether they might perhaps have taken their cue from my own known opinions upon that point, I am not prepared to say, but most certainly I believe there is not one of them who is not as firmly opposed to this Bill as I am myself.

6709. Are you aware that there has been some considerable number of publicans and beer-house keepers who have petitioned in favour of the Bill?—I have heard it stated to be so, but I do not think that that applies much to the metropolis.

6710. You do not believe that they have petitioned?—I do not think that that applies much to the metropolis; I do not say that there have been no petitions presented from licensed victuallers in the metropolis, because I am not sufficiently informed upon that point, but certainly if there have been, they have been but from very few, considering the large number of public-houses in London.

6711. How many are there in the metropolis do you think?—I think we reckon something like 6,000 licensed victuallers in the metropolitan district.

6712. How many are there, including beer-houses?—I should think something like 10,000.

6713. Mr. Baines.] I think you stated that you had heard that the petitions in favour of this Bill had been unduly signed?—I have heard certainly that they have been signed irregularly; I am speaking now entirely from what I have heard, I do not know anything about it of my own knowledge; but with reference to the petitions in favour of the Bill, I have heard that they have been taken to Sunday schools, and signed by Sunday school children again and again; I have heard that, and I believe you will have evidence from the country to prove that such has been the fact, but of my own knowledge I know nothing whatever.

6714. Did I understand you aright to state that you understood that complaints had been made in Parliament as to irregularities in signing those petitions?—My own opinion is, that I saw a Report from the Committee upon Petitions, in which they stated to the House that irregularities had occurred with regard to one or two particular petitions that were signed in favour of this Bill.

6715. I wish now to read to you that complaint which is addressed by the Select Committee on Public Petitions, and to ask if it bears out the statement which you have made. “Mr. Charles Forster reported from the Select Committee on Public Petitions, that they had agreed to the following special Report: Your Committee having in the course of their examination of signatures to certain petitions for restricting trade on Sundays, and for alteration of the law respecting weights and measures, observed that in nearly every case the signature on the skin or sheet on which the petition is written is obviously not in the handwriting of the person whose name is appended, but of one and the same individual who has affixed the different names to the different petitions, for the purpose of giving them a genuine appearance, thereby nullifying the Orders of the House respecting signatures to petitions; Your Committee are of opinion that such a breach of the Orders of the House ought not to be allowed to pass without some special mark of disapproval;” is that what you have seen in the papers?—I am really not certain, it may possibly have been that.

6716. That answers to the account which you gave?—Yes.

6717. I wish to point your attention to the fact that this speaks of petitions for restricting trade on Sundays; are you aware that there is a Bill now before Parliament, called the Sunday Trading Bill?—I am.

6718. Which is quite distinct from this Bill?—Perfectly so.

6719. May

6719. May I then inform you that the Chairman of this Committee, Mr. Charles Forster, formed me yesterday that the complaint was made, not with regard to all to the petitions in favour of the Sunday Liquor Bill, but altogether reference to these two measures, the Sunday Trading Bill and the Weights and Measures Bill?—I, of course, accept from you, and from the Chairman that statement, if that is the one which I refer.

6720. Then you would be willing and desirous to withdraw any imputation founded upon this statement, on hearing that authorised contradiction?—Most certainly, if I have founded my statement upon that report, I withdraw it most hesitatingly.

6721. Have you any other evidence which you can adduce before us to justify that statement?—do not at the present moment recollect; but I still have a lurking thought in my mind that I have seen something else.

6722. But you have no evidence to support that?—I have no evidence at all. If I had known I was going to be asked the question, I would have ascertained it.

6723. Will you refer to the answer that you gave on the last occasion that you were here, to Question 6565, where you stated, "Taking the population of London, which is something like 4,000,000, I do not think there were more than 2,000 persons charged with drunkenness, and crimes arising out of drunkenness, within 12 months;" do you still believe that to be correct?—I have here before me a copy of the return of the statistics of drunkenness on Sundays, procured by the Provisional Licensed Victuallers' Defence League from Sir Richard Mayne, showing the number of cases of drunkenness which have occurred between one o'clock on Sundays and one o'clock on Mondays, during the year 1866, by which it appears that the number of cases of drunkenness were only 606, and the number of cases connected with crime and disorder, 1,308; and the population being 3,785,245.

6724. If I were to tell you that Sir Richard Mayne has given evidence before this Committee, first as to the point of population, that instead of being 4,000,000, the population is 3,452,246, that would make a material difference, would it not?—It would certainly make a material difference, assuming that this return is an incorrect one.

6725. It proves that return to be incorrect, does it not, if Sir Richard Mayne has stated to us within a few days this fact, that the population is what I stated to you, namely, 3,452,246?—I did not know the exact figures. I had not the return before me at the time, but I have taken care to procure this since. I think I said something like 4,000,000.

6726. Taking the figures that I have read to you, it proves that you were about 550,000 over the mark with regard to the population, because instead of being 4,000,000, it is 3,452,246?—Most certainly, assuming that to be correct; but I think that I shall be able to hand in to this Committee the specific return itself, upon which this is founded, obtained direct from Scotland Yard; but I have not it with me.

6727. We shall be glad to see it; but inasmuch as this is a return, which has been handed in to us within the last few weeks by Sir Richard Mayne himself, I think at present we may rely upon it?—I would, perhaps, direct your attention to this, that although I have given a larger number here with regard to the population, I have likewise given a smaller number with regard to the cases of drunkenness.

6728. You have thus stated the number of cases of drunkenness in the passage which I have quoted: "I do not think there were more than 2,000 persons charged with drunkenness, and crimes arising out of drunkenness within 12 months." If I were to tell you that we have received a return from Sir Richard Mayne himself, shewing that the number of cases was not 2,000, but 16,941; would not that make a material difference?—Not 16,941 on Sunday, surely.

6729. I wish to contrast the figures given by you here to-day with the figures given by Sir Richard Mayne; and if I am mistaken, I shall be most happy to be set right; but those were your words, "I do not think there were more than 2,000 persons charged with drunkenness, and crimes arising out of drunkenness, within 12 months?"—Most certainly I intended that statement to apply, as I believe the whole of my evidence was applying, to Sunday only. I believed that I was being examined here entirely with reference to Sunday.

6730. Chairman.] Question 6564 is this, "And you think that the facilities of leaving London by railway and steamboat on Sunday, has accelerated that improvement?" and your answer is, "I think very much so." Then you are asked, "Have you ascertained what is the number of charges before the police for drunkenness?" to which you reply, "I had occasion to look over some documents that were, I believe, forwarded to the Honourable Members of this House; and if my memory serves me right, taking the population of London, which is something like 4,000,000, I do not think there were more than 2,000 persons charged with drunkenness, and crimes arising out of drunkenness, within 12 months;" that was a slip in your answer, was it not?—I certainly intended it to apply to Sunday only.

6731. Mr. Baines.] That fully explains and probably justifies your figures, but they were liable to misinterpretation, because you stated that there were 2,000 within 12 months?—I should be exceedingly sorry to misstate anything, and you do me the greatest favour when you correct a thing of that kind, or give me an opportunity of doing so.

6732. You have stated that there might be great inconvenience in having the public-houses closed at a certain hour in the evening of Sunday; might there not be a still greater inconvenience in closing the shops of bakers, and butchers, and grocers, and greengrocers, and all who supply the necessaries of life to the working classes, not in the evening only, but during the whole of Sunday?—I do not conceive that it would be a greater inconvenience, because the habits and customs of people have been such that they have never been supplied throughout the whole of Sunday by those who deal in those articles which you have mentioned; but with regard to the articles in which we deal, they have almost from time immemorial had the opportunity of being supplied, in fact, very much later than in any other trade, and therefore the inconvenience, in my judgment, would be the more seriously felt, as it would be far a greater change in connection with our trade than it would be in connection with another trade which was not usually opened on the Sunday at all.

6733. You are aware, are you not, that your own trade has been subject, within the last few years, to very great changes in this particular respect; and that whereas all public-houses might have been opened during the whole of the 24 hours of the Sunday 30 years ago, now they are only open eight hours?—That is just one of the statements which has been made in this room which I am very anxious to correct. Public-houses never were allowed within 30 years or 36 years to be open 24 hours on the Sunday. They were regulated by the 9th of Geo. 4, which closed all houses during the usual morning and afternoon Divine service in the town or city or place in which the house was situated. It is one of those misapprehensions which have crept in before the Committee, and which I am glad to have an opportunity of correcting.

6734. But before that Act of the 9th of Geo. 4 they were open, or might have been open, by law, the whole 24 hours?—I can only speak of my own personal knowledge, for the last 36 years. I have been actively engaged in the trade during the whole of that time, and during that time they were regulated first by the 9th Geo. 4. As I have just stated, they were all closed up to one o'clock on the Sunday. A change afterwards took place by Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill, and subsequently by the repeal of that Bill; and another change has taken place, closing the houses at one o'clock by what is called Sir George Grey's Act.

6735. I want to know whether before that Act of the 9th of Geo. 4, the public-houses might have been open by law for the 24 hours of the Sunday?—I really do not know.

6736. If that was stated to us by Sir Richard Mayne here, you would think that, probably, he was correct?—I should think that Sir Richard Mayne's information upon that subject was not correct.

6737. Then I must set your opinion against Sir Richard Mayne's positive statement. I believe there can scarcely be any reason to think that he is mistaken on that point. Do not you think that when a magistrate who is at the head of the police speaks authoritatively before a Committee of Parliament, he is more likely to be informed than you, who do not remember what the Acts of Parliament were?—If you will pardon me for one moment, I have the Acts here, and I will show you the date of them. I cannot tell which law regulated it, for there were about 20 laws repealed by the 9th of Geo. 4, and I cannot tell which it is. I hope that I shall be understood by the Committee as not putting my word against Sir Richard Mayne's in the slightest possible degree. It struck me that the 9th of Geo. 4 was an earlier date than 1829. I know that it regulated the trade when I first had to do with it 36 years ago, and my impression was that the 9th of Geo. 4 was much earlier than that when I gave that answer.

6738. I asked you whether there was not some inconvenience in closing shops for the sale of the necessaries of life, and now I will ask you further, is there not some inconvenience also in the cessation of ordinary labour of every kind upon the Sunday?—I am free to admit that I cannot see any inconvenience in that.

6739. Then where is the inconvenience in closing the public-houses, if there is no inconvenience in the cessation of all ordinary labour; may not a person earn wages upon the Sunday, and is he not prevented from earning wages upon the Sunday?—That depends entirely upon the persons, and the mode of their employment; there are means of earning wages on the Sunday now. If you take the large class of persons engaged in domestic service, either as engaged in a small description of house, or going higher up amongst the aristocracy, where a large number are engaged who are regularly employed on the Sunday they are earning wages on the Sunday. It does not appear to me that there are not, even now, a very large class who are earning wages on the Sunday.

6740. But is it not the general rule of law that industry shall not be carried on on the Sunday and that there shall be a cessation of labour on the Sunday?—I believe it to be the general rule of law, that mechanical labour shall not be carried on on the Sunday.

6743. Do you think that the observance of a day of rest is a blessing and an advantage to the community, or the reverse?—I think unquestionably it is an advantage; but the day of rest is observed by many in those different shapes which they think most to be right or most to enjoy; there are numbers who feel that the day of rest should be one of gloom and continuous application to the performance of religious duties; I am not going to say one word against those whom I believe to be a very large number, who conscientiously feel that; but there are others who feel that their day of rest is properly applied and properly used when they take the opportunity which is afforded them of seeing nature and seeing certain portions of God's works that they cannot see without the sacrifice of time and the sacrifice of money on any other day; and they, too, I think, as legitimately, in my judgment, enjoy the day of rest, if their consciences justifies them in doing that, as those who think that the day of rest should be spent only in churches and chapels, or in the performance of Divine worship, or in the performance of religious duties.

6744. Do you think that there is not a very great amount of evil arising from the crowded gin palaces, public-houses, and beer-shops of the country on the Sunday evening?—I do not think that there is a very great amount of evil, and, as far as the metropolis is concerned (and I am very anxious not to go further than the metropolis, because I am anxious only to speak upon what I know), when you see that only 2,000 persons are charged on Sunday, during the whole year, not only ally with drunkenness, but with crime arising out of drunkenness, I do not think that a serious amount of evil results from the opening of public-houses on Sunday.

6745. Are you aware that in Scotland the opening of the public-houses on the Sunday, and the sale of liquor, has been entirely prohibited for the last 12 years, with a very great diminution in the amount of drunkenness?—I am still anxious to confine myself to the metropolis, but I have heard just on the other side that there is a very great deal of drunkenness in Scotland, a little way from the public eye, but as much carried on as it was previous to the passing of the Forbes Mackenzie Act, to which, I presume, you allude; but I do not know that of my own knowledge.

6746. Are you aware that Mr. Mackie, who is in the trade of a licensed victualler for 30 years in Manchester, and is a member of the Council, has stated that he had been in business for 48 years of his life, that he had never opened on the Sunday; that he had reason to believe that he was more successful in that capacity than almost anyone in the business, and for this reason, that he made it a rule not to give drink to any improper characters, nor to young people, nor to irreputable people of any kind, nor to drunkards?—The opinion that Mr. Mackie has formed of the reason of his success in business I must leave entirely to himself; but what he stated in the latter part of his answer to the question that you put to him, I can say as safely and as justifiably as he can; and I positively say that, although I have kept open on Sundays during 29 years of my life.

6747. Are you aware that 756 publicans of Liverpool signed a canvass in favour of the total closing of public-houses on the Sunday?—I have heard so, but I know nothing whatever of it.

6748. Are you aware that this Bill, of which you have expressed so strong disapprobation, has received the written approbation of 69 mayors of boroughs, 31 chairmen of quarter sessions, and 48 justices of the peace in England?—I hope that I may speak without presumption when I say that I have no doubt of that fact, but that it would not in the slightest degree alter my opinion of the Bill.

6749. You have complained of the trade being subject to legal restrictions of a most vexatious kind; has not your trade always been subject to restriction and police control as long as you are aware of?—Perfectly so.

6750. What reason do you assign for those special restrictions, and that surveillance by the police over your trade which does not exist over other trades?—The reason I assign for it is, that the articles in which we deal may be sold improperly to improper persons, at improper times, and may do a serious amount of injury; but those are not the legal restrictions of a vexatious kind to which I refer. We have not only stringent laws to regulate our trade, laws which, in my judgment, are necessary, too, for the regulation of our trade, but we have besides that, what I do complain of, a second description of punishment, which is the endangering of our license and our property, even after that penalty has been paid.

6751. May I ask you, in pursuance of my former question, whether you do not think that the reason why the police are specially charged with the care of public-houses, and those restrictions are placed upon those houses, is, that public-houses produce drunkenness, and that drunkenness produces disorderliness and crime; do not you think that that is the reason most probably to be assigned for it?—I do not think it is the most probable reason. I think that the most probable reason is, that in public-houses drunkenness may be allowed, and that crime in all probability will result from it; but I do not think that it follows as a matter of course that the police restrictions are adopted because drunkenness does take place in the majority of public-houses; on the contrary, I believe it to be perfectly otherwise.

6752. Are you aware that during the time that Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was in operation the number of cases of drunkenness on Sunday brought before the magistrates, not only in London but throughout the kingdom, was very largely diminished?—I have heard that evidence given in this room; and I have heard added to that, that the cases on the other days in the week were very largely increased. I think I have heard that in this room also.

6753. Have you any evidence to show that?—I think I have heard it in this room.

6754. Have you any evidence to show it?—I have not evidence without going through the minutes; but my impression is that some magistrates gave evidence of that character. I am, of course, speaking only from memory.

6755. I think I have got from you the admission that you are not able to give any evidence upon that subject?—If you will accept it, I have an impression that such evidence was given; or, which perhaps would rather be a better answer, I have an impression of that character, which I will either endeavour to justify or freely retract.

6756. Mr. Malcolm.] The Honourable Member was comparing some evidence which Sir Richard Mayne had given with your opinion with regard to public-houses being regulated by law between 1831 and 1839. I see in Sir Richard Mayne's answer that he rather confirms what you said, namely, that they were under restriction, although that restriction was not enforced, which is quite another thing. His answer is this: "I think, practically, between 1831 and 1839, public-houses were not required to close at any hour on Sunday. There was a general law about closing during the hours of Divine Service, morning and afternoon" (which I take to be what you said was the case); "but, as I said, that law was nearly inoperative, if not wholly so, from the divisions of parishes and the different hours of Divine Service, both morning and afternoon"?—In 1839 I was in business, and I know perfectly well that that was so.

6757. Mr. Berkeley.] I believe you are perfectly cognisant of what passed both in the House of Commons and out of the House of Commons, with regard to Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill?—I am.

6758. You belong to a class of licensed victuallers, who rather consented to the Bill than otherwise?—I did.

6759. Are you aware that it was opposed in the House of Commons; does your knowledge go to that?—I think that it was opposed on the third reading; but I am not quite certain upon that.

6760. You are quite right, and I opposed it. You have stated, have you not, that under that Act the people suffered great inconvenience?—Certainly, that is distinctly my opinion.

Mr.

6761. You believe generally that it did?—I believe so, unquestionably.

6762. They required no telling, did they?—Certainly not; they told us.

6763. Are you aware that in many cases on the Sunday, from 1,000 to 1,500 people were put down at the terminus of one railway or another after 10 o'clock, and before 11, who were perfectly incapable of finding a crust of bread or anything to drink whatsoever?—Personally, of course, I should not be aware of that; but I know that it was the subject of common complaint and report. I may say for myself, that I had a number of individual complaints from my own customers, who had returned from excursions, and who knocked at my door, and were told that they could not be served; and they complained of my own conduct in being a party to consenting to that course, and also of the Legislature for passing that measure.

6764. Evidence of that state of feeling is to be found in the evidence taken before the Committee of which I was Chairman; but now as regards the satisfaction created by the course taken in the House of Commons in stopping the action of Colonel Wilson Patten's Bill, are you aware that general satisfaction took place throughout the country?—I believe that was so. I know in my own individual case it was so; and it appears to have been so in the case of a very large number of personal friends that I have, who are engaged in the trade.

6765. You have heard it stated, and you entirely repudiate it as regards yourself, and that class of the profession to which you immediately belong; but you do not in any way believe that those disturbances which took place after Colonel Wilson Patten's Act came into operation, were in any way attributable to the Licensed Victuallers?—I know that it was not so with regard to our society, and I have the utmost reliance on the testimony of a gentleman who was actively engaged in the society which endeavoured to repeal that Act, that they took no part in those disturbances. Of course the Committee may be aware that I am not speaking of individual licensed victuallers; I cannot possibly do that.

6766. Mr. Locke.] You stated that with regard to licensed victuallers, there are a great many laws affecting them. One of the laws affecting them is, as to the quality of the articles which they sell, is it not?—There are a large number of laws affecting them.

6767. With regard to whether an article is adulterated or not?—Yes.

6768. Does that apply only to licensed victuallers; are you aware that an Act was passed, which was brought in by the late Mr. Schofield, called the Adulteration of Food Act?—Yes, perfectly.

6769. And that applies to all persons who sell articles of food?—Perfectly so.

6770. Perhaps you are aware that that Act has not been fully carried out, in consequence of the different parishes not choosing to pay an inspector for that object?—Yes, I think I saw it only yesterday, or it might be to day.

6771. Therefore the same law has been attempted to be applied to other persons carrying on trades where food is supplied, as was applied before the passing of Mr. Schofield's Act to licensed victuallers?—I think that there had been many laws applying to the adulteration of articles previous to the passing of Mr. Schofield's Act, and I will tell you why I recollect that there have been. Some few years since the Excise left a notice at each house, which held a license under them for the sale of pepper, or tea, or any other article which a man was licensed to sell, and amongst others, we had one. Therefore, I know that it applied to other trades besides ours, and has done so for many years, I believe.

6772. But Mr. Schofield's Act, probably you are not aware, enacted that summary proceedings should be taken: before that a man was liable to be indicted at common law if he sold articles which were calculated to be injurious to health; but this Act of Mr. Schofield's gave an opportunity of getting a person before the magistrates and fining him for selling an adulterated article of food, bread, or anything else; are you aware that a Bill has been brought into Parliament (I forget the name of the Member who brought it in), for the purpose of amending this Act of Mr. Schofield's, obliging parishes to establish an inspector and likewise a medical man, to test the different articles in consequence of that Act not being effectual?—The only mode in which I can possibly be aware of this is the ordinary public prints; and I saw either that notice was given to introduce a Bill or that a Bill was brought in having that for its object; that is all I know of it.

6773. That Bill is brought in for the purpose of protecting the public against the adulteration of food, and separate Bills have been brought in for the purpose of preventing the adulteration of liquor?—I know but very little, if anything at all, of the provisions of Mr. Schofield's Bill.

6775. Are you aware that the Committee only report in that kind of way when they have a very strong case, and do not believe many of the signatures to petitions to be reliable?—It has come to my knowledge that that is the case.

Mr. Alderman WILLIAM FISHER, called in; and Examined.

6776. Chairman.] WHAT are you?—A Merchant and Manufacturer in Sheffield.

6777. Mr. Roebuck.] I think you have been your life an inhabitant of Sheffield, have you not?—Yes.

6778. And you have been mayor of Sheffield?—Yes.

6779. You are at the present moment one of the town council of Sheffield; you are an alderman?—Yes; I am an alderman.

6780. Therefore you have had a long and very extensive experience as to the manners and customs of your native town?—Yes.

6781. Have you of late years perceived any alteration in the habits and manners of the working classes of that town as regards the subject of this Bill, drunkenness?—There has been a very marked improvement both in the manners and the habits of the people; there has been a very great reduction in the number of charges for drunkenness within the last 20 years. I think in 1849 or 1848 the returns showed one charge of drunkenness to each 120 of the population, and the last year's return was one in 250; but those figures do not show the whole of the improvement, because at the time that I first speak of we had one policeman to 1,050, whereas now we have one to about 800 of the population, and better ordered and managed force, so that a larger proportion of those who indulge too much in drink will find their way to the police cells than at the former period.

6782. That being your opinion as to the general improvement of the people in their habits of soberness, can you tell me anything about the operation of Colonel Wilson Patten's Act, which was in existence, I think, or in force about eight months?—All I remember of it is, that I was called upon by a requisition to convene a public meeting of the inhabitants of Sheffield to consider that Act, and it was a large open air meeting. I speak only from memory; but my impression is that the requisition which was received was from those who were in favour of restricting the open hours of public-houses, but the meeting went decidedly against it. There was a very strong feeling of objection to that reduction of one hour in the open hours of Sunday.

6783. Would you say that at that large open air meeting there was a majority of the persons against Colonel Wilson Patten's Act of restriction?—I have not been able to refer to the report, and my memory is not very certain, but my impression is very strong that the voting was very largely against the resolutions that were proposed by those in favour of restriction; those whose requisition caused the meeting.

6784. Have you any reason to believe that the feeling in favour of restriction has grown; that the people of Sheffield have changed their mind, and are now more favourable to restriction than they were at that time?—No; I should say not.

6785. You say that, having full opportunity of judging of the opinions of your native town?—Certainly; it appears to me that it would be felt as a very great hardship if restrictions should be put upon the population when the whole state of the town on Sunday—the state of the streets will show to any one knowing the town that Sunday drinking is very much lessened since the time when two hours were added to the time of opening on Sunday.

6786. Since the time of the repeal of Colonel Wilson Patten's Act?—Yes.

6787. And since that time you say there has been that great improvement in the manners, habits, and customs of the people of Sheffield?—Yes.

6788. Should you say at this present time it was a correct representation which has been made to this Committee, that generally speaking a restrictive Bill of this character would be popular amongst the people of Sheffield?—My own experience would lead me to dispute that; some persons may be favourable to greater restriction; no doubt there are some, and they judge that the opinions of those they meet with are all on their own side; but I am satisfied that supposing this Bill to be carried, it would produce so much dissatisfaction in Sheffield, that it would be intolerable; and if I may say so without offence, I cannot but think that that is to some extent the opinion of the promoters of this measure; otherwise I do not see why the Metropolis should be exempted from its operation.

6789. You take an exception to any difference being made between large towns in the country and the Metropolis?—I think a country townsman would feel it very hard that he should not have some opportunity of getting at his relatives and friends in the country, or meeting his fellow-workmen or relatives or friends inside the tavern; he has no withdrawing room in his own house, where away from wife and children he can have his chat with his friend about politics or trade, or matters uninteresting to his wife or children, but which, some of them, though proper enough to be talked of, would not be desirable to be talked of before the wife or children. He wants to get a talk with his friend or his relative, and Sunday is especially his leisure day. It is also the leisure day of his fellow-workmen and his friends and his relatives; and the public-house is to him a sort of news-room and a study, and a place where he can get the most pleasure out of his spare time.

6790. Can you tell me whether there is any large number of persons at Sheffield who go out walking on the Sunday to the little villages around?—A great many of the population of Sheffield have been born in the villages around. The town is ugly and smoky, and the country is exceedingly beautiful about, and they pour out on foot, and by railway, and in vehicles in very great numbers. I live myself between three and four miles from the town, and, being a dissenter, I walk about fifty Sundays out of the fifty-two to Sheffield, to my own chapel, and I meet them as I go, and the numbers are very largely composed of the working classes, with some of a higher class.

6791. Would it be any inconvenience to those people who thus want to have their associations with their own class and with their own friends, to be enabled to find either on their way there, or on their way back, any means of getting a glass of beer?—Most certainly, unless they were teetotallers.

6792. Taking all your means of forming your opinion as a magistrate and an inhabitant of that town town, is it your opinion that the working classes would be in favour of a Bill that imposed those further restrictions upon what is called Sunday trading in liquor?—Most certainly the majority of the working people in Sheffield would be very much opposed to it.

6793. Mr. Horsfall.] Are you a magistrate of Sheffield now?—Yes, for the borough of Sheffield.

6794. And you have, as a magistrate, the means of ascertaining what you have stated, the diminution in the cases of drunkenness?—I have reports from the chief constable annually, and my own experience of cases brought before me goes in the same direction.

6795. Have you a stipendiary magistrate at Sheffield?—No.

6796. Then you act as a magistrate?—Yes; we have a clerk.

6797. The number of cases brought before you, according to your statement, have diminished one half during the last few years?—No, I do not say brought before me, but brought before the Sheffield Bench during the last nineteen years.

6798. Mr. Evans.] To what cause do you attribute the diminution of drunkenness in Sheffield?—The people read more books, and newspapers are cheaper. I think they get better wages in the main. They live in rather better houses, and the streets are kept more sweet and clean, and I think that the home and its surroundings are, on the whole, improved.

6799. Do you think that on the whole high wages have a tendency to produce sobriety, or the contrary?—I think high wages, if steady, tend to the sobriety of the working classes in the majority of cases; of course there are exceptions.

6800. In fact, you attribute the improvement very much to the spread of education?—To the spread of education, and having a better and more comfortable dwelling.

6801. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Have your opinions undergone any great change with regard to the propriety of restriction on Sunday drinking?—No, it was never brought very much under my consideration until the meeting which I referred to, which was held about the Act of Colonel Wilson Patten.

6802. Did you not entertain opinions in favour of restriction previously to that?—Until then I knew not much about the extent of drunkenness in the town. I then began to act as magistrate. For two years, as mayor and ex-mayor, and since then I have acted as magistrate for five or six years, and that has drawn my attention more to the evils of excess in drinking than before.

6803. How long have you been a member of the town council?—I should think about 20 years.

6804. Previously to 1852, were you in the town council?—I think so, but I have a very bad memory for dates.

6805. You cannot tell me whether you attended a meeting of the town council on the 13th of October 1852 (handing a paper to the Witness)?—I do not think that my memory will carry me back to speak with any confidence so far as that. I was mayor in 1854; this was a meeting in 1852; I think the mayor would very likely be Mr. Birks; I remember there being a report made to the town council on drunkenness in Sheffield, and I am sorry that I have not a copy of it with me.

6806. Perhaps you will have the goodness read the report which I have handed to you; is from your town clerk's office. There was meeting of the council on the 13th of October 1852, was there not?—Yes, it appears so from this; and this paper says, "It was resolved, that a committee consisting of Alderman Thomas Birks, and Councillors William Lawton, Isaac Ironside, Christopher Thompson, Charles Alcock, Thomas Turner, Nicholas Robert Holman, and George Lemon Saunders be, and is hereby appointed to inquire into the cause of the apparent excess of drunkenness in this borough; also to consider the best means for ensuring its decrease."

6807. In consequence of that did the committee make a report (handing another paper to the Witness)?—Yes, this was the report: "Your committee have also paid great attention to the effects arising from keeping public-houses open on the Sunday, their attention being particularly drawn to this point from the fact of the greater number of drunken persons being brought before the magistrates on the Monday. Mr. Raynor, (he was the chief constable of police), "stated it as his opinion, 'That it would be a great improvement if the public-houses and beerhouses were closed during the whole of Sunday, except for about an hour in the middle of the day.' I certainly does appear a strange anomaly that the places should be open for the sale of intoxicating drinks on the Sunday, while shops for the sale of the various useful and necessary articles of life are required to be strictly closed. It is quite necessary that travellers should be able to find refreshment and rest, but it can be neither necessary or wise that public-houses and beer shops should be open during the Sunday to the extent they are at present; and though your committee are not prepared to recommend that they should be closed during the whole of Sunday, they are of opinion that the sale of intoxicating drinks should not be permitted therein except to travellers, and they feel satisfied from what they have heard that most of the respectable publicans would be glad to concur in such a resolution."

6808. That report was presented to the town council?—Yes, it was presented to the town council.

6809. And accepted unanimously?—I have no recollection. I should think not.

6810. If I tell you that it was accepted unanimously, are you in a position to contradict it?—No, I am not.

6811. Were you present when it was so accepted?—I cannot recollect that.

6812. Will you refer to the list of those who were present on the other page of the paper which I have handed to you, and tell me whether you see your own name there?—This was a meeting on the 12th of January 1853. I was present then.

6813. Did you make any opposition to the acceptance of that report?—I do not recollect that I did.

6814. Is that consistent with the opinions which you have just expressed?—I do not see any inconsistency in them.

6815. Are you in favour of shutting up public-houses on Sunday except for travellers?—No, I am not.

6816. Why did you pass that resolution?—I suppose that resolutions are very often passed, being being accepted as the report of a body who have considered the question; not that every one who does not hold up his hand against a resolution is supposed to concur in the whole of it.

6817. You do not consider the opinions in that report contradictory to those which you have just expressed to Mr. Roebuck?—Will you be so good as to say what is the opinion you refer to.

6818. That you are entirely against any further restriction?—Decidedly.

6819. You see that report is very much in favour of further restriction?—That report of the committee was in favour of restriction.

6820. And you were present and accepted it?—I do not think I concurred in it, although I might not have opposed it.

6821. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] Was any resolution passed adopting that report, or was it merely received as reports are?—I think it would be received and be directed to be printed, and probably without any positive expression of approbation or disapprobation on the part of the general council.

6822. Chairman.] You do not remember accurately what was done about that report?—I do not; there has been nothing to call it to my memory since that time until just now.

6823. Mr. John Abel Smith.] But it is in complete contradiction to the opinions which you have expressed to-day?—To the opinions of that committee decidedly, or it was so at that time.

6824. That is what I ask; have your opinions undergone a great change?—Mine have not undergone any change; I am not to be supposed to have approved of it simply because it was passed at a meeting at which I was present without my proposing it.

6825. Are you connected with the brewing trade?—Not in any way.

6826. Is your father-in-law a brewer?—My father-in-law, when he lived, was a brewer; he has been dead many years.

6827. Your brothers-in-law were brewers afterwards, were they not?—They were brewers while they were alive; they are both dead; there is no member of my wife's family in any way connected with the brewing trade now.

6828. Personally you have never had anything to do with a brewery?—No.

6829. I think you were chairman of Mr. Roebuck's committee, were you not?—At the last election I was chairman, along with another gentleman, of the joint committee of Messrs. Roebuck and Hadfield.

6830. Were there not separate committees?—No, they were working together.

6831. There were two chairmen, were there not?—Yes, joint chairmen.

6832. Were you not peculiarly the chairman of Mr. Roebuck's committee?—Yes, I considered myself so.

6833. And the other gentleman was the chairman for Mr. Hadfield?—Yes, certainly.

6834. You state that the number of police in Sheffield has been largely increased?—Yes, the number of police has been largely increased, and largely increased also in proportion to the population; it has increased more rapidly than the population.

6835. Were you chairman of a meeting in 1854, to consider the working of Colonel Wilson Patten's Act?—I was chairman of a public meeting at that time.

6836. Do you know anything about the working of Colonel Wilson Patten's Act?—It closed the public-houses at 10 o'clock instead of 11.

6837. I meant its operation upon drunkenness and upon crime; do you know anything about that?—I merely know that drunkenness has decreased very largely and steadily since then; I forget the precise figures, but I have no doubt the chief constable has given this Committee a return of them, and, on a consideration of them, it will be found that there has been a steady decrease since the repeal of Colonel Wilson Patten's Act.

6838. Do you recognise this paper as being a paper from the authorities at Sheffield (handing a paper to the Witness)?—I should suppose that it came from the town clerk's office.

6839. Will you turn over to the other page and read the two headings?—"For the 6 months prior to the operation of the Act, and for the 6 months subsequent to the operation of the Act."

6840. Will you read the numbers respectively?—I see that this is a return of the number of cases brought before the magistrates for drunkenness, on each Sunday during the six months immediately prior to the operation of the late Act; and prior to the operation of the late Act, it was 90 males and 16 females, and for the six months subsequent to the operation of the Act, 25 males and 7 females.

6841. Have you any doubt that that is an accurate return?—I should have no doubt of it; I see that the Vicar of Sheffield has signed it as a correct statement. I know nothing further about it than that.

6842. If that is true, did not it show the very beneficial operation of the Act of 1854?—That is a matter of opinion.

6843. But you do not think so?—If the apprehensions were upon the same principle in each six months by the police, it would show a reduction on Sunday.

6844. Have you any doubt that they were upon the same system?—I have no reason to suppose it is not the same system; there has not been any change at any time within my recollection, in the system on which they apprehend them.

6845. The system being the same, and the number being officially given, do you not think that it shows that the operation of that Act was most beneficial?—It shows that there was less drunkenness during the one six months than during the other.

6846. And crime also?—I do not know; it merely refers to drunkenness.

6847. The persons brought up before the magistrates on Monday for misconduct on the Sunday, I presume, have been guilty of something or other which justifies the police in bringing them?—They may have been so drunk as to be unable to take care of themselves, or they may have been quarrelsome and committed crimes.

6848. Do not you think that the reduction in the number of persons brought before the magistrates on the Monday in Sheffield shows that there was less drunkenness and crime under the Act of 1854 than there was previously?—There was less drunkenness.

6849. Does not the number brought before the magistrates prove that there was a diminution in drunkenness and crime in Sheffield on the Sunday?—Yes, I admit that.

6850. Do you not think that that is beneficial?—Decidedly.

Mr.
Alderman
W. Fisher.

1868.

6851. Then you approve of the operation of that Act of 1854?—I said that I thought it reduced drunkenness, but I find that since 1854 there has been a great decrease in drunkenness, although the open hours are two more than they were during that short period.

6852. The first operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act you admit to have been beneficial?—It appears to have been so from that Report; I do not say that from my own knowledge.

6853. Do you believe it to have been so?—Yes, so far as Sunday drinking was concerned.

6854. And since that you state that the diminution has gone on increasing?—Yes; I am informed by the chief constable, and I find that it consists with my own experience, that the cases of drunkenness are very rare now on the Sunday.

6855. The numbers are very small on that paper at the end of six months under the operation of the Act of 1854, and if it has gone on gradually diminishing, it must be reduced almost to a minimum?—I should like it to be much more reduced.

6856. Then it is not very much reduced since 1854?—The figures have been presented to the Committee; it is impossible to account absolutely for the little fluctuations; there are considerable fluctuations in drunkenness; it will vary a little with the state of trade and the state of the weather. I find, on looking through the reports of the last 19 years, that the reduction in drunkenness has been considerable almost every year, but occasionally there has been a little falling back, and there has been a little more drunkenness from causes which, no doubt, I could have defined at the time, but I cannot now.

6857. I do not in the least wish to overstate your opinions, but I understood you to have made a statement that your opinions, as expressed to Mr. Roebuck, are directly opposed to the opinions expressed in that resolution?—I think it is quite a different question as to whether I shall deprive a man who wants to make a proper and sober use of a tavern for the sake of the few who will go into excess. I do not think it is reasonable that I should do so, even if it abates drunkenness.

6858. Even if it abates drunkenness, you do not think yourself entitled to interfere with the convenience of those who want to drink?—No; that is my opinion, because some people want to drink properly. Nine out of 10, I hope; and I would not keep them thirsty for the sake of the one who would go to excess.

6859. You do not think that drinking moderately leads to drinking to excess?—I do not find it so in my own class, and in my own experience.

6860. And you do not believe that to be so amongst the labouring classes?—I think not.

6861. With regard to the opinions and feelings and wishes of the labouring classes in Sheffield, have you ever heard of a canvass of workshops which has been lately made?—I saw a return lately in the newspaper, I think, which professed to be a canvass at the different establishments in the town.

6862. Were those representative establishments?—I really cannot speak about that.

6863. Your own was not canvassed, I suppose? No.

6864. On account of your known hostility, perhaps?—I am not aware that my hostility is so known.

6865. At all events, it was not canvassed?—I never heard of it; it might have been so.

6866. Have you ever heard any exception taken to the fairness and honesty of that canvass?—I have not heard it spoken of; not to my memory.

6867. You have never heard any imputation upon it?—I have no reason to suppose that it was done otherwise than as canvasses are generally done. I have no experience of how petitions are got up; but I take it that if any one of good address asks a working man to sign a petition, unless he has a strong feeling against it, he will sign.

6868. How many men do you employ?—Only 25 or 30. Our business is chiefly dealing with raw material; not manufacturing so much.

6869. What is your business?—Supplying the raw materials for the cutlery manufacture; hard wood, deer horns, and a great many materials that are used for knife handles, and so on.

6870. As a magistrate, do you at all know the number of persons who frequent public-houses in Sheffield on the Sunday?—I can only judge from the little which comes before me. I never frequent the houses myself; but I believe many working men go there in the evening, whilst the wife is putting the children to bed; and they sit and chat, and smoke and drink, with their friends and neighbours, not generally abusing it.

6871. Have not the police made a calculation of the number who go there on a Sunday?—I am not aware of any such calculation.

6872. If you heard that there were 25,000 persons frequenting the public-houses on each Sunday, should you think that excessive?—I think, considering the circumstances of the working men, it would not be an extravagant number.

6873. Are there many women and young people who go to the public-house on Sunday?—I think not; that is my impression.

6874. Is drunkenness amongst women on the increase in Sheffield?—I have seen no symptoms of it, although I am accustomed to walk pretty much up and down the town, of course, as a man of business. There are occasionally cases of drunkenness amongst women which come before me.

6875. Have you any particular connection with the publicans at Sheffield?—No; I am not acquainted with any of them scarcely, except just by sight.

6876. Was there not some public meeting in honour of Mr. Roebuck at which you presided?—I do not remember; there may have been. I do not know any publican in the town with whom I should shake hands if I met him. I may know, perhaps, three or four who have called upon me to ask me to be a patron of a licensed victuallers' hall, or something of that kind.

6877. The publicans in Sheffield, as a body, are very favourable to Mr. Roebuck, are they not?—I should think so; they ought to be, I think.

6878. Do not you know them to be so?—I can hardly speak to that. I suppose they follow the views of their customers, some of them.

6879. Mr. Baines.] Is Mr. Webster the mayor of Sheffield?—Yes, Mr. John Webster is.

6880. Are you aware that he has signed a memorial to the Earl of Derby, praying that the support of the Government may be given to this Bill?—I do not know that; I have not heard it; it may be so; he is a gentleman of very independent opinions.

6881. Is Mr. Greenwood the chairman of the West

West Riding of Yorkshire quarter sessions?—Yes, I believe so.

6882. Are you aware that he has signed the same memorial?—No, I am not; I never heard of the memorial.

6883. Mr. Locke.] With regard to this report which was brought to the town council by the committee, was any action taken upon it?—I cannot recollect that any action was taken. I fancy that it would merely be printed and entered on the minutes of the council's proceedings.

6884. Then if you were present at the particular moment when it was brought in, you did like the rest of them, you received it?—It was also considered a courteous matter not to send back a report.

6885. In fact, when the town council, or any other body appoint a committee to report upon any subject, they receive the report the same way as is done in the House of Commons; it lies on the table until it is printed, and there must be something very obnoxious for it not to be received?—Yes.

6886. Are you aware whether any action was taken upon it by the town council?—I have no recollection. My impression would be that no action was taken upon it.

6887. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Is not this not only received, but adopted by the town council at which you were present?—I fancy that that would be almost a matter of course.

6888. Mr. Locke.] What is the meaning of the word "adopted;" is it that it should lie on the table?—It is almost as a matter of course adopted as the report of any committee of the council.

6889. Does "adopt" mean "receive," or what does "adopt" mean?—The general phrase is that the report be received and adopted. I do not know whether it is in that particular case.

6890. Adopted as the report of that committee, or what?—The committee presented a report, which was adopted by the town council, and it would be entered upon the minutes of the town council's proceeding as the opinion of that committee; that would be the end of it, I have no doubt.

6891. That is the meaning of the word "adopted"?—Yes.

6892. Mr. John Abel Smith.] In your experience, have you not known any reports sent back to Committees?—I cannot say that I have.

6893. Do you never recollect one?—I should not like to say that there had not been one.

6894. Mr. Roebuck.] Do you know the mode of receiving reports in the House of Commons at all?—I do not.

6895. You do not know that the Chairman of the Committee, when we have done our duty here, will take the report, and stand at the bottom of the House, and say, "Report, Sir," and it is brought up, and then it is immediately laid upon the table, and printed and circulated?—I never was in the House but once, and there was nothing of that kind happened.

6896. Mr. Locke.] There was no action taken upon this report?—No action, I believe.

6897. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] If the adoption of that report meant that the council approved of it, would not some action have been taken upon it?—I think some petition would have been prepared, or some more permanent committee would have been appointed.

6898. Have you ever known reports presented to the town council, and adopted by them, upon which action has been taken?—Certainly; frequently.

6899. And did not that action express an active adoption, that is to say, that they adopted the opinion in the report?—Yes; occasionally a report will be on a matter which brings about action, but I find in this nothing but the expression of opinion of a certain committee after making some inquiries.

6900. And the absence of subsequent action would prove that the town council did not think the matter of such moment as to proceed any further?—I think so.

The Reverend GEORGE MOLLETT MURPHY, called in; and further Examined.

6901. Chairman.] I WILL read to you answers which were given by Mr. Winterbotham on the 8th of June, and which especially refer to your evidence. In Question 6577, Mr. Winterbotham was asked by the Honourable Member for Southwark, "Have you anything to say with regard to the returns from the workshops, which were mentioned by Mr. Murphy," and he replied "Yes;" and afterwards, he says, "In the first place there is Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin, they employ 430 men and 70 women; and I have the authority of the gentlemen in the counting-house, and several of the workmen, for saying that no such canvass took place." I will also refer you to what you said on that point; at Question 5433 you say, "We had a workshop canvass at Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin's; Price & Co.'s Candle Works; Cockerell & Co., coal merchants; Doulton & Co., Lambeth; at Braby & Co.'s, Limited; at Messrs. Peek, Frean, & Co.'s, Biscuit Works, and so on; and the result of that canvass showed 384 workmen in favour of entire closing, 214 against, and 59 were neutral." You having stated that the result of the canvass at those houses was, as you there mention, Mr.

Winterbotham states, "In the first place, there is Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin, they employ 430 men and 70 women, and I have the authority of the gentlemen in the counting-house, and several of the workmen, for saying that no such canvass took place. The next firm mentioned is that of Price & Co., Candle Works, Battersea; they employ about 350 men, besides boys and girls; no canvass whatever has taken place at this establishment; in fact, no one would be allowed on the premises. Then comes Cockerell & Co., coal merchants, who employ 17 men. I have the authority of Mr. Cockerell for saying, that not a single man in the Abingdon wharf is a teetotaller, and that it is not likely any of his men could have signed in favour of closing on Sundays. Then he mentioned Doulton & Co., Lambeth. Inquiries have been made at the counting-house and in the different yards, and not a single man has been canvassed, though there were 14 men on the establishment out of 240 who are total abstainers. The next is Braby & Co., slate merchants, Bangor Wharf, Belvedere-road, Lambeth, who employ 60 men. Mr. Braby made the inquiry himself himself of the men in the yard as to whether they have been canvassed or not, and the answer was, that they had not been. The only way in which he could account for such a statement was, that his under foreman, a teetotaler, was a friend of Mr. Jabez West. The next firm is that of Messrs. Peek, Frean, & Co., biscuit bakers, Dockhead, who employ 600 men and boys. Mr. Colborne, the engineer, said that no canvass whatever had taken place on their establishment, or else he must have heard of it. Between 40 and 50 of the men themselves were asked the question, and they knew nothing whatever about it. The next is Messrs. Broadwood's piano manufactory, Horseferry-road. I have the authority of the foreman for stating that a paper was left on the establishment for signature, but that every one of the men who signed, signed "No," the question on the paper being, "Are you in favour of closing public-houses and beershops during the whole 24 hours on Sunday." The next is the Phoenix Gasworks, who employ about 700 men. Inquiries were made at the counting-house, and also of the men, with regard to the truth of the canvassing, and not a soul in the place had heard of it. In fact, they said it was highly improbable that men who have to work in such heat, and who have been accustomed to drink their beer, would sign to deprive themselves of the privilege of having a glass of beer when they wanted, for they work quite as hard on Sunday as on any other day. I hardly know what 'steamboats on the river Thames' applies to, but there are at least 500 men employed on the Iron and Citizen steamboats, and the Woolwich and excursion boats; Messrs. Gibbs, the leather dressers, could not be found. The next is Messrs. Olney's. Mr. Olney, jun., says that Jabez West knows several of the men in the yard, but that he did not believe any canvass had been made. He could only say that himself and his father had not been asked the question; they employ from 25 to 30 men. The next is Oastler and Palmer, and not Horster, as printed in Question 5433; they employ 300 men, and no canvass whatever has been made. The next is Messrs. Hepburn, and not Hebron, leather dressers; I have the authority of the foreman for saying that no canvass whatever has been made on their establishment. The last is Messrs. Corderoy, fellmongers. The men were asked the question whether any canvass had been made, and they all denied the truth of such a statement, and at the same time declared that if any such canvass had been made it was more than probable that they would have signed for keeping the houses open. The Committee will see that instead of there being 657 men employed, as the Reverend Mr. Murphy would make it appear at Question 5433, there are 3,817 men employed. I do not think it is necessary for me to say another word with regard to this matter." I will put this in your hand, and you can say what you like in explanation?—I should like first to state with regard to the house to house canvass, which was very strongly objected against by Mr. Winterbotham, that I have the signatures of each of the householders here, for the inspection of any honourable Member of the Committee; they are all in streets according to the number of houses. That was made a very strong point of by Mr. Winterbotham, and about a dozen different times it was authoritatively, as it appeared to me, contradicted by Mr. Winterbotham. We have here the names of the persons signing, which I should be very glad to leave with the Committee; they are all according to the numbers, and they will not take 10 minutes to look through. With regard to Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin, I hold in my hand a letter from Mr. Henry Jeffery, one of the leading hands and official cashier to Messrs. Cassell and Co., and it is written officially: "La Belle Sauvage Yard, Ludgate-hill, E.C., London, 11th June, 1868." The inquiry was made by the Rev. Dawson Burns, and the letter was written to Mr. Burns: "Dear Sir,—In reply to your inquiry I beg to inform you that the canvass of the workmen in this establishment with regard to the total closing of public-houses on Sunday was made through all the departments at my instigation. The schedules were handed round on one day, and collected on the following morning. I then forwarded them by a messenger to your office. Although those in favour of the total closing of public-houses on Sunday, appear to be in a minority in this concern, I believe the majority are favourable to further restriction of the Sunday traffic, such as that proposed in Mr. Abel Smith's Bill; having been principal manager of the firm of Cassell, Petter, and Galpin for many years, my testimony upon this point may be considered of some weight.—I am, dear Sir, yours truly, Henry Jeffery." I should like to say, also, before going further, that Mr. Winterbotham, I suppose, kindly in consideration of my feelings, struck out of the report some very strong expressions; I should not have been in order in objecting to that then, but I certainly personally should have rather preferred that the report had given the strong expressions as they were; with regard to Price & Co., Mr. Jabez West, who, as I stated, made the canvass, and who is well-known to the honourable Member for Southwark, went on a Monday to see the manager; he was not in, but the time-keeper allowed him to stand in the lobby to distribute the papers, and he called the next day at dinner time, and collected them, in the same manner, and those papers are here as signed by the men. I may say here, also, in the case of Price & Co., as in the case of various other persons mentioned, there are different establishments, the whole of those establishments were not canvassed, but simply those portions which were, as in this instance, in the South of London; as to Messrs. Cockerell & Co., Mr. West says that he went down to the wharf and saw John Howlett, their weigher, and gave the papers to the men in their dining-room on the wharf, when they signed, and that the masters were not consulted at all, it not being necessary on a public coal wharf, and I have the papers here. With regard to Doulton & Co., Mr. Jabez West visited them, and asked Mr. Bryon, the foreman, if the canvass would be allowed; he (Mr. Bryon) undertook to deliver the papers, and desired Mr. West to call on Friday for them, which he did; those papers have been received signed, some for and some against, and they are here. Mr. Jabez West went to Braby & Co., (not slate works, but zinc works), in the Euston-road, and saw Mr. Dibley, the managing director, who took the papers, and gave him a note to their works at Deptford; Mr. Dibley undertook his own shop, and collected the papers, and Mr. Jabez West collected them at Deptford; those papers are signed, and they are here before the Committee on the table. The next is Peek, Frean & Co's. biscuit establishment; they have several establishments, establishments, but this alludes to the one at Deptford; Mr. West says that he saw one of the workmen, Mr. Mackenzie, at Dockhead, who thought there would be an objection to a shop canvass; but one of the workmen came to Mr. West's house to fetch the papers, and Mr. West fetched them from his house; he says that he does not know the name of the person who fetched them, but he believes that he lives at 10, Jamaica-row, Bermondsey. With regard to Broadwood's piano factory, Horseferry-road, he says, he saw a gentleman there who took the papers, and undertook to get them filled up and signed afterwards; Mr. West called for them, and they were left in the lobby for him, and those were all against; and the papers are here before me. The Phoenix Gas Works have several works, and gas preparing premises in the South of London, and the portion visited by Mr. West was, that at Bankside, on the other side of the river, where 100 men are employed; the establishment of the Phoenix Gas Works extend from Vauxhall right down to Greenwich, and they have different places where they make the gas, but only one establishment was visited, and that was the one at Bankside. Mr. Jabez West says that they have several departments; at the Bankside department he saw Mr. Rowe, the foreman, who took the papers and distributed them. Mr. West called for them at his office, and Mr. Rowe said that the men were very indifferent about the matter; there was an error in the words "steam-boats," it should have been "steam-boat;" there was but one boat visited, the "Holland," which trades between London and Ostend; I am very sorry that that error should have crept in. Mr. West saw Mr. Lepper, one of the men; he said that they were very busy, but he would get the papers filled up by the next day, and they were returned, and they are here before me. Messrs. Gibbs, the leather-dresser's establishment, which it is said by Mr. Winterbotham, could not be found, is exactly opposite Messrs. Hepburn's, and it will be found in Long-lane. Mr. West there saw Mr. Kerns, the foreman, who said that no stranger was allowed on the premises; but they allowed Mr. West in, and he left the papers on the Tuesday, and called for them on the following Friday, and the papers are here. With regard to Messrs. Olney, Mr. West had been employed there for many years. He obtained leave from Messrs. Olney on purpose to carry out this canvass on his own application. They granted him the leave, and Mr. West, being known to the firm, canvassed the works himself by visiting the workshops, and the papers are here. In Messrs. Oastler and Palmer's case Mr. West there saw Mr. Reed, who is a cutter-out, and he thought that there would be an objection to going through the works; but Mr. West stood at the gate, and gave out the papers in the dinner hour, and collected them on the next day. The papers from Oastler and Palmers also are here before the Committee. At Messrs. Hepburn's, Mr. West saw the foreman, who asked one of the Messrs. Hepburns', who objected to his going among the men, and Mr. West, as in the other cases, stood at the gate and gave the papers out one day, receiving them on the following day. Then the Messrs. Corderoy's, Mr. Winterbotham has made a very strong case of. Mr. West, who made the canvass, was employed some years ago for Messrs. Corderoy, and, knowing them personally, he saw Mr. Francis and Mr. Edward Corderoy on the works, who asked him his business, and they allowed him to go in among the men, and he left the papers, and the day after he saw Mr. John Corderoy, and Mr. William Corderoy, of the other firm of the same name, who gave him the same permission. All those papers are here. Those, I believe, are all the cases which have been mentioned.

6902. Are the papers which are before you those upon which you made your former statement to this Committee?—They are.

6903. You took them upon the responsibility of Mr. Jabez West?—Yes; as I stated to Mr. Locke.

6904. Believing that his statements were worthy of credit?—I am quite sure that he is perfectly reliable, and Mr. Jabez West is here. I should like to make a statement in my own justification with regard to the house-to-house canvass, the papers of which are here.

6905. Have you read the answer to Question 6574, at the sitting of the 8th of June?—Yes.

6906. In many points the report with reference to the street canvass was impugned, I think?—Yes, and I would simply state to the Committee not to waste its time, that in our canvass the papers were left almost invariably for three clear days at the house, the canvassers having no right, nor did they exercise the right of giving an opinion either one way or the other; and at the end of the third day the papers were fetched, some refused to sign at all, others expressed their neutrality, others said that they were in favour, and others that they were against; but every one of those signatures on refused papers is here on the table before me, and I shall have very great pleasure in submitting them to the scrutiny of any person appointed by the Committee. I may say, also, if the Committee will allow me, that there is no doubt of a canvass having been made on behalf of the Licensed Victuallers' Protection Society, but it was made without any such returns as these; it was made simply by vivâ voce interview, at the doors of the persons, there the individuals who made that canvass did not allow the persons to sign themselves, but asking their opinions, sometimes questioning them, and in one instance, which I can prove, stating that they came from the Committee to get the evidence, and then they put down in the book, yes, or no; but the people themselves had no hand in the matter.

6907. How do you know that?—By the evidence of persons whom I have visited since in the different streets, and especially by one person who has been referred to, namely, Mr. Hunter, who was referred to by Mr. Winterbotham, as having made the canvass of Sidwell Place, Broad-wall.

6908. Has Mr. Hunter told you that that was the way in which he made the canvass?—No, Mr. Hunter made the previous canvass. He is a working man.

6909. How do you know that that was the manner in which the Licensed Victuallers' canvass was made?—From the evidence of Mr. Hunter, and statements of persons in each of the streets which I have visited where the canvass has been made.

6910. Can you give the names of the people?—Mr. Hunter, who made the canvass of Sidwell-place, has been already referred to here, and he is willing to give up a day's work, if the Committee wish it, to come and verify his statement, as it has been impugned before the Committee. Mr. Alexander Forbes, one of the bookbinders at Messrs. Spottiswoode's, who quite voluntarily undertook the canvass of Wooton-street, and lives at 32, King-street, is also quite willing to give up his day's work and come and give evidence to this Committee, doing that as voluntarily as he did the other. Mr. J. Naggington, a man who was wounded in the battle of the Alma, an old guardsman, and now timekeeper in a very large firm, also gave up a day's work for the purpose, and he is willing to come here and give evidence as to the manner in which that canvass was conducted. Those men worked voluntarily, and I am sure they had no intention to deceive the Committee, and if they had I should not have shared in the movement.

6911. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Was Mr. Hunter present when the licensed victuallers' canvass of Sidwell-place took place?—Yes, he was.

6912. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] It was Mr. Hunter who made the observation when the matter was pointed out to him, that the men were rounding, that is to say, that the men who were formerly for closing are now against it?—When he was told that the people were opposed to the Bill, he said that they had turned round, but at the same time he made the man who made the second canvass erase the name of some lodgers whom he had taken down as householders, calling the lodgers down to the man's face, in order to make him erase the names which he had put in surreptitiously.

6913. Do you dispute the accuracy of the return handed in by Mr. Winterbotham, which states that you had very much understated, or that those who had informed you had very much understated the number of houses in the different streets?—My best answer to that is, that we have here the signatures of the householders for the Committee to examine.

6914. You may have the signatures of 20 in a street of 30, and only account for 20; my question went to this: do you dispute the accuracy of the statement, which says that in certain streets where there are 20, 30, or 40 houses, your returns only account for a less number?—For this reason, that I did not give in to the Committee those houses where the returns were refused, as they were in some cases. I can give the Committee those facts if they like, of the number of houses that refused the return. The Committee are aware that in London a great many people come round selling books and tracts, which they leave one day and call for the next; and as our men would not enter into a dispute, or any question about it, but would just leave the paper, some of the people would say, "We do not want anything," and at once shut the door and go away, and in some cases the people would not be at home.

6915. Mr. Locke.] Those are only the returns from certain houses?—They contain the whole of the houses in the streets where the inhabitants signed the papers.

6916. Have you signatures from all the houses?—Yes, with those exceptions which I have referred to.

6917. Those papers represent the houses from which you got answers?—Yes; but if all the householders had signed or given authority for their signature to the licensed victuallers' agent that would not make up the difference, or anything like what has been presented to the Committee.

6918. What difference do you allude to precisely?—I am speaking of the difference in the returns; for instance, in Wooton-street, I think our return is thoroughly reversed. I gave the Committee the fact of there being 34 in favour of total closing, 17 against, and 7 neutral; and in Wooton-street there were nine houses where they would not receive the papers. Of course where the papers are inscribed, "no return," I had no right to claim them as being on our side, and they have no right to say that they were against us, simply because they would not express an opinion either way.

6919. I think that Mr. Winterbotham's objection was, that you stated that there were only so many houses in the different streets?—I did not make that statement in my evidence.

6920. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] You did not state that there were only that number of houses in the different streets, but by only mentioning a certain number, you left us to infer that you had given us an account of the whole street?—I took advice, and I thought that I would not cumber the evidence with figures. I had them in the return, which I handed in, and here is a column for the "no returns" (handing a paper to the Committee), as the honourable Member can see; no returns, are in the fourth column.

6921. Mr. Locke.] I understood you to say that there were so many houses in such a street, and so many houses in another street, and I think Mr. Winterbotham's answer was that Mr. Murphy had misrepresented the number of houses that there were in those different streets, and that they had only gone to a few of them?—I have read the evidence carefully, and I do not understand anything Mr. Winterbotham said in that way.

6922. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] Take for instance this paper, which you have handed in to me, it gives a summary of the canvass of one locality, and it says Yes, 310; No, 154; Neutral, 50; and No, return 151; but inasmuch as it was not stated in answer to the question that there were 151 who made no return, the Committee fell into the error naturally enough, and they thought that Mr. Murphy had, in stating the lesser number, intended to convey that those were the whole of the houses?—I did not mention the total, simply because I did not mention the details.

Mr. JABEZ WEST, called in; and Examined.

Mr.
J. West.

6923. Chairman.] You have heard the questions which have just been asked of Mr. Murphy with reference to the canvass which you made of certain workshops, and you have heard that Mr. Winterbotham stated that your returns were not correct, and mentioned that many of those places had not, in fact, been canvassed at all. Mr. Murphy has given in your papers upon which his statements have been based, and I had better ask you whether you have anything to add to the explanation which he has given?—I did not canvass the employers, because I did not believe it is an employers' question. I believed that it was a question of the employed. The working men of Bermondsey act and think for themselves; they do not allow their masters to act and think for them. Therefore, when I know that I can have permission to go into a workshop, I take the liberty of going into the workshop. I did not tell young Mr. Corderoy, because I had worked with them for 15 years; therefore, I did not ask for permission.

6924. Take the case of Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin; Mr. Winterbotham says that he had come from the authority of a gentleman in their printing-house, and several of their workmen, saying that no such canvass took place; what answer have you to make to that?—I went and saw Mr. Jeffery, the cashier, and asked him if he might be allowed to go through the workshop, and he said No, he would undertake it himself. I went and fetched 400 canvass papers, and left them with Mr. Jeffery, and I called for them on the following day, when he informed me that he had sent them up to Mr. Dawson Burns.

6925. Is it possible that some workmen might not have seen them, but you took them and they were sent back to you?—Yes, I took them and they were sent back to me; I gave them to Mr. Jeffery.

6926. Mr. Locke.] Is Mr. Jeffery a teetotalter?—I do not know whether he is or not.

6927. However, he is a friend of yours?—I never saw Mr. Jeffery before that day; I have seen him once or twice since.

6928. Why did you entrust them to Mr. Jeffery?—Because he was the cashier; and he did not allow me to go over the premises.

6929. Mr. Roebuck.] How did you ascertain the number of men in the workshop?—I did not ascertain the number of men.

6930. You do not know what relation this return bears to the whole number of men?—No; I do not know how many men they employ there.

6931. Chairman.] You took the return as it was sent back to you?—They sent them back to Mr. Dawson Burns; I went for them, and Mr. Jeffery said he had sent them.

6932. Mr. Winterbotham states that at "Price & Co.'s Candle Works, Battersea, they employ about 350 men, besides boys and girls. No canvass whatever has taken place at this establishment;" how do you explain that?—I went on a Monday and asked one of the parties whether I could go in; they said no, but that I might be allowed to stand in the lobby, and as the men came out to dinner I gave them each one of the papers, and asked them if they would read it, and take it home and fill it up, and that I would call for it on the next day; I did so. I went on the next day and stood there as they went in from their dinner, and collected them back again.

6933. Mr. Roebuck.] But in no case do you know the exact number of workmen employed?—No; I never made that inquiry.

6934. Mr. Evans.] In fact, you gave a paper to all that you saw?—To all the men that came out.

6935. Chairman.] What do you say about Cockerell & Company?—I did not go into their office; I went to their weigher, John Howlett; everybody has access to their coal wharf. Where the men take their meals in their dining-room, I went into them, and I said, "Look here, I am canvassing the workshops;" I never used any influence in any way whatever.

I said, "Will you read this?" and then one read the paper out and said, "Have you got the papers with you?" I then gave them the papers, and they filled them up there and then, and I brought them away with me the same day that I visited them.

6936. Mr. Roebuck.] Do you know whether anything like the whole body signed?—They were only the men that I saw there at work.

6937. Chairman.] Might this be a different establishment of Messrs Cockerell?—This one is at Earl-street, Blackfriars.

6938. Then there is Brady & Company; what have you to say about them?—That is the corrugated iron works in Euston-road; I went there on Thursday and saw Mr. Dibley, their manager.

6939. Those are zinc merchants, are they?—Yes.

6940. Then if this relates to slate merchants it may be a different concern?—Yes.

6941. What is Messrs. Brady's address?—I do not know the number; it is just by Euston-road.

6942. Then it is a mistake; if Mr. Winterbotham referred to a slate merchant's in Lambeth it would be a different house altogether?—Yes; a different house.

6943. Then Peak, Frean & Co., Dockhead, what have you to say about them?—I went and asked there of the foreman, Mr. Mackenzie, and he said that there would be an objection to my going into the works; but he sent one of the men to my house, No. 2, St. James's-terrace, and asked me for papers to take into their biscuit factory at Dockhead; and he said that he would get them filled up and attend to them himself. I went down to his house afterwards and fetched them from his house, No. 10, Jamaica-row.

6944. Messrs. Broadwood's, piano manufactory, what happened there?—I saw them in their dinner time; I saw Mr. Price, I think his name was, and I asked him if I could go in, and he said, "No; you would not be allowed to go in." He was at the door at the time; I told him what I was upon; that I had got some canvass papers; that we wanted to try the sense of the working men, whether they were in favour of closing public-houses altogether. I handed him the papers, and he said, "I will attend to them; you call here on Friday, and I will leave them in the lobby with the gatekeeper." I called on the Friday and received them.

6945. They were all "No," were they?—Yes, they were all "No."

6946. The next case is the Phoenix Gas Works; which of the works of the Phoenix Gas Company did you visit?—It was the place by the River Thames, at Bankside.

6947. Mr. Locke.] Did you go in there?—Yes, I went there, and I saw Mr. Rowarth, and asked if I might go in. He went in with me, into a room where they were having their dinner, and they were drinking water and a little oatmeal sprinkled upon it.

6948. Did you speak to the men there?—I told them that I brought some papers for their approval, either for or against the closing of public-houses on Sunday. Mr. Rowarth, the foreman, said "You will not be able to see many of them; leave them with me, and you call again on Friday, and I will get them filled up." I called again on Friday and brought the papers away.

6949. Chairman.] Then as to Messrs. Olney's?
—They are my present employers.

6950. Then Oastler & Palmer; what have you to say to them?—If Mr. Winterbotham asked Mr. Oastler, he is a young man about 17, and he has very little to do with the business. I should not think of asking him about canvassing the workmen. I did call at the works, and I gave them to the men at breakfast time, and they took them home.

6951. How about Messrs. Hepburn?—I saw the foreman, Mr. Sharpley, and asked if I might go into the factory.

6952. What did the foreman say?—He said, "I cannot give you permission to go in; but I will go in and see Mr. Hepburn." He went in and saw Mr. Hepburn; and Mr. Hepburn said that he objected to my going in, but I might stand at the gate or in the lobby, and give them to the men as they came out to their dinner.

6953. A foreman might say that no canvass had taken place, but still he would not know whether you had seen the men outside or not?—There are a dozen foremen in such factories as that. I asked the yard foreman, because he was the one that sees the men.

6954. Did you canvass Messrs. Corderoy, the fellmongers?—Yes, I went and saw both the Mr. Corderoys.

6955. If it was thought necessary by the Committee, could you bring somebody from every one of those houses to prove that you were there and did canvass them?—Yes; young Mr. Corderoy would come himself.

6956. Mr. Locke.] How about Oastler & Palmer's?—I took them as I took Mr. Hepburn's because I could not get permission to go in; they do not allow you to go into their place.

6957. Whom did you leave the papers with at Oastler & Palmer's?—I gave them to the men singly as they came out for their dinner. In a large workshop like that they do not like you to go in when they are at work.

6958. You do not know the number of men employed in any of those places?—No.

6959. Mr. Berkeley.] What was the name of the person whom you saw at Broadwood's?—I think his name was Price, but I will not be certain of the name.

6960. What was he?—I do not know what Mr. Price is; I do not know what part of the business he takes.

6961. Mr. Locke.] What was the name of the person at Oastler's that you spoke to?—Reed.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JOHN THEOPHILUS ROWLAND, called in; and Examined.

962. Mr. Locke.] WHAT are you?—I am engaged now by the Licensed Victuallers' Protection Society.

963. Have you been instrumental in obtaining the canvass which was put in by Mr. Winterbotham?—Yes, with the assistance of two other gentlemen who are now present.

964. What are their names?—Mr. Brook and Mr. Townsend.

965. Will you state to the Committee what the course which you pursued?—With regard to the house-to-house canvass we called at every house, asked to see the landlords of the houses; and we took down their answers, whether they were for closing on Sundays, against closing, or neutral.

966. What districts did you canvass?—First of all we canvassed the district of the New Cut, and Mr. Winterbotham read the report of that canvass to the Committee. I should like to state a few words with regard to the canvass made at Sidwell-street, that the Rev. Mr. Murphy was asked on Thursday last, at Question 6912: "It was Mr. Winterbotham that made the observation, when the matter was pointed out to him, that the men were rounding; that is to say, that the men who were formerly for closing are now against it?"—And the Answer is, "When he was told that the people were opposed to the Bill, he said that they had turned round, but at the same time he told me the man who made the second canvass gave me the names of some lodgers, whom he had called down as householders, calling the lodgers round to the man's face, in order to make him give the names which he had put in surreptitiously." We made a mistake with regard to the house.

967. What observation have you to make with regard to that?—"The man who made the second canvass" has reference to me, and it is not the case that some lodgers were called down: that has reference to one lodger, and that was at No. 3.

I had the name down, Thomas Pearman, and I read the names over to Mr. Hunter, and he said, "Thomas Pearman is not the landlord of the house No. 3, it is Mr. Charles Webb." I went over the way and ascertained that such was the fact, and I struck out the remark in his presence; that is, the remark which he had made to me, that he was against closing.

968. Did he say at first that he was against closing?—Mr. Webb I did not see, it was Mr. Pearman.

Mr. Pearman told me that he was the landlord of the house, and afterwards I ascertained from Mr. Hunter that he was not the landlord; and I went over and made the correction in Mr. Hunter's presence.

6969. What correction did you make?—I struck out Mr. Pearman's name and put Mr. Charles Webb's in; he was not in, and the return shows that I put him as not being at home in one of the returns which I delivered in.

6970. You struck out Mr. Pearman's name?—Yes; that is the only one that this has reference to.

6971. You say that it is not correct to state that there was more than one lodger that you had anything to say to in the way that Mr. Murphy stated?—Only one.

6973. Mr. Locke.] Is there any other observation that you would wish to make to the Committee?—With regard to the street canvass I had prepared a report for Mr. Winterbotham to read to the Committee last Thursday, but as he did not do so, with the permission of the Committee I will now read it, with regard to the streets in the borough. Since Mr. Winterbotham gave evidence before this Committee this day week, I have concluded the house-to-house canvass in the different streets mentioned in the borough at Questions 5427 and 5430. The Committee have already before them the result of the canvass in the neighbourhood of the New Cut. As on the last occasion I have detailed returns of each street, house, and householder's name, and every item can be most implicitly relied upon. According to the Rev. G. M. Murphy's canvass in Lombard street, he stated that there were six for closing, five against, and none neutral. Our returns show six against closing, six for closing, and five were not at home. In John-street, according to Mr. Murphy's statement, 12 were for closing, eight against, and three neutral. Our figures show 12 against closing, 11 for closing, three neutral, and five not at home. In Little Suffolk-street, Mr. Murphy's statement is, six for closing, six against, and two neutral. Our returns show 10 against closing, two for closing, once neutral and two not at home. With reference to the answer given by Mr. Murphy to the honourable Member for Chichester, that none but householders were canvassed, I think it right to draw the attention of the Committee to the fact that we were informed, by Mrs. Badham, at No. 5A, Little Suffolk-street, "Harry signed" (meaning the son) "for his father, but he is dead against closing." In King's-court, according to Mr. Murphy's statement, there were seven for closing, three against, and one neutral. Our figures show nine against, six for, one neutral, and eight were not at home. In Little Lant-street, Mr. Murphy's statement is, 21 for closing, one against, and none neutral. Our returns show seven against, eight for, one neutral, and four not at home. I may here state that there are only 21 houses in Little Lant-street, and therefore the remark so much made of on the other side, that none but householder were canvassed, is not correct. We were informed by Heron, at No. 5, Little Lant-street, "that the gentleman who called for the paper signed it himself."

6974. What gentleman?—The canvasser on the other side. At No. 6, Mr. Turner and two of his lodgers signed. At No. 9, we were informed by Mrs. Cooper and her son that Mr. Cooper, his two sons, and three lodgers signed (that is, six in one house). At No. 3, Miss Adams told us that herself, brother, and Ann Smith, the servant, signed; so that the remark with regard to the lodgers not having been canvassed is not correct. In Prince's-place, Mr. Murphy's report gives six for closing, none against, and three neutral. Our return shows seven against closing, five for closing, one neutral, and eight not at home. In Wellington-street, Mr. Murphy stated that 12 signed for closing, six against, and two neutral. Our return shows 15 against closing, 12 for closing, three neutral, and 10 not at home. In Wellington-place, Mr. Murphy's return is 14 for closing, 14 against, and none neutral. Our report shows 15 against, 11 for, three neutral, and 17 not at home. In William-street, Mr. Murphy stated that there were six for closing, seven against, and two neutral. Our returns show 17 against closing, five for closing, one neutral, and five not at home. In great Union-street, Mr. Murphy gives 19 for closing, six against, and three neutral. Our report shows 20 against closing, 12 for closing, three neutral, and eight not at home. In George-street, Mr. Murphy shows 12 for closing, 10 against, and six neutral. Our returns show seven against closing, 10 for closing, one neutral, and 11 not at home. In Lant-street, Mr. Murphy's statement gives 23 for closing, 10 against, and six neutral. Our report shows 25 against closing, 13 for, five neutral, and nine not at home. In Ann's-place, Mr. Murphy's report is two for closing, eight against, and none neutral. The corrected statement is nine against closing, none for it, three neutral, and one not at home. In Great Suffolk-street, Mr. Murphy shows 62 for closing, 28 against, and seven neutral. Our return is 35 against closing, 40 for closing, 11 neutral, and 23 not at home. At No. 104, we were informed by Mrs. Andrews that she signed for closing against her husband's wish. The total of the 20 different thoroughfares, as given by Mr. Murphy in questions 5427 and 5430, is 310 in favour of entire closing, 154 against, and 50 neutral. According to his own figures, if correctly added, the total against closing should be 174, and not 154. Our returns show the number to be 338 against closing, 218 for closing, 50 neutral, and 142 not at home.

There are altogether 748 houses in those 20 different thoroughfares, and Mr. Murphy has accounted for 514, making a difference of 234. If the Committee will allow me I will deliver the return to which that paper refers (handing the same).

6975. Have those returns been carefully checked by you?—Yes.

6976. With whom?—With the two gentlemen whom I mentioned before, Mr. Brookbank and Mr. Townsend.

6977. Before this you had been engaged, had you not, in a similar business of canvassing?—I have had a very large experience in railway matters, which is very similar to this sort of work preparing the books of reference, and getting the names of all owners, lessees, and occupiers who are to be served with notices. I have had the management of about 30 different lines, and never had an allegation against me before the Standing Orders Committee.

6978. Were you for 11 years with Messrs. Gurney, the Government shorthand writers?—Yes.

6979. In what capacity?—I was a shorthand writer and transcriber.

6980. Have you a further report as to the workshop canvass?—Yes; if the Committee will allow me, I will take each case separately, as mentioned at Question 5433, of Mr. Murphy's evidence, in answer to the honourable Member for Leeds. Last Saturday week I called at Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin, and I saw the gentlemen in the counting-house.

6981. Whom was it that you saw?—I did not ask their names, but I saw the same gentlemen again last Saturday; they were in the counting-house, there were four or five of them; I asked them whether there had been a workshop canvass and they said no, or else they must have heard something about it. I saw several men; it was in the dinner time; in fact, I believe they were being paid, and I asked them the same question and they said that they had not heard anything about it. Last Saturday I called there again and I saw Mr. Jeffery; Mr. Jeffery of course is a gentleman of the highest respectability, and he has been known for the last 25 years as a great advocate of teetotalism; I asked him the particulars, and he said that the forms were supplied to him by Mr. Jabez West, who asked permission to go over the workshops; Mr. Jeffery would not allow him to do so, but he took the forms from him, and gave them to the foreman. That does not disprove the statement which I made originally, that the men did not know anything about it, and the gentlemen in the counting-house did not know anything about it, because I asked them the same question on Saturday, and they said that they did not. When I told Mr. Jeffery of that, he said, "The gentlemen in the counting-house, it is true, did not know anything about it, so that you were misled." The next one is Price & Co.'s Candle Works. The gentleman who lives next door to me at Clapham is one of the principal clerks in that firm, and he has been there for the last 18 years; his name is Mr. Hazard; I asked him the particulars with regard to Price's, and he said that anybody who wanted to go over the establishment would have to apply to him for permission to do so.

6982. Did he say that anybody had applied to him?—He said that nobody had applied to him. The next one is Cockerell & Co.; I went to the principal principal firm, the one at Abingdon Wharf, and also saw Mr. Cockerell, at No. 41, Warwick-street, Pimlico.

6983. What is Mr. Cockerell?—He is a coal merchant; he said that there had been no canvass here; but since then inquiries have been made at Earl-street, and Mr. Howlett, the foreman, said that a canvass had been made; that there are usually from 12 to 13 employed, but that he could not say how many signed for or against, as the gang varies; Mr. Howlett is a teetotaler. The next is Doulton & Co., Lambeth; I called there last Saturday week, and I saw the gentlemen in the counting-house, and I also saw a number of the men; I should think I saw about 10 of them, and they said that they did not know anything at all about it; but it appears that Mr. Jabez West supplied the forms to a Mr. Bryan, who has been known to him for the last 15 years. Mr. Bryan is a great advocate of teetotalism. With regard to the workshop canvass, there has been no workshop canvass at this place of Messrs. Doulton's; it is true there has been a partial canvass, but not what I should call a workshop canvass; a workshop canvass I should call going to each man, and asking his opinion, not taking a few selected ones, the same as they have done in this case. Braby & Co.'s is at the extreme end of Euston-road, beyond Tottenham Court-road.

6984. What are they?—They are zinc works; I went to Braby's in Belvedere-road, the south of London being referred to as the workshop canvass having been made there.

6985. Have Braby & Co. an establishment in Belvedere-road?—Not the same Braby; they are slate works in the Belvedere-road. I do not know what caused Mr. Jabez West to go from Southwark right to the other end of the Euston-road, unless it was the fact, that the gentleman, the manager there, was known to be a great advocate of teetotalism.

6986. What is his name?—Dibley. There are several other zinc works in the Euston-road which were not canvassed at all, and of course that is to be accounted for by the fact that this gentleman was a friend of theirs, and they went there, I suppose, thinking that they could get more there than anywhere else; there is no doubt about that fact.

6987. How is it you know that Mr. Dibley is a teetotaler?—The clerk there, Mr. Havant, informed us.

6988. Mr. John Abel Smith.] What do you call a teetotaler?—A total abstainer. The next is Messrs. Peek, Frean, & Company. I have been down there since Mr. Murphy gave his evidence on Thursday, and I cannot find out this man; he did not give the name of the man; he said that the forms were sent to some man's house; Mr. West said in his evidence, with regard to the canvass, "I went and asked there of the foreman, Mr. Mackenzie, and he said that there would be an objection to my going into the works; but he sent one of the men to my house, No. 2, St. James's Terrace, and asked me for papers to take into their biscuit factory at Dockhead; and he said that he would get them filled up and attend to them himself. I went down to his house afterwards and fetched them from his house, No. 10, Jamaica-row." I cannot find who that gentleman is at No. 10, Jamaica-row. I made inquiries, and I cannot find out the man who took those forms and returned them. The men assure me that they have not been canvassed. The next is

Broadwood's piano factory. I went there and I saw the gentleman at the gate who took in the forms, and he had them filled up unknown to the firm and returned them to some gentleman who called for them a few days afterwards.

6989. Mr. Locke.] What forms were they?—Forms given him by Mr. Jabez West.

6990. Mr. Jabez West says at Question 6944, "I saw them in their dinner time; I saw Mr. Price, I think his name was, and I asked him if I could go in, and he said, 'No; you would not be allowed to go in.' He was at the door at the time; I told him what I was upon; that I had got some canvass papers; that we wanted to try the sense of the working men, whether they were in favour of closing public-houses altogether. I handed him the papers, and he said, 'I will attend to them; you call here on Friday, and I will leave them in the lobby with the gatekeeper.' I called on the Friday and received them"—That is the gentleman. They were all noes, everyone of them.

6991. He says so, does he not?—I only state this to prove that my first report was correct. On Saturday Mr. Rose, one of the partners, was seen by the two gentlemen, Mr. Brookbank and Mr. Townsend, who are here. Mr. Rose is one of the firm of Broadwood's, and he was asked the question whether he knew anything about a workshop canvass, and he said, "No"; if there had been a workshop canvass it had not been done with his sanction; he said that his men were sober and well conducted, and that he would be very sorry indeed to see a measure passed which would in any way interfere with their comforts; and he went on to argue the question without knowing on which side we were. From the evidence given in the list that was delivered in by Mr. Murphy, it would be made to appear as if some of the men had signed the other way; I should take it so from reading it in the evidence.

6992. Chairman.] Messrs. Broadwood were quoted amongst the firms which made up the total number?—Yes; I should mention that at Messrs. Broadwood's Mr. Price has been known to be a teetotaler for some years past, and he refused to sign notwithstanding. At the Phoenix Gas Works the forms were sent to Mr. Rowarth, who is known to Mr. Jabez West as a teetotaler, and I would wish to state with regard to the Phoenix Gas Works that the forms were only delivered to a few of the men. The next thing is steamboats on the River Thames; of course that has been corrected since. I made inquiries on, I should think, 20 or 30 boats on the river, of all the people employed on the boats, and none of them knew anything about it.

6993. Mr. Locke.] What they say is, that there was a mistake; that they put "boats" instead of "boat;" that they only went to one boat?—Yes; that was the "Holland," a boat trading between London and Ostend. Of course they can get whatever they like to drink on board on Sunday, so that it was not likely that they would sign one way or the other. At Gibbs's, the leather dressers (which I said in my former report read by Mr. Winterbotham, I could not find), the foreman there is also a teetotaler, and a friend of Mr. Jabez West, and he allowed him to go over the premises and distribute the forms; we also made a canvass, and we found that 24 were against closing, nine for closing, and five neutral. In every case selections have been made by Mr. West, where the foreman has been known to be a teetotalter; there is no doubt about that. At Oastler and Palmer's, Mr. White, the manager, says that no workshop canvass was made, but he believes that some papers were given to some of the men at the gate, and certainly not 10 of them signed for closing. At Messrs. Hepburn's; I went there last Saturday week, and I saw Mr. Hepburn; he is a short gentleman, with black whiskers; I did not ask him his name, but I asked his permission to go and speak to the men, and he said that I could not do so, but any information that I wanted if I went to his foreman he would give it to me. I went to the foreman and he said that there had been no workshop canvass there; I also saw several of the men, and they did not know anything about it. Last Friday inquiries were made there again, and one of the clerks in the counting-house said, "Oh, yes, I remember there were some papers given to the men at the gate as they were going away; but," he said, "you cannot call that a workshop canvass, or else we should have known something about it." With regard to Messrs. Corderoy's, fellmongers, there are three of the same name. I went to No. 34, Long-lane, and the men there had not been canvassed at all. We have since made inquiries, and we went to Mr. Francis Corderoy's, at No. 38, Long-lane, and it appears that the men had been canvassed there by Mr. West.

6994. In what way?—By leaving the forms with them; Mr. Francis Corderoy allowed another canvass when 14 were against closing, eight for closing and three neutral.

6995. Who took that canvass?—The two gentlemen who are here, if the Committee choose to call them. There are a number of large firms in Southwark who have not been canvassed at all. It is evident that on the other side they have gone to all the places where they have known the foremen to be teetotalters. For instance, there is Messrs. Rennie's, the engineers in Holland-street, where there are 800 men employed; there is Horton & Son, boiler makers, in Emerson-street, who employ 300 men; there is Messrs. Maudsley & Sons, engineers, who employ 500 men. Myers & Sons, builders, a firm which employs from 400 to 500 men; and Easton, Amos, & Sons, Southwark-street, who employ 300 men, to none of which establishments they went. Also they did not go to Messrs. Routledge, the publishers, or to Messrs. Judd & Glass, or to Messrs. Collard & Sons, pianoforte makers. According to Mr. Murphy's figures there are only 657 men employed in all those workshops, that they say they canvassed, but the fact is, that there are over 3,000 men employed in them. I do not know how they account for the other 2,500, because they did not deliver in any returns of them. In answer to the honourable Member for Sheffield, at Question 5434, Mr. Murphy is asked, "Do you suppose that the number there canvassed represents the whole number of working men employed in those different places?" and his answer is, "I am sure of it."

6996. Have you ascertained that instead of 658 men, there are upwards of 3,000?—Yes, there are upwards of 3,000 employed in all those firms. For instance, if you only take Messrs. Cassell, Petter, & Galpin, and Messrs. Price & Company, there are 800 men employed in those two firms alone; or if you take Messrs. Peake, Frean, & Co. and Messrs. Broadwood's, there are 950 men employed in those two firms.

6997. Have you anything further to add?—Merely to say that it is a very one-sided canvass I know this, that if I had been employed by the other side, I should have done exactly as I have done in this case. I would have gone to the people and asked them every one. I should not have selected a few of them.

6998. Your canvass, I understand, has been confined to those places of which Mr. Murphy gave evidence, and Mr. Jabez West gave evidence?—Yes.

6999. You have not extended the canvass beyond that to any other places?—No.

7000. But merely for the object of testing the canvass that was made which you were employed to do?—Just so.

7001. Mr. Knatchbull-Huggessen.] I understand that you do not impute to those who instituted the first canvass, that they have obtained signatures improperly, or that they have put in an untrue return; but what you maintain is, that that canvass was a partial canvass, and that as such, it does not give a correct idea either of the number of men employed in those firms, or of the real tendency of public opinion in the workshops?—That is all.

7002. Mr. John Abel Smith.] I should like to know a little of your antecedents; will you tell me what you were before you began this work?—I had been for 11 years with Messrs. Gurney, the Government short-hand writers.

7003. What as?—A short-hand reader; and I also have had very great experience in railway matters in the vacation, in the months of October, November, and December.

7004. Getting up assents and dissents, and so on?—Getting up the books of reference for the Standing Orders Committee.

7005. You have thrown out a hint that Mr. Murphy's evidence is to be doubted, because he was acting in accordance with a very strongly held opinion?—I do not impute anything to Mr. Murphy; but I do impute to those whom he employed that they have not done their work as they ought to do.

7006. In consequence of the strong opinions which they entertain, that they have given a bias which misleads the Committee?—No, I did not say that; I say that they have made selections.

7007. And they made selections in accordance with strongly held opinions?—I cannot say that I am sure.

7008. They have made selections; with what motives have they made the selections; did you not state over and over again that it was because they were teetotalters, or something of that sort?—Yes, I certainly said so.

7009. Does not that mean that they made selections of firms, and went to different people in accordance with their own opinions?—There is not the slightest doubt of it.

7010. Do you think it is much to be doubted that you are acting in accordance with your opinions; you are acting as the paid agent of the publicans; is not the same rule to be applied to you?—No, I was employed to test the accuracy of their statement, and I did so in a thoroughly conscientious manner.

7011. I am not saying that you did not; but are not your conclusions open to the same objection as theirs, namely, that you were advocating one particular opinion?—I have delivered in returns, which can be tested, and I can vouch for the accuracy of every name upon those papers, ers, because I had them not from the lodgers, I had them from the man himself, whoever was.

7012. I am not saying that that is not so; but ask you again, are not your conclusions and your returns open to the same objections which I allege against those on the other side, namely, that they are collected by persons having strong personal opinions upon the subject to which they refer?—If you allude to me, I have not a strong personal opinion either way.

7013. But you are the paid agent of the publishers?—Certainly I am; but I went to every house. I did not miss houses, the same as they; I went to every house, and got the facts from the householders themselves.

7014. You impute to those, or you allege as a conclusion of your own, that they went about London seeking those places in which they had not favourably disposed to them?—No, I do not say that; but this I will say, that the Rev. Mr. Murphy is well known, and very much respected, in the neighbourhood of the Borough, where no returns were obtained; and with regard to any other place, no doubt, of course, all those people knew the Rev. Newman Hall very well; and their names were used in connection with this canvass.

7015. Is it not possible that in selecting people from various parts of London they might have had an object, to show the feeling as widely spread amongst all the different classes of people?—It is quite possible, it is true, but if I did it, if I intended to find out the feeling of a neighbourhood, I should not go and miss several streets. I would take a street here and then go three streets further off.

7016. But did not you state generally, in reference to their going to Euston-road, that they went there because it was a teetotaler who was the foreman?—I do say so.

7017. Is it not possible that they might have gone to that great distance from Bermondsey to know how widely spread the feeling was?—Yes; but, according to the evidence the canvass was confined to the south of London. Mr. Murphy asked, at Question 5432, "The working men, as a whole, are in favour of entire closing, are they not?" to which he replies, "I think they are." If the Committee would allow me, I have the results of a workshop canvass, partially in the south of London, with which I am personally conversant.

7018. That is not incorrect, is it?—It is not incorrect, but, for instance, the two firms of Braby & Co., being in the directory, I naturally went to the one in the south of London.

7019. Will you read the next Question and answer, No. 5433?—"Were those answers for entire closing, or for Mr. Abel Smith's Bill?—For entire closing. The workshop canvass which was made by a man who is well known to all the people in the borough of Southwark, as one who takes a great interest in electioneering matters, and in moral matters, Mr. Jabez West, shows the following result. We had a workshop canvass at Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin's; Price & Co.'s candle works; Cockerell & Co.'s, coal merchants; Doulton & Co.'s, Lambeth, and Braby & Co.'s, Limited."

7020. Is Messrs. Cassell's in the south of London?—No, it is not.

7021. Then that shows that it was not confined to the south, does it not?—But there is no mistaking the fact that they went to Messrs. Cassell's, because Mr. Jeffery was well known as a great teetotal advocate.

7022. That is your own opinion that Mr. Jeffery is a teetotaler, but the canvass of Messrs. Cassell's was against the Bill, was it not?—No; I have the authority of Mr. Jeffery for saying that the majority of the men are in favour of further restrictions, but he said at the same time that the majority of the men signed the paper against closing.

7023. We have got it in evidence here, under Mr. Jeffery's own hand, for he writes, "although those in favour of the total closing of public-houses on Sunday appear to be in a minority in this concern, I believe the majority are favourable to further restriction on the Sunday traffic, such as that proposed in Mr. Abel Smith's Bill"?—Yes; that is exactly what he told me.

7024. Therefore that is quite accurate?—Quite accurate.

7025. Then their object in going to Messrs. Cassell & Co., on account of the opinion of Mr. Jeffery broke down?—It is well known, I think, that there was a very influential petition presented to the House from Messrs. Cassell's against the Bill.

7026. Supposing you were to answer my question. I ask you whether it is the fact that their object in going to Cassell & Co.'s broke down?—There is no doubt it did.

7027. And Broadwood's the same?—Yes, and Broadwood's the same; but, as I said before, from their giving the names of the different firms in the answer to Question No. 5433, it would naturally lead anybody to conclude that those firms were in favour of closing.

7028. Altogether they did not carry on the canvass, as you think, rightly?—That was not their fault.

7029. But it is the fact?—It is the fact; it turned out so; they did not expect it, perhaps.

7030. Mr. Locke.] You do not suppose that they went there to get negatives?—No.

Mr. J. T. Rowland.

Mr. RICHARD WAYGOOD, called in; and Examined.

7031. Chairman.] You are an Engineer at the Winton Iron Works, Robert's-place, Brunswick-street, Great Dover-road, and you offer yourself as a witness to this Committee, believing that you can speak to the opinions of many employers of labour and working men on this subject which is before the Committee?—I can.

7032. Do you know accurately the provisions of the Bill which is referred to this Committee?—I know nothing of it; I have not read any—thing of it, nor any evidence that has been adduced.

7033. By this Bill it is proposed to shorten the hours during which liquors may be sold on Sunday, from the present limit of eight hours to three and a half in the metropolis, and four out of it; that during two hours in the middle of the day, and two hours in the evening, they may be sold for consumption off the premises with certain other exceptions in the metropolitan district, district, that meals may be taken in a public-house, and that every traveller should obtain refreshment; that is the general object of the Bill; what is it that you would like to state to the Committee upon that subject?—I merely want to give the result of a little experience of my own, founded upon about 40 years' acquaintance with working men. I have been in business in London 40 years, and of course, during that period, I have had a great number of men in my employ; not only in London, but in fact, out of London; for instance, at Penge, where I have had brickfields and other works. My principal object was to state to the Committee generally, that my idea is that a great deal is claimed for restriction as to the improvement of the morals of the men; but I deny that entirely. I deny that restriction has anything whatever to do with it; it is merely the advance of education and better habits in the men themselves. I am myself a violent opponent of drunkenness in any form, and I suppose a more moderate man than myself does not exist, for no man ever yet saw me drunk, and never will; but of course, in treating with a lot of such men as moulders, engineers, and all that class, you have to study their habits. I have a sort of family around me of many years' standing; my foreman has been with me 40 years, and several of the men have been 30 and 35 years. I have a great many uncontrollable spirits, some of whom I have been obliged to discard entirely; but I have found that drunkards may be reclaimed, and be made into teetotallers. I have made a teetotaller of a man as a dernier ressort, but not when he has another chance; but I have found the best effects have been produced in my men by inducing them to take their wives and their families out with them on the Sunday especially. Many is the spree that I have paid for, and if you can induce a man who is a drinker to go out on a Sunday, and take his wife and children with him, depend upon it you reclaim that man after two or three times. He cannot bear the reproach, nor can he bear the dreadful feeling of a wife and children shrinking away from him. I have had a lot of men myself of that sort, and I know that to such men children are such silent monitors that they cannot go on with drinking, and that is why I have endeavoured to encourage the habit of the men going out with their families on Sunday.

7034. Your general view is that innocent enjoyments are a sort of preservative from intemperance?—That is the reason why I wish to come before the Committee, because I have been a great deal to Paris, and have had a good deal to do with Frenchmen, and I know the habits of the people; indeed I wrote a little pamphlet, which may possibly have been seen by some of the gentlemen of this Committee, which goes very fully into the matter as to the habits of French people, and the way by which they are made artizans, or artists rather, and I have had many of them in my employ. My foreman is a Sunday school man, and he takes his children to school, and several others of my men belong to different congregations round, and of course I always encourage that to the utmost of my power, but I say that the children of those men do not make artists. If you want to induce children to learn easily you must associate them with beautiful objects in their early infancy. The fact is, the mind begins to drink in inspiration from childhood; it is in children that you must instil lines of grace and beauty. If you look at a child that is fond of music you will see the little infant's limbs all agog and all alive with beautiful sounds before it can speak; and it is to the love of the beautiful that I look, and to better education for further progress in the morals and manners of the people generally.

7035. Are the Committee to understand that you are against any additional restrictions?—I have never seen the use of them, because they are either evaded or resisted. You saw a little of that during the riots in Hyde Park; there was resistance. I can assure you there is not a man in my employment who does not know where to get drink every Sunday, at 20 places if he likes.

7036. No doubt there are plenty of facilities but do you think that the present law is a just one, which limits the hours to from one to three and from five to eleven?—I do not think that the restrictions are any harm; they are something like chips in porridge, no good or harm. I people will get drunk they will get drunk; you see them round the corner of Watchorn's place like a lot of hogs running to the swill tubs, at one o'clock on Sunday, and I do not see any advantage in closing the public-houses up to that time.

7037. Do you not think that, at all events, it prevents their getting drunk, or makes it very difficult for them to get drunk before one o'clock?—No, not in the least.

7038. Do you see any drunken people about before one o'clock?—I do not, because the men go into private drinking houses, those that want to get drink, because as I said, every man in my employ knows 20 places where to get drink on Sunday morning.

7039. Do you see any drunk in the evening?—I get away out of town, and now I have not a man in my employ, except that goes to church or chapel, but what goes out of town. I am no more in London now of a Sunday evening, but if the honourable Member remembers London 20 years ago, you could not then go down the Kent road without seeing every public-house surrounded with seats and stools, and crammed right up to the roof with people drinking. That is all gone now, and that has not been done by restrictions, but by sending the people away where they can enjoy themselves more in the country, and more facilities are afforded to the people for education and even for religion that might be done if it is for the interests of religion to do it. If you were to add further restrictions to the present ones, you would raise a spirit of hostility and hatred which would only end in resistance or evasion; and that would do an immense amount of mischief. I know the habits of the people and I know what the feeling would be, and I would be a determination to resist; unless you add to your Act of Parliament, that you will make it at the same time penal or fineable for any gentleman to open his cellar after 12 at night on Saturday, until Monday morning, and allow his servants to inform against him and give them half the penalty for information; then you would catch the gentlemen too; and you would submit to it for a time, but you gentlemen would give way first.

7040. Is it not your opinion that the increase of sobriety of the population is the result of restrictive legislation as far as it has gone?—Where you see the greatest liberty, there you see the least et drunkenness. If you go to Paris, as I have many times, you see unlimited liberty, and in Berlin, you may get drunk at any time you please on the Sunday, and you see no drunkards out; but in Scotland on a Sunday morning you see 200 or 300 men drunk on Glasgow-green, and if you go to Dundee you get 24 private drinking houses in one street.

7041. Who has seen them?—I have myself.

7042. Do you state to the Committee that you have really seen 200 or 300 men drunk on Glasgow-green on a Sunday morning?—Yes.

7043. When did you see that?—I should think must be about a year and a-half ago; I was at Glasgow. My nephew, who is with me in the business (and I can produce him if you wish it), served his apprenticeship at Dundee, and he was there about five years ago since the Forbes Macenzie Act came into operation; he and one of my neighbours for a freak, not at my instigation, went into 24 surreptitious drinking places in one street in Dundee alone, all sub rosa.

7044. I am asking you about this extraordinary number, because I think they must have got there for you to see all the drunkards of Glasgow together; and I meant to ask you whether you can positively say that you saw about a year and a-half ago between 200 and 300 men drunk on one Sunday morning at one time on Glasgow-green?—Yes; and I should think you might say treble that number, and I think you would not be very wide of the mark.

7045. Do you think that there might have been 100 there at once all drunk?—I think you might treble that number. I have known a gentleman who came and declared solemnly to me not two months ago that he saw 2,000 men drunk on Glasgow-green, and he counted them. I can bring that gentleman here; he is a gentleman of probity and standing, too. I do not vouch for it; it is merely a report; but when I can bring you the man who went into 24 surreptitious drinking places in one street at Dundee on a Sunday morning, I do not think that you need trouble much about what restriction does for you.

7046. I may take your opinion, because after all we do not want to argue with you, but merely to have your opinion, and it is this, is it not, that the improved habits of the population have not been the result of legislation?—No, by no means.

7047. And you decidedly think that increased restrictions would not make any further improvement?—I think that it would make it a great deal worse; you would have a spirit of hatred and resistance stirred up; that is the feeling you would rouse.

7048. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] You have found that the moral influence that you are able to exercise with your men has enabled you to reclaim them?—I have not a drunkard in my employ among 70 men.

7049. You are afraid that further restrictions would create a spirit of opposition which would counteract your moral influence for the future?—That is my opinion founded upon many years' close observation.

7050. Colonel Fane.] You would be in favour, would you not, of opening public institutions on Sunday, such as the Crystal Palace, the British Museum, and so on?—Yes, certainly.

7051. With a view of reclaiming the working classes from the drinking houses?—No doubt; 0.69.

yo may see that in Paris. If you go to Versailles, or over the galleries of the Louvre, you will see men with their wives and children walking about the corridors quickly and steadily with small baskets of refreshments in their hands, and you see no drunkenness there.

7052. Mr. Evans.] I think you said that you were acquainted with Paris; do you think there is less drunkenness there than in London?—I never saw a single drunken man or a dirty woman when I was in Paris.

7053. Are you acquainted with other European countries besides France?—No, not much.

7054. Your experience goes to show that in most parts of Europe where there is hardly any restriction at all there is very little drunkenness; or you would not be surprised to hear that that was the case?—Where people drink light clarets and things that produce satiety, drunkenness is much less than where people drink substances like malt liquor, which is adulterated and salted, and tobacco juice, and all the rest of the abominable rubbish, which is sold to the working men in this country, which produces false thirst; there you will always see drunkenness.

7055. Are you aware that the Germans drink quite as much beer as the English?—They might drink beer, but you would not like to drink the stuff that the working men there drink.

7056. Are you also aware that on the whole the Germans are an exceedingly sober people?—I do not know much about the Germans.

7057. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Is this your pamphlet which you refer to (handing a pamphlet to the Witness)?—Yes.

7058. It is called, I think, "A Warning Voice to the People of England on the Present Crisis"?—Yes; and it would be very well if some of the warnings were taken.

7059. Do you adhere to the opinions which you have expressed there?—I do.

7060. And you there state that in this "country we have too much liberty; liberty for evil"?—Yes; we have a great deal too much.

7061. What do you mean?—Liberty for men to break the laws with impunity. I believe that the trades unions, if properly managed, would have been a benefit, instead of which they have been a great curse. Certainly they have advanced the price of wages, which has been a benefit where education has entered; but where it has brought in such habits and manners that a brickmaker never works again till the excess of his wages is gone, it has been a mischief and a curse.

7062. Do you not think that liberty in drinking is liberty for evil?—I think not; it does not appear so to me; I do not see that that is so. I think that education puts that to rights.

7063. Is there not liberty of drinking in this country?—I do not see how you can restrict it. I cannot see how restriction upon drinking ever can produce any useful purpose, because men will drink.

7064. I asked you whether there is not liberty to drink in this country?—They have got liberty now.

7065. That is liberty for evil, is it not?—Yes; but that is not the liberty for evil that I mean; I mean allowing a lot of men to go before another person's door, as they did in the time of the tailors' strike, and intimidate those who were willing to work.

Mr.
R. Waygood.
1868.

Mr. R. Waygood. 15 June 1868. 7066. You entertain the opinion, I believe, that the reign of Queen Victoria is the most unfortunate epoch that the future historians of our country will have to record?—I believe it will be.

7067. And you entertain that opinion on the ground of the existence of strikes, the existence of exhibitions, and the absence of duty on the exportation of coal and iron?—Most essentially; and you will find it out. Whoever lives 100 years will see what a lot of fools we have been; and before that, too.

7068. The remedies which you suggest are the putting down of strikes and rattening, the subdivision of land, and an export duty on coal and pig iron?—All very useful and salutary measures, which I shall never live to see carried out.

7069. But those are your suggestions?—Those are my views.

7070. You wish also, if I am to collect your opinions from the pamphlet, to convert paupers into soldiers?—I do not wish to do anything of the sort; that is merely thrown out as a rough idea. You see it is only a piece of irony, whether they might not as well be turned into soldiers.

7071. And the poor law officials into officers?—It is only meant as a piece of irony. I do not see but what it should be quite as well to make soldiers and militiamen of them, as that they should be thieves, rogues, and vagabonds, and the prisons full of them.

7072. You entertain the opinion also, do you not, of the superiority of children who have attended museums and things of that sort, on Sunday, to those who go to Sunday schools?—I think if you were to go and see the effects of it at Paris, and see the exquisite taste displayed by them, you must come to that conclusion, for we are obliged to send for those very men to do our best work.

7073. In your pamphlet you have included a letter from a Mr. Harrison?—I have.

7074. Do you indorse his opinions?—Not to all their extent. There are certain inaccuracies there that I have since had time to read; and I do not believe that all his deductions from them are very good.

7075. You have also included in your pamphlet a statement from M. De Pontes, a Frenchman?—That is some of Mr. Harrison's portion.

7076. Mr. Locke.] Is it within your recollection that this very year there was a debate in the House of Commons with respect to the exportation of coal, and a fear entertained by a great many Members that we should, if we allowed it to go on, have no coal for our manufacturing purposes?—The South Staffordshire coal mines are already beginning to fail.

7077. Are you aware of that debate?—Yes.

7078. You entertain the same opinion upon a subject of that sort as a great many Members of Parliament?—Yes.

7079. You have been asked whether there is liberty for drinking in this country; is there likewise liberty for eating?—Yes.

7080. And is there liberty for smoking?—Yes, I think so.

7081. At present there is liberty for drinking, eating, smoking, washing, and for most other things, where you do not do your neighbour any harm?—Yes.

7082. Do not you think that that liberty ought to be continued?—I should think so, most unquestionably.

7083. And that laws should not be made with the object of restraining persons merely for the purpose of other people, without doing any good to the individuals who were inconvenienced?—Certainly not; class legislation is a bad thing.

7084. And sumptuary laws generally fail?—Yes.

Mr. JAMES TAYLOR STATON, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. T. Staton. 7085. Chairman.] WHAT are you?—I am what is called the managerial sub-editor of a daily paper at Bolton, the "Evening News." I sub-edit the paper, and manage the business.

7086. Mr. Locke.] What is the population at Bolton?—At the last census in 1861, it was 70,396, and it is computed that we have increased since then about 1,000 a year; it is allowed on all hands that the present population is about 76,000 within the borough.

7087. Has your attention been drawn to the question of drunkenness on the Sunday?—It has.

7088. Have you any statistics with respect to that?—I have some statistics showing the amount of drunkenness for the year 1862, down to 1867; and they are compiled from the police returns. I will read them over with the permission of the Committee. In 1862, there were 686 males and 221 females, apprehended for drunkenness, making a total of 907; 244 on the Saturday, 231 on the Sunday, and 432 on other days. In 1863, there were 534 males and 134 females, total, 668; 179 on Saturday, 181 on Sunday, and 308 on other days. In 1864, there were 651 males and 147 females, total, 798; 214 on Saturday, 207 on Sunday, and 377 on other days. In 1865, there were 592 males, 148 females; total, 740; 213 on Saturday, 198 on Sunday, and 329 on other days. In 1866, there were 596 males, 145 females; total, 741; 194 on Saturday, 201 on Sunday, and 346 on other days. In 1867, there were 625 males, 184 females; total, 729; 199 on Saturday, 187 on Sunday, and 343 on other days. So that there has been a general diminution in drunkenness; for whereas, in 1862, we had 907 cases of apprehensions in the year, in 1867, they had dwindled down to 729, a diminution of something like 20 per cent.

7089. Do you consider that that number is a large proportion of drunken people, considering the population of the place?—I do not, especially considering the character of the population, for at the present time we have a great deal of building going on, and we have something like 400 or 500 strangers in the town, such as masons and bricklayers, and they are classes of people who generally take their liquor rather freely.

7090. With regard to Sunday drinking, is it within your knowledge that many cases arise on Saturday night?—Yes; I believe that a great deal of the drinking on Sunday originates on Saturday night; parties get drunk on the Saturday night, and then, to use a Lancashire phrase, they must have a hair off the old dog on the Sunday

Sunday morning. I must state further that I believe that the cases, with very few exceptions, of Sunday drinking, are of persons who obtain liquor during the prohibited hours, and they are generally taken up before the dinner hour, or very soon after.

7091. That is before half-past 12 o'clock on Sunday?—Yes; there is a great deal of illicit drinking going on on the Sunday morning. When the houses are open you do not see any of those people; they go home, get their dinner, and perhaps have a sleep after that, and they end the jug in the evening if they want any more drink.

7092. Do you think that, if further restrictions were imposed, there would be further attempts to evade the law?—That is my decided opinion; I have often found in Bolton, as far as my experience goes, that where there has been any attempt to further restrict drinking on the Sunday, it has been attended with results contrary to the wish of those who promoted it; therefore, I think the more restriction there is, the more attempts at evasion there will be, and very likely collision.

7093. Has there been an increase in the number of police at Bolton?—There has been an increase of about 30, recently.

7094. Do you think that, in consequence of that, more drunken people would be taken up now than there were formerly?—Yes; I believe since those returns were published there has been to all appearance an increase of drunkenness, but it is more apparent, I think, than real, because the attention of the police seems to have been very much directed to that point lately, much more so than in former years; in fact, they seem to be directing their energies now chiefly to the prevention of publicans selling during prohibited hours, and to taking up drunken people. There has been a great deal of that in Bolton lately; for as far as my observation goes, I do not see more drunken people about the streets, but the police appear to be more zealous in that direction.

7095. You mean that more cases are brought to light?—Yes; there is not more drinking, as I understand, but there are more cases brought to light.

7096. You consider that a very large proportion of the Sunday drinking cases are to be referred to parties who obtain their drink during prohibited hours?—Yes, I do; there is one fact very patent in Bolton, that parties who get drunk on Sunday, for the most part get drunk during the prohibited hours, by evading the law on Sunday morning.

7097. Therefore, if any further restrictions were imposed, you think that the evasions would be greater?—I think they would be.

7099. But they would still obtain drink?—Yes, I think they would; and I think there would be another result if parties were restricted from obtaining liquor beyond what they are at present; that is to say, they would get a quantity of liquor in bottles in their houses, and there would be, in consequence, what we call fireside fuddling going on, much to the injury of the rising generation.

7100. Is that carried out to a great extent?

now?—It is not at present, but I think it would be if the hours were further restricted.

7101. You think, at all events, that persons who are addicted to it would get drunk?—I think they would.

7102. And that this fireside fuddling would be increased?—It would be increased, much to the injury of families. I think that very bad examples would be set in their own homes.

7103. What is your opinion with respect to the feeling of the bulk of the population as to this Bill?—I think the bulk of the population of Bolton and its neighbourhood is decidedly against any further restriction.

7104. Is there any large portion of the public at Bolton who, in your opinion, are in favour of further restriction?—I do not think there is any very large proportion; in fact, the canvass recently made sufficiently proves that.

7105. Have you mixed much amongst the working classes of Lancashire?—I have for the last 20 years; and I have very closely observed both men and manners in Lancashire.

7106. Have you been observing their habits, and their preferences, and their tastes?—Yes, for at least 20 years.

7107. Has your attention been called to the evidence of the Mayor of Bolton?—I have read it in the public papers.

7108. The Mayor of Bolton gave his evidence with respect to a canvass, did he not?—Yes.

7109. At Question No. 4028, Mr. James Barlow, the mayor, gave evidence, in answer to a question from Mr. Abel Smith; Mr. Smith says, "Will you state to the Committee what the result has been?" (that is, of the canvass); and Mr. Barlow's reply is, "The whole town was canvassed; papers were left at each house, with certain questions of which the first was this: 'Are you in favour of closing public-houses and beer-houses during the whole of Sunday?' And in reply 6,377 were in favour of it; 1,783 answered 'No;' and 1,557 were neutral; the total number of papers returned were 9,717." Have you any observations to make with regard to that canvass?—I have this observation to make, that the number of householders in Bolton is 16,170, or thereabouts. Of course, we must make a certain allowance for females; there are a number of females who occupy houses, and I suppose the intention was not to take the opinion of females, though I do not see why they should not have given their opinion as well as anybody else; and I believe, according to Mr. Barlow's own statement, they only issued 10,000 papers, so that it leaves 6,170 to be accounted for. Of course, that naturally excites suspicion as to the reason why those 6,000 people were not supplied with papers as well as the others. And with regard to the committee, of course the gentlemen connected with that movement are very respectable people, and I should be the last man to doubt their word; but I object on principle to a statement of that kind being made unchecked by unprofessional parties. It ought to have been checked by somebody who belonged neither to the teetotallers nor to the Sunday closing people; but they had it all in their own hands, and they gave such statements to the people as they thought fit; and I believe that if the publicans had made a canvass and given their statements without such a test, the Sunday closing party would have been the first to call it in question upon that very ground. I think we cannot take it

Mr. J. T. Staton. it as really worth anything; it is not a satisfactory test, in my opinion.

7110. Have you anything further to add upon that subject?—No, I think not.

7111. Evidence has been given with respect to the houses where there has been music on Sunday, has your attention been called to that evidence?—Yes; I have frequently gone into those places to see what kind of people were there.

7112. Will you state what you have observed when you have gone into those places?—I can safely say that, with one or two exceptions, I never saw a person drunk in one of those houses during the whole of the past 20 years. They are generally people who go there for a little company, and a little music, and social chat. After taking a walk in the country, they generally go there to finish up the Sunday evening. I always find them very well-behaved people. They do not go there so much for drinking as for a little recreation and enjoyment.

7113. Is it sacred music that is performed at those places?—It is of a composite character. Sacred music, selection from operas, and overtures; but no dancing tunes, as a rule, or very few; they confine themselves to what is called classical music, generally.

7114. What instruments have they?—Generally a piano, a small violin, a bass, and a cornet, that is about the extent, I think. Sometimes they have merely a piano and a violin.

7115. Does that music amuse the people?—It does.

7116. And are they there in any great numbers?—Yes, they are all pretty well attended.

7117. How many of those places are there in Bolton?—I should say, speaking from memory, about seven. I can count six.

7118. How many persons will the largest of them accommodate?—I should say that the largest of them will accommodate from 400 to 500 people at least.

7119. Are they ever full?—Very frequently.

7120. What would the smallest accommodate?—The smallest would accommodate about 60 or 70.

7121. You say that you have from time to time paid visits to those places, and you say that you have not observed any drunkenness?—No, not in those houses.

7122. The object of persons going there appeared to you to be for the sake of amusement and conversation?—Just so.

7123. Do you think it beneficial that those places should be open?—I do not think they do any harm. It is a mere question of taste. I think they do no harm. I think that the tendency of them as to the people going there is decidedly to induce them not to drink too much. They go to amuse themselves, and if they did not go there I think they would go to other places and amuse themselves with drinking alone.

7124. Are there persons of both sexes there?—Yes.

7125. Are there any children?—No children, or very few. You see young persons about 14 or 15; but no infants.

7126. But do men go there with their wives?—Yes, they go there with their wives, and sometimes with their daughters.

7127. And you say that their behaviour, so far as you have observed it, is very good?—Very good.

7128. Has your attention been drawn to the mayor's statement about excursion trains?—Yes.

7129. What was his statement as to that?—I understand rightly what is in the papers, in his first statement he said that there were excursion trains on Sunday, but I saw a correction afterwards in which he said that they were on the Saturday evening, and that the people returned on Sunday. In answer to a question he said that they generally took refreshments with them in small baskets. I think that is not exactly the case. I think the people who go from home on Saturday may take a little refreshment with them to eat and drink on the way, because Lancashire people have an idea that if they go about 30 miles they will want something before they get to the end of their journey, and they generally take a little with them; but they do not take all their food with them, at least those who go out on Saturday never do that unless they are going out for the day merely. I believe there are not many people who go away on Saturday and come home on Sunday. The railways afford facilities for staying eight days at certain places; you may take a ticket and you are allowed eight days at some places, and from four or five at others; but very few comparatively go on the Saturday and come back on the Sunday. Some years ago when there were excursion trains on Sunday, people went away in them in very large numbers. In fact they were considered by the people where they went to to be a nuisance. The clergy and other parties interfered and prevailed upon the railway companies to withdraw those excursions, and we have had none since; but when they were in existence the working classes went in them in very large numbers, indeed, to Liverpool, Blackpool, Southport, and other watering places, to the sea coast, in fact.

7130. Do you think it beneficial for them that they should go out on Sunday and breathe the sea air?—I think people who are cooped up in factories and foundries the whole week may receive benefit by going out into the country for fresh air on Sunday.

7131. Have you ever seen any of them on those excursions?—Yes; I have been on them myself.

7132. How have they behaved upon those occasions?—They behaved pretty well. I never had reason to complain. I never saw anything particularly wrong about them.

7133. Has it been necessary for the persons taking those excursions that they should be enabled to go into houses for refreshment?—Decidedly.

7134. Both for eating and drinking?—Yes; you cannot take a number of people away without their requiring places of accommodation.

7135. Supposing this Bill were passed and the hours were restricted, do you think that it would throw an impediment in the way of their obtaining this refreshment; even supposing that the houses were open to the traveller, would not they have a difficulty in convincing the licensed victualler that they were travellers?—Yes; I think that it would be a very great annoyance, and that it would induce parties, perhaps, to take a quantity of liquor with them. I may say on that point that we have near Bolton a place to which people frequently go on Sunday, it is in the neighbourhood of Rivington; there is a very high hill there called Rivington Pike, and it is a place of very favourite resort for a very large number of people. The Liverpool water-parks are there, and some very large lakes, and on Sunday afternoon the inhabitants in parties come over there in traps, and spend their afternoon and evening upon the hills and roaming about by the lakes. There is only one public-house there, and no other place where you can get anything except toffy, or something of that kind, and this place is very largely patronised by the people who go there. If the present Bill were passed, I think it would be found to be a very great inconvenience indeed. In fact, I have heard people in Bolton express themselves very strongly with regard to that matter.

136. With regard to this Bill?—With regard to this Bill as applied to places like Rivington; have other places of a similar character to which people go on Sundays, and there is no chance of getting refreshment except at the inn or public-house established there.

137. Has your attention been drawn to the Mayor's statement as to the number of householders?—Yes.

138. What number is it that the Mayor gives?—I think he says about 13,000 or 14,000; corrected himself, I believe; at first he said 12,000, and I think he corrected himself afterwards, and made it 13,000 or 14,000; I am not certain about the figures.

139. At question No. 4091 he is asked, "You say that there are 76,000 inhabitants in Bolton; that is, including men, women, and children?" Yes.—And 14,000 householders, do you think? I am not prepared with statistics, but I could say there were 12,000 or 13,000 householders." And to that he adheres. Will you give me what your view of the case is?—There are 170 householders; that is the return which I have given to me, and I believe it was taken from the overseer's books, as the number of persons rated to the relief of the poor.

140. You have stated, with regard to the Bill in which the canvass was taken, that you do not think it was a correct mode of doing it?—I do not.

141. What would you suggest?—I should suggest that if there were a canvass of the inhabitants, they should leave a paper at every house, and then have the papers examined by the public accountant, some neutral man. I think that when the matter is kept solely within their own hands, they cannot at least expect the people to place that dependence upon it which otherwise they would do; in fact, I think if the other side were to take the same plan, it would be generally cried to by them, and I think they could repudiate it altogether.

142. Have you been present at any of the meetings which the Mayor spoke of that have been held in Bolton?—I was not present.

143. Do you set any store by them?—I do not place much confidence in those meetings; they are always attended by one party; the general public seldom go near them; they are very indifferent to them; you always find the same faces at those meetings.

144. How were they announced?—By public cards.

145. But does it state from whom the public card emanates?—I think it was a committee of the Bolton Branch of the Sunday Closing Association.

146. And, therefore, when a bill of that sort is distributed through the town, persons are aware that this is a meeting of the Sunday Closing Association?—Yes, that is so.

7147. Are you of opinion that persons who are not favourable to that view do not attend the meetings?—They do not often go near them.

7148. Therefore, generally, they are all persons of one way of thinking?—Generally; I think that is the case, as far as my observation goes, and my knowledge of the parties.

7149. Your own opinion, and the opinion of the majority of persons in Bolton, is against the Permissive Bill, or any further restriction?—As far as my intercourse with the people goes, I find a general feeling against either restriction or the Permissive Bill. There are, of course, many people to be found in favour of both; but I think that the general feeling of the working classes is opposed to them. In fact, I may use a little argument to prove it: there are a great number of Odd Fellows and other societies in Bolton, who hold their meetings at public-houses. Attempts have been made upon some occasions to withdraw them from the public-houses, and to hold their meetings in private rooms. That has been the case in about half-a-dozen instances, but most of them have failed. The working classes would not go to private rooms; they would only go to meetings where they could have a glass of beer over the business; and when they have met at private houses, it has dwindled down to a mere office business, and nothing more.

7150. Has there been any canvass against this Bill at Bolton?—No, not that I am aware of.

7151. Have you ascertained the opinion of the licensed victuallers, or any of them at Bolton, with respect to the legislation proposed in this Bill?—I have heard a great many of them express their opinions.

7152. What opinions have they expressed?—They are all decidedly against it.

7153. Have they said anything that they would prefer to it?—The generality of them would prefer closing altogether, rather than keep a staff of servants hanging about their premises, merely to serve over the counter for some three or four hours. In fact, the public are rather apprehensive that, if this Bill is carried, most of the publicans will close their houses, rather than submit to the inconvenience arising out of it.

7154. They would consider it an inconvenience that they should have to keep up their staff for the purpose of keeping their houses open during the two intervals?—Yes; and there is another view that the publicans take of it, and I think that they are about right too, from what I have seen of the town; that if this Bill were passed, there would be great attempts at evasion, and that there would be a system of espionage established, of parties watching the houses to see that nobody entered except during the hours allowed by law, and also that nobody drank a glass of ale inside the house; of course, there would be a great deal of that existing, and I rather think that that would give rise to considerable ill-feeling and ill-blood in the town. I know that previous attempts to restrict Sunday business have caused great dissatisfaction.

7155. When was that?—I remember Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill.

7156. What was the effect of that Bill?—The people were very much dissatisfied with it.

7157. How did they show their dissatisfaction?—I do not think that they sent any petitions up formally.

Mr.
J. T. Staton.

formally. I am not aware of any, but I could hear opinions expressed on all sides that they considered that it was an infraction of what was called their liberty or right.

7158. What portion of Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill did they particularly object to?—I think that it was to the portion which compelled the public-houses to close at 10 on Sunday evenings; a great many parties came in by trains late, and wanted refreshments before they got home, which they could not get, and they used to grumble very loudly about it.

7159. With regard to the publicans, supposing this Bill were passed, would it be any advantage to the persons employed in the public-houses that the number of hours which they have to serve customers should be diminished in the way suggested by this Bill?—I do not think it would; I think that the only way to benefit them would be to release them from their labours altogether, otherwise they would be kept about the premises just the same as they are now.

7160. They would only be able to go out for a short time?—Yes, they would have to be going in and out.

7161. And they would have to return to their work in the evening?—Yes.

7162. And that would likewise be a very great inconvenience to the public?—I think it would.

7163. Do you see any advantage whatever in passing such a Bill as this?—I do not; I think it would make matters worse than they are.

7164. In what way do you think it would make matters worse than they are?—By causing more attempts at evasion. I think that this kind of thing causes people to try to evade what they consider to be an unjust law, or an unnecessary restriction of their liberties.

7165. Chairman.] Are you in favour of restriction as far as it goes?—I think that the present law is very fair; I never heard a complaint about the working of the present law till the Sunday Closing Association sprung into existence, and began to agitate people's minds, and then, of course, we had all the teetotallers going in with them, and hence the present movement, I think.

7166. Do you think that the law lessened the amount of drunkenness by closing the public-houses up to one o'clock on Sundays?—I do not think that it has, because there are still drunken people about our streets on Sundays, who get their beer within the prohibited hours; it is well understood all through the town that it is so.

7167. Are there a great many drunken people about on Sunday forenoon?—Not many; but those who do get taken up for drunkenness, get their drink on the Sunday morning, and not in the afternoon and evening.

7168. Do you see as many drunken people about the town on the forenoon of Sunday as there are about in the evening?—You will see very few drunken people in the evening; those who get drunk in the early part of the day constitute our street drunkards, for the most part, and when they get home they stay there. There are a great many respectable people on Sunday evening walking about the street, who just call in at a public-house for a glass or two of beer, and no more.

7169. We know that there are a great many taken up on Sunday in the afternoon?—Not in the afternoon generally, but on Sunday morning. They are generally taken up, I believe, during service time on Sunday morning. The police take people about the streets who have had drink, they take them up, and put them in the lock-up.

7170. Do you think that there are as many taken up between 11 and one on Sunday morning as there are, we will say, between 10 and one on Sunday night?—Yes; and more too, I should say.

7171. Mr Knatchbull-Hugessen.] You do not know anything about the public meetings that have been held in Bolton?—I know nothing other than that there was a meeting held, and that it was duly reported in our paper, and I read the report, but I was not present at it.

7172. The mayor told us this: "We have three newspapers in Bolton, and they all advocate Sunday closing"; is that the case?—No, it is not.

7173. How many newspapers are there in Bolton?—I think there is only one which advocates closing, and the proprietor of that belongs to the teetotal body. But the "Bolton Chronicle," weekly organ, which is the oldest paper we have, and the paper that I am connected with, do not advocate that view; in fact, they seldom allude to it, except in the way of public reports. To report meetings impartially, but nothing beyond that; they rarely express an opinion in any of their articles.

7174. I suppose that a great portion of the Bolton public are in the habit of drinking beer?—Yes, a great many of them.

7175. Do you think that they would generally agree with the mayor's opinion, that parties who will drink on the Sabbath should get their beer on Saturday evening, and bottle it up?—I think that that would be the greatest evil that we could possibly have introduced. The parties would get more than they required, if they had to do that; we have had an instance of that in Scotland. I think they would get larger quantities than were possibly required, and that it would induce those to get drunk who might otherwise keep sober.

7176. Beer bottled on Saturday to be drunk on Sunday might not be quite so wholesome as Sunday as if it was drunk fresh?—It would not be so wholesome; it is not quite the same as when drawn bright and fresh. I have read an account of the working of the Forbes Mackenzie Act, and one publican, giving his evidence, said, that he sold more spirits on Saturday than he used to do on Saturday and Sunday combined before the Act came into operation, because people bought larger quantities than they really required, and thence it has led to a greater amount of drunkenness.

7177. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Where was that?—I believe it was in Glasgow. I read it in the "Alliance News."

7178. Chairman.] Did you read the evidence given before the Commission, or any great portion of it?—No, I did not.

7179. Are you aware that it is stated that drunkenness has very greatly diminished in Scotland?—I have seen that statement; but I have seen other statements that say, although it might have diminished, as far as regards appearances in the public streets, yet there has been a great deal more of it in the dwellings of the people.

7180. Are you aware that the Commission made this report, that there had been a very great decrease in the amount of drunkenness?—I believe they did; I can only speak from experience.

81. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen. Taking the question of Sunday music, are you aware that it is prohibited in London in the public-houses on Sunday evening?—I believe it is; it is prohibited at Salford, near Bolton.

82. Is not the prohibition in Salford, and also Birmingham, under the Local Improvement Act?—Yes.

83. Therefore, if it should be objectionable to have Sunday evening music in Bolton, that prohibition could be obtained by a local Act without having recourse to the restrictions of this Bill?—Decidedly.

84. With regard to Mr. Soame's Bill, should you say that there was a large manifestation of public opinion in Bolton in favour of that Bill?—No, I do not think that there was. If my report serves me rightly, the petitions that were presented from Bolton were principally signed at day schools, and places of that sort. I think there was no general petition from the inhabitants in its favour.

85. Was there a petition from the town council?—Yes, there was.

86. Was it signed by all the town council?—It was signed by the mayor on behalf of the council; but the town council do not always represent public opinion exactly.

87. Was it formally adopted by the majority of the town council?—It was formally adopted in a meeting of the council.

88. Do you think that that fairly represents public opinion of those who return the town council?—I do not think it does. I think that the town council does not represent public opinion at all upon Sunday questions, for they are elected for political reasons merely; and we are the result of that, that when they get to their offices we are apt to disagree with them upon almost every social question that they raise. I would give the Committee an instance that occurred about five or six months ago. We have a very fine park in Bolton, and the question was proposed to the council that this should be open on Sunday morning as well as Sunday afternoon and evening, and the council decided that motion; but by the time of their next monthly meeting, public opinion had so changed upon them as to induce them to rescind their former resolution, and the park is now open on Sunday. Last week they decided by a majority that there should be no refreshments of any kind sold in the park on Sunday; but I find public opinion is just taking the same form as it was upon the other question, and very likely at the next meeting they will be induced to rescind also.

89. As a general rule, you tell me that the mayor is elected with reference to his opinions upon the great political questions of the day and with regard to his views upon these kind of questions?—Yes; all of our municipal elections proceed entirely upon political grounds. We are divided into two sides, the Conservatives on one side, the Reformers on the other, and it is simply a case of a man is either a Conservative or a Reformer that he gets into the council.

90. Then this question of greater restriction is not been before the public of Bolton in such a manner as to be a prominent or a leading question at the municipal elections?—It has not. It has never interfered with our elections at all.

7191. Mr. Evans. I think you mentioned that persons coming home by trains on Sunday evenings; do many of them arrive after 10 o'clock at night?—Very few of them; there are some excursionists that do, but not as a rule.

7192. So that they would be in before 10 o'clock?—The latest of them would be in, I should say, as a rule, about half-past nine.

7193. You were asked about the number of householders; the mayor, I think, stated in round numbers about 13,000, and you say it is 16,000; would that difference be explained, supposing the female householders were included in one return and not in the other?—I do not think it would; I think that the mayor was mistaken; in fact, he was not posted up in his figures, and he as good as said so.

7194. Mr. John Abel Smith. You say that you have devoted a good deal of attention to the condition of the people of Lancashire?—I have.

7195. How have you done so?—By observation in my own town, by going amongst the people and being connected with some of their movements; and I have been generally a close observer.

7196. You have had no peculiar connection with the labouring class in any way, have you?—No, except in general movements, political movements, and in a few social movements.

7197. What were you formerly in Bolton?—I formerly was in business as a master printer.

7198. That business was not successful, was it?—No, it was not successful.

7199. Then you went to Manchester, did you not?—Yes.

7200. What did you do in Manchester?—I was employed at the "Manchester Guardian" office, as reader in the news department, at the general printing establishment. I had the pleasure of reading the "Alliance News" for two years as proof reader.

7201. And then you went back to Bolton?—Yes.

7202. Were you not the editor of a paper once?—If you call it a paper I was; but it was merely a humorous periodical in the Lancashire dialect.

7203. Which was called the "Bolton Luminary," I think?—Yes.

7204. How long did that exist?—Some eight or 10 years.

7205. You say there are three papers in Bolton?—Yes, the "Chronicle," the "Guardian," and the "Evening News."

7206. And you are attached to the staff of the "Evening News"?—I am.

7207. It is the "Guardian" that is devoted to the cause of the non-drinking party?—Yes, the proprietor of the "Guardian" is a total abstainer. In fact, he was formerly secretary to the British Temperance League; but the paper does not very commonly advocate the question; they meddle with it as little as they possibly can, I can tell you, because they do not find that it will go down with the working classes; and they are anxious that the Liberal side of the working classes should read their paper, I suppose.

7208. Is your paper on the Liberal side?—Yes.

7209. What is the "Chronicle"?—The "Chronicle" is in a kind of transition state at present; it has been Conservative, but, politically speaking, it is neither fish, flesh, nor fowl at present, if I may use the expression.

7210. Chairman.

Mr.
J. T. Staton.

1868.

Mr.
J. T. Staton.
1868.

7210. Chairman.] It calls itself Conservative?—By courtesy only. It has given very great dissatisfaction, mainly with regard to the Irish Church question, to the Conservatives, I expect. It is more an independent paper now, I should say.

7211. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Not one of those papers, as I understand you, has found any fault with the movements of the teetotal or non-drinking part of the population?—We never find any fault with them, neither do we advocate their theories.

7212. Have they ever, any one of them, expressed any opinion as to the unfairness, or incompleteness or insufficiency of any canvass that has been made?—No, not that I am aware of.

7213. Do not you think that if it had been thought to be so, they would have noticed it?—No, I do not think they would, because they like to keep clear of these questions. I know from experience, that as much as possible they keep their fingers off them; they do not increase their popularity by meddling with them.

7214. Would you do me the favour of looking at this; that is a statement from the "Guardian," is it not (handing a paper to the Witness)?—This is from the "Bolton Guardian."

7215. But is it not a report of a public meeting?—Yes, I suppose it is.

7216. Did your paper make a report of that meeting?—Not so full as that.

7217. But you did make a report?—Yes.

7218. And did the "Chronicle" do the same?—Yes.

7219. And without making any adverse remark upon it?—We made no comment in any way; we simply gave a report of the proceedings impartially, without reference to either party.

7220. Should not you consider that, upon any other question, it was quite conclusive that there was a very large proportion of the inhabitants of Bolton in favour of those opinions?—If you mean from the fact of the paper not having said anything against it, knowing what I do know upon that subject, I should say it is not conclusive of anything of the kind; because I know that the papers in Bolton like to keep from meddling with the question at all.

7221. I ask you whether or not, in reference to every other question, it would not be conclusive as to the fact that a large proportion of the population are in favour of it?—In a general sense it would.

7222. Has there been any movement or meeting, private or public, against the teetotallers, or the Sunday closing party?—No.

7223. Do not you think that curious?—No; because they never do meet in Bolton in opposition to anything of the kind. We allow other parties to meet as often as they like, but we never have any counter-demonstrations; but I believe there would be some counter-demonstrations if this Bill were carried. I believe, generally, the people in Bolton run away with the idea that it will not be carried; they think it is too preposterous.

7224. Do not you think that if they felt that it was so preposterous, they might have made some exertions to prevent its passing?—I believe that if a petition was got up against it, it would be very numerously signed.

7225. Why have they not done so?—I cannot answer that question; I have not read anything upon it.

7226. The present Mayor of Bolton is a teetotaler, is he not?—Yes.

7227. And the last Mayor of Bolton was teetotaler?—Yes, he was.

7228. Does that not look as if there was really a feeling in favour of that cause in Bolton?—It does not.

7229. What does it say?—It says nothing further than this; that in the case of two men who have been officially connected with the borough for a large number of years, there is a general idea that they were entitled to the mayorship from the fact of long service; but there are a great many people in Bolton at the present time who are not satisfied with the present mayor's reference to these matters.

7230. But they have not given any expression to it?—Only by talking in company privately by any public demonstration.

7231. Do you doubt the fact that the restrictions at present existing are in favour of temperance?—I think that restrictions of that kind do not produce temperance at all. I think the improvement in the habits of the people has resulted from the facilities afforded by the railways going out into the country; and by the liberality of the press introducing cheap literature, and that has been a great deal of reading, and I think the people cannot read without being improved; I attribute the improvement of the people of Bolton to the fact of there being a good many cheap newspapers to read, and the facilities for rail travelling. I do not think that Sunday restrictions have had much to do with it.

7232. Do not you think that the existing restrictions have tended to diminish drunkenness?—I do not think they have.

7233. Has Bolton accepted or carried into effect the restriction which closes public-houses at one o'clock in the morning, and which prevents them remaining open all night?—It has.

7234. Do you think that has been beneficial?—I think it has.

7235. Why do you think so?—Because there have been less brawls in the street at night; people cannot stay out so late, of course.

7236. Has not restriction been useful to the whole of the population. There were no dissentient voices; even those most opposed to further restrictions on Sundays went in for it; the Methodists and all were in favour of it.

7237. Then, as a whole, the already existing restrictions are cheerfully accepted?—Yes; nobody complains about them.

7238. Why do you think that further restrictions would not be cheerfully accepted?—I do not think that inference from what I hear expressed by the public on all sides daily.

7239. What do you recollect about Mr. Vason Patten's Bill?—I recollect nothing further about it than that the public-houses were obliged to be closed at 10 o'clock on Sunday evening, and there were a great many expressions of dissatisfaction in Bolton.

7240. But there was nothing like disorder or public resistance?—No, I do not think there was anything of the sort; but it was generally disagreed with, and the people were very angry when it was done away with.

7241. You have given certain numbers as to the cases of drunkenness in Bolton; that in 1862 there were 907 people taken up; and in 1863 there were 668?—Yes.

Mr.
J. T. Staton.
1868.

7242. Can you tell me the reason of that sudden drop?—I cannot.

7243. In the other years there is a small reduction year by year, but there there is a very great drop; what is the reason of that?—I cannot tell; I do not know what there might be in existence especially at that time, but those are the figures taken from the books, showing a diminution of at least 20 per cent.

7244. Do you know what orders are given to the police in Bolton with regard to dealing with drunken people?—Not precisely; but the understanding has been for some time that they should make no man up for being drunk unless he was incapable of going home or was creating a breach of the peace, but I believe they carry it out further now; they do not confine themselves to that; they are rather more strict, I believe, and parties are taken up now, some of them, if they are only found staggering as it were.

7245. When was the number of the police increased?—I should think about six months ago; it is only just come into force.

7246. Do you recollect what effect Mr. Wilson Patten's Act had upon the number of drunken cases?—I do not.

7247. Do you know how long it was in operation?—About 12 months I believe.

7248. If that was the case, have you never looked at it as if you wanted to understand it?—I have not; I have never paid attention to the figures on the subject.

7249. Although you have paid considerable attention to the working of those laws upon the working population?—I have a very vivid recollection of the matter, and the state of public opinion with regard to this question at the time when the Act was in force, but I am not in possession of any statistics of the cases of drunkenness or crime within that particular year.

7250. Do you believe that drunkenness is in proportion to the opportunities of drinking?—I do not believe that exactly; I believe that parties will make opportunities if they want drink. I think that sobriety is created not by restriction but by education and the moral improvement of the people; that is my view of it.

7251. What religious denomination do you belong to?—The Unitarians.

7252. With regard to those music licenses, do you find a large number of young men and young women attending those houses?—Not a great quantity, but a fair proportion.

7253. Do not you think that that is excessively injurious to their morals, and very dangerous to the well-being of those young people?—I think that if they did not go to those rooms they would go to other places.

7254. What do you mean by other places?—Other public-houses where there was no music.

7255. You think that those young people are not tempted there?—I do not think they are.

7256. You do not consider it a temptation to those young men to attend houses having music?—I do not think it is very much; it may be to some of them, but I think that generally, if there were no music in those public-houses they would go elsewhere.

7257. And, generally speaking, you give an opinion, whatever it may be worth, against further restriction?—Just so. I simply give my own opinions from the observations that I have made of the public around me.

7258. Were you sent for to appear before this Committee, or is it a voluntary attendance?—I was sent for.

7259. By whom?—I got a subpoena from Sir James Fergusson. I was asked, as a gentleman occupying a neutral position in Bolton, as belonging neither to the publican interest on the one hand, nor to the teetotal interest on the other; as a man connected with public affairs for the last 20 years, I was considered to be one who could speak to the feeling of the town.

7260. Were you supposed to be in favour of the publican interest?—The party who spoke to me did not know what side I was on.

7261. Were they connected with the publican interest?—No; the gentleman who spoke to me had no connection whatever with that interest.

7262. Mr. Baines.] You stated that you believed that there is less liquor drunk where music is employed, than there would be where there was no music?—I believe that there is; I do not think that they go to such places so much for drinking as for enjoyment.

7263. May I ask you for what motive do publicans introduce music, if it does not cause more drinking; if it causes less drinking, would not it diminish their profits?—Of course it would; but I think that it perhaps operates as an attraction to bring more people to their houses, instead of going elsewhere.

7264. Is not that rather opposed to what you have said; I understood you to say that there was less drinking in consequence of music being introduced, whereas now, I think you say, that music tends to bring them to those places where, of course, they drink?—It has a tendency to bring them there in preference to going to other houses, where they might find nothing to do but drink.

7265. Is it not quite certain that the motive of the publican in introducing music is to get the people there?—To get more of them to his house.

7266. And to get them to drink?—Yes.

7267. He gets no benefit by the music, does he?—No.

7268. He gets a benefit solely by the sale of drink?—Yes.

7269. Therefore, he can have no possible motive, can he, but to sell as much drink as possible?—No, and to bring as many customers to his house of an evening in preference to their going elsewhere.

7270. Do you think that many persons share your opinion, that those places where there is music on Sunday are beneficial rather than injurious?—I believe that there are a great many people who share that opinion.

7271. Do not you believe that there are a good many people who think otherwise?—Yes, a great many.

7272. I will just ask you with regard to persons who are employed voluntarily without pay, from year to year in teaching in Sunday schools, and who feel interested in the welfare of the people; what do you think is their opinion upon this subject?—I think they are decidedly opposed to such places.

7273. You say that you have been in the habit of attending those places for nearly 20 years, and I took it down that you had only seen one or two drunken persons in them during those 20 years?—I said that I had been in the habit of occasionally dropping in at those places to see the things that were going on. I have not been an habitual

Mr. J. T. Staton. habitual attender; I cannot remember that I ever saw any drunkenness going on in them, nor any drunken brawling, the company generally seem to be well-conducted and well-behaved persons.

7274. What do you think is the probable result upon young persons, upon Sunday scholars, for instance, of going and spending the Sunday evening in places where drinking is going on around them?—I do not agree with young people going into public-houses to spend their time at all.

7275. You think it is a demoralisation?—I think it is injurious to young persons, but I take the fact as it is, that they do go, and they would go under this Bill that is now before the Committee.

7276. Does it follow that if you close those public-houses and music saloons on Sunday evening, there would be no place of the kind to go to?—If you close them altogether there would not, of course.

7277. That is the very object which it is proposed by this Bill to accomplish, that they should be closed altogether for consumption on the premises?—I think, as far as young people go, it would have a tendency to prevent them, of course, but I think it would drive people to evade the law.

7278. Have you any figures to give us to show that the opinion which you have formed that the cases of drunkenness generally occur on Sunday morning is a correct opinion?—I have not examined the figures; I have my information from parties who know the facts of the case, but I have no figures to show; the police returns will tell that.

7279. Have you any figures to show that there has been an increase in illicit drinking on Sunday in Scotland; you expressed an opinion that there had been?—No; I have no figures. I merely was alluding to something which I had read in the "Alliance" newspaper some two or three years ago.

7280. Just allow me to ask whether you are aware that evidence has been given that not only have the cases of drunkenness in Scotland been exceedingly, remarkably, and, I may say, suddenly diminished, since the introduction of the Forbes Mackenzie Act, on the Sunday, on the Monday, and on all days of the week; but are you also aware that the quantity of spirits and intoxicating liquors sold is very much diminished?—I have seen that statement in the paper.

7281. If that is so, it is not possible that there should be that amount of illicit drinking which you indicate?—I have seen a counter-statement in the paper, to the effect that a good deal of smuggling goes on in Scotland, and that might account for it.

7282. Have you any evidence upon the point?—No.

7283. You, as a public man, must know that we must govern ourselves by Parliamentary and other papers and returns, and I dare say you know what the general character of those returns is; do not you think that it is reasonable if we found that those returns confirmed the statement which I have just been making to you, to believe in them?—Certainly; I do not say to the contrary.

7284. You have mentioned something with regard to clubs being held in public-houses; are you aware that the treasurers of a number of those clubs which are held at public-houses are publicans themselves?—In a great many instances, to my certain knowledge, they are.

7285. Is not that rather a strong reason for their being held so much at public-houses, when there is that identity of interest between the publican and the club, instead of removing them to other places; would not the mere interest of the treasurer and the influence which he has over the club sufficiently account for their being kept there rather than removed to places which might, on other grounds, be considered less objectionable?—No, I do not think that is the reason at all. I think the publicans themselves have very little influence in those clubs; they very seldom go into the meetings; they are members, but with very small influence. The feeling of the working men is decidedly in favour of meeting in places where they can have a little refreshment; because I have known one or two of those clubs when they have gone away from the public-houses to have been compelled to come back again; they could not get their members together at all in private places, apart from the public-house influence altogether.

7286. Are you aware of having seen in the public papers, which, as a public man, I am inclined to think you will be aware of, that it has been made a matter of complaint against clubs of that kind, that they do tend to promote drinking?—I have seen that statement.

7287. That kind of complaint, if I recollect rightly, prevailed for a great many years very extensively; I think I have seen statements from official men, some of which were in the newspapers, is not that so?—Yes.

7288. And you, as a public man, must have heard of them?—Yes; there have been complaints made by parties who put the opposite view of the thing; the teetotallers began to complain about it; but with all their complaints they have not induced the working classes to leave the public-houses; they have stuck to the public-houses for their meetings still.

7289. Still I think you do not deny, that, comparing the present with the immediately previous law, the restriction has worked beneficially?—I do not object to it.

7290. That is a great restriction as compared with the year 1831 or 1839, whereas then public-houses might be open nearly the whole 24 hours on Sunday, now they can be open only eight hours; do not you think that that must have had a good effect?—I have no doubt it has had a good effect. The public generally are disposed to accept the present law as a good law; they are quite satisfied with it as it is at present.

7291. You stated, did you not, that the present town council was not elected with any reference to the liquor question?—No, they are not elected with any reference to the liquor question.

7292. May we not consider that the decision which they have come to on that liquor question is more unprejudiced than if they had been elected with reference to it?—I think that the decisions come to are simply the opinions of the members themselves, but my argument was that they do not represent the feelings of the town or the opinion of the town; and I gave an instance where the town had, as it were, compelled them to reverse their decision, because they had gone against it upon the matter of going into the park on Sunday.

7293. But that is not connected with the liquor question?—It has a slight bearing upon 7294. Chairman.] Did the town council try to close the park on Sunday?—Yes; it was closed from Saturday until a certain hour on Sunday afternoon. A resolution was rejected that they should open the park, but public opinion was so strong during the month that they found it convenient to rescind their resolution.

7295. Mr. Baines.] But my observation upon that is, that it has nothing whatever to do with this question?—My proposition is, that the town council does not represent public opinion upon those questions. There are nothing but political considerations enter into our municipal elections, so that it is not a very great wonder to find the town council differing from the bulk of the people on social questions, which we do frequently find to be the case.

7296. It is exceedingly undesirable that we should have anything of a political or party character introduced here; and it is not with reference to that that I ask, but with reference to the opinions upon the subject of Sunday closing. Mr. Samuel Pope, I believe, who has taken a very active part indeed in favour of Sunday closing, was a candidate, was he not, for Bolton at the last election?—Yes.

7297. Did he run the present Members, who were returned, very close?—I cannot exactly remember the figures; all I know is, he did not succeed in getting in.

7298. That I assumed when I stated to you that he was a candidate, and I asked you if he ran hard the Members who were returned. Is the candidate brought forward by his party at present; I do not care which side that is; but is he now brought forward again?—He is not yet.

7299. It is rumoured so, is it not?—Yes, it is rumoured, but he is not formally invited, nor has he accepted; he has been spoken about, that is all you can say.

7300. Mr. Locke.] At present I believe the members are upon the one-and-one system; one is a Conservative, and the other is what is called Liberal?—Yes.

7301. And you say, as I understand you, that that question has never been raised at Bolton?—Not at the municipal elections; it has at the Parliamentary elections.

7302. Upon the occasion alluded to by the honourable Member for Leeds?—Yes; and I am afraid it proved fatal to Mr. Pope.

7303. What were Mr. Pope's political principles when he came forward?—He came forward as a reformer, but he was objected to by a great many on account of the position that he held with regard to the Permissive Bill; they will tell you to this day, in Bolton, that Mr. Pope lost his chance on account of his being connected with that Bill; it is a matter of common belief in Bolton.

7304. What are Mr. Pope's politics?—I think it is what you may call a radical, rather than an ordinary reformer.

7305. He was in favour of the Permissive Bill?—Yes.

7306. And he was not successful?—No, he was not.

7307. You have been asked with regard to persons going into those music places on Sunday evening, being induced to drink more than was right, but I understood you to mean this, that when persons go into a place where there is music they drink less; that they do not go there expressly for the purpose of drinking but to hear the music, therefore they drink less than if they were to go into a public-house where there was no music?—That is my opinion.

7308. If a publican induces six persons to go there in place of one, probably there would be more liquor consumed by the six than the one would consume, but still each individual would drink less?—That is the idea which I wish to convey to the Committee.

7309. You have been asked about the publicans being the treasurers of those different societies; are the publicans at Bolton, as a body, respectable persons?—They are.

7310. Might not this be an inducement to those societies to make them their treasurers, that they might be sure that their money would be safe in their hands?—There is no doubt that money is safe in their hands, and I do not remember an instance to the contrary; it never has proved otherwise. It is a matter of great convenience to have the publicans as the treasurers; for this reason, that when money is to be applied for for any purpose, they are always to be found at home, and they can easily accommodate them; but if they were to have a person who worked at some foundry or a cotton mill, he could not always be got at.

7311. In point of fact, the publican then acts as a species of banker?—Just so.

7312. And his banking-house is at the public-house?—Yes.

7313. Whereas, if they had merely a room, the room might be shut up when they went?—Yes.

7314. And would only be open as you say, upon the occasions when the parties wanted to meet there?—That is all.

7315. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] To clear up one point about the evidence which you gave with regard to the newspapers, I suppose, that one object of the editor of a newspaper is to keep on good terms with all parties, so as to maintain and increase the circulation of the paper?—Just so, or always to keep on good terms with the political party whose views he promotes.

7316. The absence of any editorial comments upon that temperance meeting might possibly be accounted for by a desire not to offend on the one hand those good and earnest men who believe that temperance would be promoted by further restrictions; and on the other hand, those equally honest men, who believe that restrictions would not improve the tone of public morality?—I believe that that is the feeling.

7317. Colonel Fane.] You have given a good deal of evidence about those musical parties at public-houses in the evening of Sunday; and we have had some evidence that psalms, and such things, are sung in public-houses in various places on Sunday; is that the case in Bolton?—I never heard a song sung in a public-house on a Sunday in Bolton, nor did I ever hear tell of such a thing; I believe such a thing would be cried down at once.

7318. Was the character of the music invariably secular, or was it the reverse?—I never heard heard any singing in public-houses at all, and I never heard tell of it; it is all instrumental music, principally operatic selections, and some sacred music; I have heard all Mozart's 12th Mass played, but it is merely instrumental.

7319. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You never heard other words sung to sacred music?—I have never heard any singing at all in a public-house on Sunday, and I do not think the public would tolerate it; it is all instrumental music.

7320. Chairman.] Is the music supposed to be a tolerably good class, or is it poor stuff at the public-houses?—It is tolerably good; they have operatic selections and overtures.

7321. I mean is the music supposed to be tolerably good in its performance?—It is such that you would not pay sixpence to hear at a concert but at the same time it seems to suit the popular taste.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

DUNCAN M'LAREN, Esq., a Member of the House; further Examined.

22. Mr. Roebuck.] HAVE you some explanation which you wish to give to the Committee in respect to your former evidence?—There are two points which I wish to explain. In answer to Question 2666, I said that the origin of the Forbes Mackenzie Act, which has been so much talked of, resulted from the Edinburgh meeting of magistrates in 1852. I wish to be allowed to explain, in modification of that statement, that in 1850 Lord Kinnauld brought in a Bill for the same purpose, and carried it through the House of Lords, but it was rejected in the House of Commons on the 16th of July 1850. In 1851, Lord Kinnauld carried through another Bill for the same purpose in June 1851, but it was rejected by the House of Commons in July 1851, and those Bills may, therefore, be said to have been in some degree the origin of the legislation; but the feeling was so strong against the possibility of these Bills being passed in the House of Commons that nothing was attempted in the Session of 1852; and then came the proceedings of the Edinburgh meeting of magistrates, the results which flowed from it, which tended to change the current of public feeling in Scotland; and then an effort was made in 1853, which was successful. The Bill of 1851 was objected to by nearly all the Liberal Members, Mr. Hume, Mr. Ewart, Lord Duncan, Mr. Fearns, and Mr. Elliot. In order to show the unanimity of the feeling at that time, in 1851, according to Hansard, "Mr. Hume said, that the Bill was objected to by almost every man in Scotland, and that Honourable Gentlemen did not know the annoyance which he had experienced in continually having to receive deputations requesting him to oppose it." My statement, I think, was substantially correct in spirit, that it was the proceedings in Edinburgh in 1852 which changed the current of opinion in Scotland, and, therefore, may have been said correctly enough to have been the origin of the Act of 1853. The other matter which I wish to correct is that, in my answer to Question 2668, I said that the Edinburgh committee framed a draft Bill, which they gave in charge to Lord Kinnauld and Mr. Forbes Mackenzie, and that those gentlemen carried through the Act. I wish to explain that the draft Bill prepared in Edinburgh was given to those gentlemen in 1850 or 1851, with reference to the two former Bills that I have mentioned; but the Edinburgh committee sent up a deputation in 1853 to help to perfect the Act, which was ultimately passed, and they did what they could to promote it; but Lord Kinnauld was certainly the main author of the Act, and had far more to do with preparation than either the Edinburgh committee or Mr. Forbes Mackenzie, or anyone else.

7323. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You have made one omission in your statement; to be quite clear, were not Lord Kinnauld's Bills of 1850 and 1851 for closing on Sunday?—They were.

D. M'Laren,
Esq., M.P.

1868.

Captain HENRY SEGRAVE, called in; and Examined.

324. Chairman.] You are Chief Constable of Wolverhampton, are you not?—Yes.

325. Are you aware of the provisions of the Act before this Committee?—I am.

326. Will you state to the Committee whether you are in favour of the change proposed?—I think that the present Act works very satisfactorily, and I am not in favour of the change proposed.

327. Why do you think that any increased restriction is inexpedient?—For the simple reason that Wolverhampton is so situated that it stands between what is described as the mining district of Staffordshire and the agricultural district. As a rule, on Sundays in fine weather the whole of the population of Wolverhampton and of the towns of the neighbourhood go out into the country, and they return to Wolverhampton at a very late hour in the evening. As long as they can remain in the country they remain, and they return to Wolverhampton from 10 to half-past 10; and I consider that it would be a hardship upon the working classes, who appear to me, as far as I can judge, to be sober, to deprive them of what may be considered as necessary refreshment at that hour.

7328. You say that the working classes of Wolverhampton, as a rule, are sober in their habits?—I think that they are very sober.

7329. And

Captain
H. Segrave.

Captain
H. Segrave.

1868.

7329. And do those people who go to the country on excursions on Sunday and return in the evening generally return sober?—I think they do.

7330. There is not any general complaint of many people coming back in a state of insobriety?—On the contrary, the Sunday is a remarkably quiet day in Wolverhampton and the district round.

7331. Can you state to the Committee whether there is a greater number of persons brought up for drunkenness on Monday morning than on other days of the week?—No, there is not. I have got statistics of drunkenness for the last 10 years, and they show a decrease in the number, and I may say a very great decrease when we consider the increase in the population.

7332. Have you those statistics in a concise form?—I have.

7334. Can you give us the numbers between Saturday at 12 midnight and Sunday at 12 midnight, and also from Sunday 4 a.m. to Monday 4 a.m.?—Yes.

7335. In the first case, the Saturdays and Sundays might be mixed, but in the second case they are distinguished?—Yes.

7336. Will you state to the Committee the general effect of that return?—We calculate that the population of Wolverhampton increases 1,000 per annum.

7337. What is the present population?—About 68,000. In the 12 months ending the 3rd of May 1858, when our population was 58,000, there was a total of 198 persons arrested and summoned from Saturday at 12 midnight until Sunday at 12 midnight. From Sunday, 4 a.m. until Monday, 4 a.m. there were 107.

7338. Mr. Roebuck.] Will you take the first of the 10 years and the last of the 10 years?—In 1868, up to the 3rd of May, the population being 68,000, the total number arrested and summoned is 103; that is, from Saturday at 12 midnight to Sunday at 12 midnight, and from Sunday, 4 a.m., to Monday, 4 a.m., the total arrested and summoned is 55.

7339. Chairman.] So that there is an actual diminution, although the population has increased?—There is a decrease of 65 in number.

7340. Will you put in that return?—Yes. (The same was delivered in, vide Appendix.)

7341. You have told us that you thought that it would be a hardship that persons resorting to the country on Sunday, as it is the habit of the people in Wolverhampton to do, should find no places of refreshment open on their return; but would they not be able to get their refreshments before they return?—I think not; and my impression, from the experience I have had, is that the Bill, if passed, would encourage what I think highly objectionable; that is to say, a very large amount of private drinking.

7342. Mr. Roebuck.] By private drinking, I suppose you mean illicit drinking?—Yes.

7343. Chairman.] Why would they not be able to get refreshment either in the villages which they have gone or while they are returning?—If the Bill passed, I conceive that they would not be able to get refreshments at different public houses along the road.

7343*. They would be travellers still, would they not?—Possibly they would be, but we cannot out the law so very strictly in that neighbourhood, that, even in the case of travellers by railway on Sunday, we are very often obliged to send a police officer to obtain admittance for them at the public-houses; they will not admit that they are travellers.

7344. Is that on account of the strictness of the interpretation put upon the Act by the magistrates in Wolverhampton?—I think that the Act has a very strict interpretation put upon it by the magistrates in Wolverhampton, and I think that it is extremely well carried out.

7345. You think that the case of those excisionists would not be met by the exception in favour of the traveller?—I think that it would not; I think that it would occasion a great deal of difficulty.

7346. Are there any complaints made against the law as it stands?—I have not heard any.

7347. Do you think that drunkenness has decreased on Sundays on account of the restricted hours?—I think that drunkenness has decreased generally through the district, in consequence of the improved habits of the people. I do not think that the law has had any effect in producing that result. I think that the people are becoming very much more provident and better educated, and the law has been better observed in consequence of their improved habits.

7348. Do you mean that there is a very strict observance of the public-houses on Sunday?—It is as strict as it is possible to be with a limited police force in a very large town.

7349. You do not think that the law is much evaded?—I do not think so. I think that the law is evaded not in public-houses so much as in beer-houses. I think that the beer-houses require looking after a great deal more than the public-houses. So far as the publicans in Wolverhampton are concerned, their desire, I think, is to conform to the law.

7350. Mr. Roebuck.] How long have you held the office of chief constable?—Eleven years.

7351. And during those 11 years you say that you have witnessed a marked improvement in the habits and manners of the people?—I have.

7352. And you attribute that not so much to the operation of restriction as to the operation of improved education?—I do.

7353. Can you give me any opinion of the general views of the working classes at Wolverhampton; have you formed any opinion as to their wishes respecting this Bill?—I think that they are pretty equally divided. As far as petitions are concerned, I think it is very easy to get signatures to a petition pro or against. I have heard, and one or two officers under my control have told me, of one or two occasions where there have been speeches made against class legislation, but I put no trust in these things. I really think that the working classes of Wolverhampton have very little interest in the matter; I do not think that they really care much about it.

7354. You think that they are apathetic?—I think so.

Captain
H. Segrave.
1868.

355. Are they apathetic because they believe the Bill will not pass?—I cannot say that.

356. You cannot say whether that is the reason, or whether they are really indifferent in caring nothing about it?—I think that they are indifferent and care very little about it.

357. Do you suppose that if the thing were tried they would be still indifferent and not care about the result of the Bill?—I suppose it would cause some inconvenience to them at first, I think afterwards that they would bear it the same as any other law that would be passed; in a very short time they would do so.

358. Do you think that, possibly, they would for the entire closing altogether all the week?—I do not know that; I do not think they would. In fact, from the nature of the works in Wolverhampton and its neighbourhood, they require a certain amount of stimulant, because, working in iron-works before blazing fires all day, they require a certain amount of stimulant which they have been in the habit of taking, and they would be very seriously inconvenienced if they lost it.

359. Then you draw a distinction between Sunday closing and entire closing; you think that entire closing would cause discontent, and that closing on Sunday would not cause discontent?—I think that closing on Sunday would cause discontent to a great many, no doubt, because, according to reports which have been furnished to me, we have on the average at least 10 lodgers, who are little more than tramp lodgers; they come there for perhaps three or four days, or they may stop a week; and if they are to be prevented from having anything to drink, except in their lodging-houses, where perhaps six or seven families live in the same room, it would not only be extremely inconvenient, but they took the drink at the lodgings, they would object the lodging-house keeper to very severe penalties for allowing drinking in the house.

360. Why do you fancy that there would be increased illicit drinking in consequence of the restrictions proposed by this Bill?—There are always a certain large number of people in a town who like to have their drink on Sunday, and if they cannot get it in the public-house there are plenty of publicans and beer-house keepers that will supply them illicitly, and they will take it to their own homes. The effect would be this, that in the public-house or in the beer-house there is a certain amount of fear, or there is a certain amount of shame attached to getting drunk, whereas in their own houses that fear or shame would not affect them.

361. Do you think that the influence of the persons that they meet in a beer-house would be greater in keeping them sober, than the influence of persons that they meet in their own houses?—I do.

362. Do not you think that the influence of the wife and children might keep them sober?—I do not think it would.

363. But you think that the wife would be dragged in to get drunk, too, I suppose?—Unfortunately females are almost as bad as males, in some cases out of 10, I think.

364. It has been stated here by various persons who have given evidence, that men usually get drunk upon beer, and women on spirits; do you make that distinction?—No, I think they both generally get drunk on beer; at least in Wolverhampton I think that beer is what is generally drunk by the working classes.

7365. Speaking of the present state of Wolverhampton, you think that, from your knowledge of the workmen generally, you may consider them to be a sober well-conducted body of working men?—I think that the law is working very favourably now, and I do not think that an improvement would take place provided the proposed Bill was passed into a law.

7366. You think that it would be better to leave well alone?—I do.

7367. That is really the moral of your evidence?—That is the moral of my evidence.

7368. Mr. Horsfall.] The working classes of Wolverhampton, I think you said, have considered this Bill?—I understand that there have been petitions for and against.

7369. You think that there is considerable apathy upon the subject?—I do think so.

7370. Would there be any great objection to altering the hours at which the public-houses and beershops are open?—I think there would be an objection as far as this, that it would inconvenience a great majority of the public very considerably. At present I think that the decrease in drunkenness has gone on during successive years, and I think that it will go on so; I do not see anything to the contrary, and I think that there would be no possible advantage in restricting the hours. I do not think that it would decrease drunkenness to restrict the hours.

7371. Can you inform the Committee what is the relative number of cases of drunkenness as between men and women?—I cannot; I have not taken that out.

7372. You think that the great evil arises from the beer-houses?—Yes, I think so.

7373. Cannot you suggest any remedy for that?—I think that placing the beer-houses under the control of the magistrates would be a very great remedy.

7374. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] You stated that there is a great deal of apathy; I suppose that the working classes of Wolverhampton are pretty fully employed?—They are not fully employed; trade is, unfortunately, very bad in that district.

7375. I suppose a large portion of them are absorbed in their every-day occupations, and probably would not feel that restriction an inconvenience in anticipation, which might be a very great inconvenience when it came actually to be put in practice; I think that, unfortunately, Wolverhampton is very apathetic in most cases, and latterly, in almost everything, they do not seem to take much interest in public affairs, I think.

7376. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Who called you here as a witness before the Committee?—I was asked, as I was known to be an independent man, whether, if summoned, I would attend.

7377. Who asked you?—The Chairman of Licensed Victuallers Friendly Society.

7378. You volunteered your evidence?—I beg your pardon, I did not volunteer; I would much sooner not have been asked.

7379. You do not know who called you?—I was summoned to attend here, that is all I know about it. I was asked whether, if I was summoned, I would give evidence here, and I said that I would.

7380. As chief constable of Wolverhampton, did you consult the magistrates as to the propriety of your coming and giving evidence here?—No, I did not consult the magistrates generally; I have spoken to several magistrates upon the subject

Captain
H. Segrave,

subject as to their opinions about the Bill, but as to speaking to them generally, I did not, because I do not come to give the magistrates' opinion; I come simply to give my own.

7381. Did you speak by accident to Mr. Hartley?—I did not; Mr. Hartley rarely sits on the borough bench of Wolverhampton, therefore I did not see him.

7382. He is a gentleman of great influence in Wolverhampton, is he not?—He has some influence in the county, but he very rarely attends the borough bench, and therefore I did not see him to ask him upon this subject.

7383. Do you know the feeling of the magistrates of Wolverhampton with regard to this Bill?—I do not; I saw several of the magistrates, and, as far as I could gather of the opinions from them, there were several for the Bill, and as many against. One or two gentlemen who happened to be the owners of large manufactories in the town, and who are magistrates, were against the Bill; one in particular, who had lived a long time in America, and knows exactly how the Maine Liquor Law worked in that country, is decidedly against the Bill.

7384. How many magistrates attend generally?—About 12, I think.

7385. And how many do you think you have spoken to?—About six.

7386. You think they are half and half?—About that.

7387. I think I am right in supposing that you are a Roman Catholic?—I am.

7388. Have you read the evidence of the Archbishop of Westminster?—I have read portions of it.

7389. Do you know how strongly his feelings are antagonistic to yours?—That is very likely. I know that it is so.

7390. Is the Roman Catholic priest of Wolverhampton of the same opinion as yourself?—I do not know; I never consulted him upon the subject.

7391. How far are you, in Wolverhampton, from the Black Country?—We form a portion of the Black Country.

7392. Do you know any other part of England so wild as the Black Country, and so little amenable to law?—I do. There are many agricultural districts very much worse than the Black Country. I consider that the state of crime in the Black Country is extremely satisfactory; and it is considered to be the case also by other persons.

7393. But they are what you call a very rough body of men, are they not?—They are rough at times. On many occasions, and on a recent occasion when the Queen visited Wolverhampton, when there were perhaps 600,000 or 700,000 in the town, they proved themselves to be as amenable to order as any body of people in the United Kingdom.

7394. What makes you say that there were 600,000 or 700,000 in the town at that time?—That was the calculation that was made.

7395. Did they come from Birmingham in great numbers?—A great many.

7396. And you do not think that drunkenness prevails largely in the Black Country?—I think that it has decreased very considerably. In former years, before I became chief constable of Wolverhampton, I believe that drunkenness did prevail to a very great extent; but in the last four or five years I have remarked that drunkenness has very much decreased.

7397. Do you attribute any portion of that your own watchfulness and care?—No; I attribute it to the improved habits of the people.

7398. You probably have carefully observed the Black Country?—As far as the immediate neighbourhood of Wolverhampton is concerned, I have.

7399. Should you not say that the Black Country was a district in which further restriction on the habits of drinking and drunkenness would be eminently useful?—I speak merely the towns immediately in the vicinity of Wolverhampton, Bilston, and Willenhall. I do not speak of any other places, because I do not know them.

7400. You do not know the Black Country generally?—I know it very well; but as I am not about it on Sunday I cannot answer for the behaviour.

7401. Then you do not know the habits of the people?—I think they are very similar, but cannot speak from my own knowledge.

7402. But with regard to Wolverhampton, Bilston, and Willenhall, you know those places well?—I know those places well.

7403. At Bilston, do not you think that there might be better for a little more restriction of the drinking that goes on there?—I can or repeat my former answer, that I think that would encourage a very large amount of private drinking, which I think would be very much more objectionable than the present system.

7404. Could not the illicit drinking be stopped by the police?—The police in the different towns are not strong enough to stop it if they perform their legitimate duties.

7405. Do you mean that they can only stop after illicit drinking by the neglect of their other duties?—They would have to neglect other duties, I think.

7406. To go back to Bilston, do not you think that, as a rule, it is the common ordinary practice that a very large proportion of the wages of the men are drunk away on the Saturday and on the Sunday?—I think not now. I think that the men have become very much more provident and I judge from this, that some six or seven years ago I remember what is a very usual thing in Wolverhampton and that district, strikes occurring amongst the men of different factories and different works, and I remarked that after fortnight or three weeks on strike the men were starving. Now, with short work and a recent strike, because they have had a recent strike, although, certainly, it did not extend for an length of time, I find that the men are competent to keep themselves and to keep their families. I therefore, judge that they are very much more provident than they used to be.

7407. Do you know whether they did not receive assistance from other portions to enable them to continue the strike?—I believe that they had assistance to a very small extent. I know that they had for one week, and I know that the following week they did not receive it, because the unions were not able to pay it.

7408. And you do not believe that in the Black Country a considerable proportion of the weekly wages goes to the public-house on the Saturday and Sunday?—A portion, no doubt does go, but I do not think that a considerable portion goes.

7409. Would not the families of those men be very much better if that could be diminished?—Probably

Captain
H. Segrave.
1868.

Probably they would be better off; no doubt they would be.

7410. Do you know any other district in England where the intervention of a further restrictive law would be generally considered so useful as in the Black Country?—I cannot say that I do know another district.

7411. Do you believe that there is any other?—No, I cannot say as to other districts whether it would or would not.

7412. I asked you the question first, whether you know any other part of England where increased restrictive laws would do more good than in the Black Country, and you tell me that you do not know any other part?—I do not.

7413. You have also told me that you believe that great benefit would result if the expenditure of the wages in the public-house on Saturday and Sunday were diminished?—No doubt it would be productive of benefit.

7414. Have you had any indication of resistance to the law; has there been any expression of public opinion in Wolverhampton which has induced you to come up here?—No, none.

7415. How is the chief constable elected in Wolverhampton?—He is elected by the watch committee.

7416. Who are the watch committee?—Certain members of the town council.

7417. Have the publicans a great deal of influence with the watch committee?—They have none at all; there is no publican on it.

7418. The publicans, I suppose, had nothing to do with your election at all?—Nothing in the world.

7419. Do they take much interest in those elections?—I think none at all. I was elected 11 years ago. I came to Wolverhampton a perfect stranger. I knew not a dozen people in the town, and I certainly did not know a publican.

7420. When you are elected is your position for life?—My election and my holding the position is at the option of the watch committee.

7421. Have the watch committee the power of dismissing you, or of controlling you, as they think fit?—They have the power of dismissal if anything occurs which warrants dismissal, of course.

7422. Chairman.] What were you before you were appointed chief constable?—I was a captain in the army.

7423. Mr. John Abel Smith.] I suppose all these things come before the council, and are ratified by the council?—There is a report made every year of every thing that is done by the police, every offence that is committed by publicans, or against publicans, or drunkenness, and every other case that comes before them every year.

7424. Have you had many offences of publicans against the law, or beer-shop keepers during last year?—There were, I think, 11 offences committed by publicans, and about 25 committed by beer-house keepers.

7425. Were there any licenses taken away?—No, I have been 11 years there, and there has been only one license taken away during that period.

7426. How many beer-shops, and public-houses have you in Wolverhampton?—There are 218 public-houses, and 273 beerhouses.

7427. Four hundred and ninety-one drinking houses for a population of 62,000?—Yes; I can give the exact number of those that were fined. There were 11 publicans fined during the year 1867, and 17 beerhouse keepers.

7428. The number you have given would be a beer-house or public-house for every 136 of the population, would it not?—About that, I suppose.

7429. Is not that a very enormous number?—I consider that there are a great many too many beer-houses. Unfortunately, under the present beer-house system any person can take a beer-house, provided he can satisfy the landlord that he is competent to pay the rent, which I think is very objectionable.

7430. Must there not be a great deal of drinking in the town to supply the necessary profit to such a number?—I think that there is a great many of them that get no profit at all at present.

7431. What makes them go on then?—The wives keep the beer-houses, and the men work in the different factories; I am speaking especially as regards beer-houses. The men work in the different factories, and the different works in the neighbourhood.

7432. How many persons do you think are employed in each of those houses; would it be an exaggeration to say that there are three?—I should think that there would be three employed.

7433. Therefore, there are 1,500 people who are suffering from the present arrangement, who cannot have any holiday on the Sunday?—There are 1,500 people employed; I do not know whether they stop in the house or not on Sunday.

7434. You do not think that the inconvenience to them is worth consideration at all?—I do not know how to answer that question; it is a thing which I have never considered.

7435. I beg to recall your recollection to your main objection; as I understand you, your objection to this Bill was that it produced inconvenience to excursionists?—Not to excursionists. I think that it would produce inconvenience to the public at large. We have got no excursion traffic by railway in Wolverhampton at all on Sunday, but we have got 74 ordinary trains. The Sunday excursionists that I spoke of were persons who drive into the country; I am not speaking of excursionists by train, because we have no excursion traffic by train in Wolverhampton, but, as I say, we have 74 ordinary trains leaving and arriving at Wolverhampton on each Sunday.

7436. Do the people go by those trains?—Yes, a great many go by them.

7437. Then they practically are excursion trains?—They are run at ordinary fares, and so they are called ordinary trains.

7438. But they are trains by which persons are enabled to visit the district round?—Yes, and to visit their friends.

7439. Do a considerable number go?—I think a very large number go.

7440. Do the greater number drive?—A very large number drive into the country.

7441. Mr. Roebuck.] And some walk?—Yes, and some walk.

7442. Mr. John Abel Smith.] There cannot be a very large number that drive, can there?—Yes, a very large number. You would be astonished to see the number of vehicles of all descriptions that go into the country on Sunday.

7443. Does

Captain

1868.

7443. Does not that imply a very considerable amount of ease on the part of those people as regards means?—I do not know that it does that altogether; because there is a certain class of men in different factories, and if one man has a vehicle and a horse, he will lend it to those who work in the same factory to take them into the country.

7444. Do you think there are people working as weekly labourers or weekly workmen who have what you call traps?—No; I think that the weekly labourers amuse themselves by walking into the country.

7445. Then who are they who have these vehicles?—The better class of people connected with the different factories and the different iron works.

7446. What do you mean by the better class of people?—The better class of workmen.

7447. You mean practical workmen, weekly workmen?—The artisans in the different factories and in the different iron works. It is not an unusual thing for them, when trade is good, to get 3 l. and 4 l. a-week. I do not say that they get it now.

7448. And they keep traps?—A great many of them keep traps.

7449. Those people are, as far as drink goes, economical probably?—I think they are. I think that there is very little drunkenness among them.

7450. Do you think that drunkenness is in proportion to high wages or low wages?—I think that the amount of wages has a great effect upon drunkenness.

7451. Do you think that high wages produce drunkenness?—They produce more drunkenness than when trade is bad, certainly.

7452. Has there been a great increase in the poor-rates at Wolverhampton lately?—There was an increase last year owing to special causes.

7453. Was it the want of work?—No; it was the Queen's visit.

7454. Will you explain how the Queen's visit increased the rates?—There was a certain vote made for the Mayor, which was obliged to come in a certain way from the rates.

7455. But that had nothing to do with the ordinary habits of the town?—No, I think not; because the poor rate, I believe, this year is about the same now as it was two years ago.

7456. Do those people who get 3 l. or 4 l. a-week ever apply to the poor-rate?—I cannot say that they do. I do not know whether they do or do not.

7457. Have you ever had the curiosity to try and find out how many people in Wolverhampton go into the public-houses on the Sunday?—I have not.

7458. Did you ever go yourself into many public-houses on a Sunday?—I have been.

7459. What class of people did you find there?—A very respectable class; I have found a large number of people who work in the different shops, who are employed in shops and who live on the premises of the shopkeepers. They meet their friends on Sunday and have no place to ask them to have any refreshment, and they go into a public-house for the purpose.

7460. Of course you know and I do not, but do you mean to tell me that there are any large number of workmen living on the premises?—Not workmen, I am speaking of shopmen in different shops.

7461. And do those men go to public-houses?—They go to public-houses on Sunday because they cannot ask their friends into their masters house; their masters do not allow it.

7462. With regard to young women and young men, is there a large proportion of them who go to the public-house on Sunday?—Not on the Sunday, because the majority of what are called the large liquor vaults in Wolverhampton close on Sunday; we have several which are closed entirely on Sunday.

7463. Out of the 500 how many close on Sunday?—Seventeen public-houses and eight beerhouses close on Sunday out of the 500.

7464. That is 25 out of 500?—Yes.

7465. Do you know why they close?—I do not, except that they do not care to do business on Sunday. They are not inns; they are what are called liquor vaults; they probably consider that they would not be much frequented certainly on Sunday, and they close accordingly.

7466. But what makes you think that those liquor vaults would not be attended on Sunday?—I do not think that they are a class of houses which would be attended on Sunday, and in addition to that I think that the majority of the people who keep those large liquor vaults are situated in the centre of the town, and I do not think that they wish to do business on Sunday.

7467. Do you know why?—I do not; I never asked them that question, but I know that they close on Sunday.

7468. Have they any music on Sunday evenings in the public-houses at Wolverhampton?—No.

7469. Is there any local Act which forbids it?—No.

7470. Then they might, if they choose, have music on Sundays?—There is nothing to prevent it that I know of.

7471. Mr. Roebuck.] Is there not this to prevent it, that the magistrates could refuse the license?—Those houses are all licensed, and the question is whether the magistrates would be justified in taking it away.

7472. The next time they came for a license if they had music in their houses, would not it be the manner of the Wolverhampton magistrates to refuse the license because they had music?—I question whether the magistrates would have that power; it would be a subject of appeal. I think the magistrates would caution them against it, but it has never been the practice in Wolverhampton to have music; I have never seen an instance of the kind occur.

7473. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Can you form any estimate at all of the number who attend those houses on Sunday evening?—I cannot.

7474. What I gather from you is that in Wolverhampton the larger number of attendants at public-houses and beershops are of the more respectable class?—I think that on Sunday evenings the larger proportion of attendants at public-houses are of the respectable class.

7475. Where do you think the workmen go?—The workmen may go also, but I say the larger number.

7476. But there are a larger number of workmen, surely, than there would be of any other class?—Yes, I dare say probably there would be an equal division of both classes; but you do see on Sunday evenings a large number of respectable people at the public-houses.

7477. Are the employers of labour in Wolverhampton the cause of this singular state of morality

Captain
H. Segrave.

morality and sobriety at Wolverhampton?—I think they are.

7478. Have they taken a great deal of pains with their men?—I cannot say that.

7479. How are they the cause of it?—Because the reports each year which are written or published, and which they can see if they choose to read them, and a great number of employers of labour do take the trouble of reading, and they see that drunkenness has very much increased.

7480. Again I ask you whether you think that owing to anything done by the employers of labour?—I cannot say that it is.

7481. Do you think that the same remark could extend to the Black Country generally?—Of course I cannot speak from my own knowledge.

I can only say that I have had a good deal of communication with the chief constable at Birmingham, and it struck me that the same thing extended to Birmingham.

7482. Have you looked at any of the evidence given before this Committee?—I have.

7483. Have you seen the evidence of the Mayor of Birmingham?—Yes, I saw the evidence of the Mayor of Birmingham.

7484. What have you to say to that?—I have nothing to say to it.

7485. Do you consider that he is wrong or right?—I do not consider anything at all; I have no opinion to give on his evidence, of course.

7486. He gives a very strong opinion, does he not, as to the public feeling in Birmingham?—No doubt.

7487. But you do not think that that feeling extends to Wolverhampton?—I certainly think that the Mayor of Wolverhampton has not got that opinion.

7489. What is he?—He is a pawnbroker.

7490. Mr. Baines.] You say that of those who drink you think the females are nearly as bad as the males?—Yes, I do.

7491. Do they drink in public-houses or in beer-houses?—I speak of Saturday night more especially. I think that they drink both in public-houses and beer-houses; in fact, I consider, that the custom of the beer-houses, in many cases, is as great, if not greater, than the custom of the public-houses.

7492. Are you of opinion that it would be a benefit to close beer-houses on Sunday?—I should like to see, by a general Act of Parliament, the beer-houses placed under the control of the magistrates exclusively, as I think that would do away with the very large number that at present exists, and I consider it would be a very great advantage to the public if they were done away with.

7493. Did you say that there were 273 beer-houses in Wolverhampton?—Yes, 273 beer-houses, altogether.

7494. And you say that of public-houses and beer-houses together there are 491, with a population of 68,000. Mr. Abel Smith has drawn your attention to the fact, that there is one public-house or beer-house to every 136 inhabitants; of course that is men, women, and children, and if you take about five persons to a family, that would be about one public-house or beer-house to every 27 families in Wolverhampton, would not that be so?—Yes.

7495. You would consider that a very excessive number, would you not?—I consider that it is a very excessive number of beer-houses; I think that there are a great deal too many beer-houses.

7496. Are there any persons who drink in the public-houses and beer-houses in Wolverhampton who neglect their families?—There are many who appear constantly before the magistrates who are what are called habitual drunkards.

7497. You have said that you think that they would have more shame in drinking in a beer-house than they would in their own houses; do you think that they would be drinking beer in their own houses when their families were neglected and wanting food?—I do think so, if they could get it.

7498. You think that they would, in the presence of their wives and children, who were wanting food, be drinking beer in their own houses?—I do not know about wanting food, but I certainly think that they would drink in their own houses in the presence of their wives and children, if they had an opportunity of so doing.

7499. But I ask whether, with regard to those families who are now neglected, and who are, therefore, wanting food, the fact that they were, in the presence of the husband and father, wanting food, would not be a very important restraint upon him in his vicious propensities?—I cannot bring myself to believe that they would drink in public-houses when their wives and children are wanting food.

7500. I thought you said that there was a considerable number who neglected their families for the sake of drinking?—They are habitual drunkards who will get drunk, if they possibly can, and if they cannot get it by going to a beer-house or a public-house, they will get in their private houses, irrespective of their families.

7501. Do you think that the circumstances of the temptation, and the association with others of the same kidney with themselves, would have no influence at all in inducing them to drink more, and that the presence of their starving wives and children would have no influence in inducing them to drink less?—It might, if they were to drink by themselves; but, unfortunately, if they were to drink in their own houses, they would find plenty to join with them for the purposes of drinking.

7502. What is the opinion, as far as you know, of those who have most to do with young people and try to do them good; of Sunday school teachers, for instance?—I cannot say.

7503. Have you ever heard any opinion from them?—I have never asked and I have never heard.

7504. You say that there were petitions from Wolverhampton in favour of this Bill; do you know from whom they came?—No; I have heard that there were petitions.

7505. You do not know whether the ministers of religion have promoted them?—I cannot say.

7506. Or whether they are signed by Sunday school teachers?—I cannot say; I have heard that there were petitions both for and against, but who they were signed by I cannot say.

7507. Mr. Frederick Stanley.] You were asked just now whether you knew any district where restriction generally would be more beneficial than it would be in the Black Country, and you answered that you did not; how do you reconcile that with your former answer, that you considered the district fairly well conducted compared with others?—I cannot speak for other districts of my own knowledge; all I can speak of them is from hearsay.

7508. You were never in any other district before as chief constable, were you?—Not in an official capacity.

7509. Therefore, you answered the question merely as it was asked you, and not as giving in anywise an opinion attributable to yourself?—I could not give any opinion upon that.

7510. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Are you sure about the number which you have given of public-houses?—Yes, from the report which I have.

7511. Because, from the numbers which you leave for each public-house, one does not understand how they can live at all, or how you could have seen any large number on a Sunday in them?—The numbers are correct, I am certain; 218 and 273.

7512. And there are 25 shut on Sunday?—Yes; 17 public-houses and 8 beer-houses.

7513. That leaves something like 475 still open on Sunday?—Yes.

7514. That does not give above 140 persons to each public-house, men, women and children; does not that imply, instead of a state of sobriety at Wolverhampton, a singular amount of consumption?—It does not necessarily follow that there should be consumption, if the public-house or beer-house is open; because, in many cases, probably they open because other public-houses and beer houses in the same street open also.

7515. But they must live?—Yes; but in many cases, more especially with beer-houses, where the husband, the master of the house, works, and does his daily labour in the different factories, or in the ironworks around, his wife keeps the beer-house.

7516. Could you tell us whether or not of late years the number of public-houses and beer-shops have increased or diminished?—I can give you the number from 1863 up to the present date. In 1863 there were 215 public-houses and 225 beer-houses; in 1864 there were 214 public-houses and 210 beer-houses; in 1865 there were 215 public-houses and 224 beer-houses; in 1866 there were 219 public-houses and 249 beer-houses; and in 1867 there were 218 public-houses and 273 beer-houses.

7517. Then, the beer-houses have steadily increased?—Yes.

7518. Does that look as if it was a bad trade?—I do not think it is a proof that it is a good trade.

7519. Then, they go there for the pleasure of keeping a beer-shop?—No; a great many people take a beer-house, and they will take it with the idea and with the hope that it may possibly answer their purpose so to do, and that they may make money by it; and they will stop there, perhaps, three months, and they will leave it, in nine cases out of ten, in debt to everybody around them. Then another person comes and takes the beer-house; and consequently a beer-house may change its occupants, perhaps, four or five times in the course of a year.

7520. Still, in spite of all this, the number of beer-houses steadily increases in Wolverhampton?—Yes, the number has increased.

7521. In spite of the sober habits of the population?—Yes, the number has increased, certainly.

7522. Chairman.] I suppose that a good many people use public-houses and beer-houses in the town who do not live in the town?—Yes, a great many of them do, I believe.

7523. So that it is not only the 68,000 persons who keep all those houses?—Of course the population on one day is very much more than another.

7524. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do the Black Country people come in there much?—There are two market days in the week, and there is a very large concourse of people coming in from the Black Country round.

7525. Mr. Roebuck.] Did you ever have any means of taking a census of the town on those market days, as to how many people come in from the country?—It would be a very difficult thing to do, because so many people come in by the roads all round the country. We could tell those that come by rail, but by the roads from different parts of Shropshire and different parts of Staffordshire so many come in that it would be a very difficult thing to do.

7526. I suppose you know they make estimates of the number of people who pass Temple Bar on a day, and they make estimates of the number of people going into the City of London on a day; has there ever been any attempt to make an estimate of the number of people coming into Wolverhampton from the country on any day?—No, there has not.

7527. Mr. Horsfall.] How many miles round Wolverhampton does what is usually called the Black Country extend?—The Black Country extends from Wolverhampton to Birmingham, 13 miles.

7528. All on one side?—Yes; the agricultural district is entirely on the other side of Wolverhampton, and Wolverhampton stands between them.

7529. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] You were asked whether your police would not be able to stop any increase of illicit drinking which you imagine would take place if this Bill were passed; would not your police duties be enormously increased according to your idea?—According to the present calculation, we have got one police officer to every 900 of the population; and, taking as an average, that half of those police officers are on night duty, and consequently off duty in the day time, that would give at least 2,000 of the population to every police officer, and unless the number were at least trebled it would be impossible to do the duty.

7531. Do the magistrates of Wolverhampton claim the right of giving or withholding their sanction to a witness obeying the summons of the House of Commons, and coming to give evidence before a Committee?—No, I have never heard of such a case.

7532. Then you would not think it necessary to consult the whole of the 12 magistrates of Wolverhampton before complying with a summons of this House?—No, certainly not.

7533. You have been asked, as other witnesses have, with regard to the number of offences committed by drunkards. I suppose you have no record of the crimes committed by total abstinents?—No.

7534. Mr. Roebuck.] Are total abstinents often brought up in your country?—I cannot answer that question.

7535. Mr.

7535. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] Is there any foundation whatever for the suspicion which seems to be implied in one of the questions addressed to you, that the publicans had some influence in your appointment as chief constable, might have some influence upon your tenure of office?—I do not think there is the slightest.

7536. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Will you explain what you mean exactly by illicit drinking?—Illicit drinking I conceive to be drinking in their own houses; getting drink from public-houses, probably, or beer-houses and taking it to their own houses and drinking it there.

7537. Why is that illicit?—It is illicit to a certain extent; they encourage the publican or the beer-house keeper to sell them drink at hours and at times when they are not allowed.

7538. Then it is not merely drinking in their own houses, but drinking at forbidden hours?—At forbidden hours, getting drink from the publican.

7539. You do not consider it illicit, do you, that they should drink in their own houses whenever they think fit to do so?—Certainly not, if they have got it.

7540. But they get drink, you think, from the public-houses at hours when they ought to be shut up?—I do, and I think that they would do it more than at present.

7541. Do you not think that that could be stopped?—I think it is stopped in a great measure by the simple fact of the public-houses being open for a certain time for them to take their drink there.

7542. You think that the absence of restriction is more favourable to the morality and good conduct of those men than further restriction would be?—I think we should have very much more offences in the street provided there was more restriction.

Captain
H. Segrave.
18 June
1863.

Mr. JOHN WYBERGH, called in; and Examined.

7543. Chairman.] WHAT is your profession?—I am an Attorney-at-Law at Liverpool, and hold the appointment, under the Municipal Act, of clerk to the justices of that borough.

7544. You offered to give evidence to this Committee, did you not?—I did.

7545. Have you paid much attention to the subject before the Committee?—Very considerable attention; that is to say, to the laws which regulate the sale of drink in public-houses, and the licensing system generally.

7546. Have you observed carefully the provisions of the Bill which has been referred to this Committee?—I know their general tenor; I have not read them with very great accuracy so as to give a legal opinion upon them, but I know their general tenor is to shorten very considerably the hours of sale on Sundays.

7547. The object of the Bill is to shorten to four hours in the country and three and a-half in London the hours during which liquor may be sold for consumption on the premises?—Precisely so.

7548. Will you tell the Committee your opinion of the Bill as a matter of expediency?—My opinion is that such a measure as this now under the consideration of the Committee would entail considerable inconvenience upon the public, if passed into a law.

7549. And without a corresponding result of good?—Without a corresponding result of good. I have no faith whatever in restrictive laws on this subject.

7550. Do you mean, that by restrictive laws you cannot reduce the amount of crime arising out of drunkenness?—Precisely so. I mean to say that I have no faith in restrictive laws as remedies for drunkenness.

7551. Do you not consider that the present restrictions placed upon the sale of liquor do diminish the amount of drunkenness which would otherwise be the case?—I do not.

7552. Do you not think, for instance, that the closing of public-houses until one o'clock in the day on Sundays and after 11 at night, causes smaller amount of drunkenness than might be expected if they continued open for a longer period?—I very much doubt it; at least I do not think that it makes any very appreciable difference.

7553. In Liverpool it is the law as in Manchester, is it not, that the public-houses are closed at one o'clock in the night every day of the week except Sunday?—Yes, by adopting the Public-houses Closing Act they are closed from one till four.

7554. Does not that reduce the amount of drunkenness at night?—I do not think that the adoption of the Public-house Closing Act has had any effect in that point of view in Liverpool, because before that Act came into operation the public-houses were generally shut at 12; but when that Act came into operation it legalised their being open until one, so that really its effect was rather to extend the hours than to shorten them in Liverpool.

7555. Do you mean that there were not a number of night-houses kept open, and in many cases drunkenness and disorder took place?—I am speaking especially with regard to licensed houses.

7556. Houses kept open at night for the sale of liquor, you mean?—I do not think it has made any difference in that respect at all.

7557. It is your opinion, then, that no good has been done by placing the present restrictions upon the sale of liquor?—No very great good, certainly.

7558. That is quite contrary to the opinion of every witness whom we have had examined. Everybody, as yet, has admitted that the present restrictions have worked well?—That may be so; I do not say that they work ill, because I think that the people submit to them; there is a minimum amount of inconvenience about the present laws, and I certainly should not disturb them.

7559. Mr. John Abel Smith.] What do you mean by minimum of inconvenience?—I mean by a minimum of inconvenience that the public are put to as little inconvenience as possible under the present law.

7560. Chairman.] You mean that it does not cause much inconvenience?—Yes, that it does not cause much inconvenience; but that it does cause inconvenience I maintain.

7561. Do not you think that there would be a good deal more drinking and drunkenness if the public-houses were kept open the whole of the 24 hours?—I doubt that very much.

7562. Because you think that the present hours

Mr.
J. Wybergh.

J. Wybergh.

are long enough for all people to get drunk who wish to get drunk?—I think so quite. I would rather qualify that answer by saying, that I do not think that drunkenness would be increased materially.

7563. Mr. Horsfall.] You told the Committee that you had no faith in restrictive laws, and therefore that you have no objection to the public-houses being kept open the whole of the 24 hours on Sundays, and week days also?—I did not say that. I was asked whether if they were so kept open, as they are in other countries, it would very much increase drunkenness. I said I did not think it would, and for this reason, that I think the drunkards in every community are a sort of fixed quantity, and if the public-houses are partially closed, they will find the means of getting drunk when they are open, or they will find some other way of getting drunk.

7564. I presume in that opinion you are only giving your own opinion?—Certainly.

7565. And not the opinion of the magistrates?—Certainly not; it is my own individual opinion.

7566. And not the opinion of the inhabitants of Liverpool generally?—Possibly not.

7567. Perhaps more than possibly not?—Very likely not.

7568. You have been a very strong advocate, have you not, for free trade in drink as it is termed?—Yes, I have.

7569. That is a question which has been very much considered, and very much discussed in Liverpool, is it not?—Yes, very much indeed.

7570. And the magistrates at one time, I think, adopted, to a certain extent, your views?—They did for some three or four years.

7571. And since that they have altered the system?—Since that they have altered the system. They have restricted it to a certain extent; that is to say, they have gone back to the old system.

7572. Have you had any opportunity of forming an opinion as to the extent of drinking in the beer-houses in Liverpool, as compared with the public-houses?—I have got a return of the number of offences, and the proportion of offences, committed by beer-houses and public-houses for the last two years, which I will lay before the Committee if they think it important. In 1866 there were 73 publicans fined for Sunday trading, or selling at illegal hours on Sundays, and there were 25 fined for permitting drunkenness on their premises. There were, in the same year, 670 beer-sellers fined for Sunday trading, and there were 34 fined for permitting drunkenness on their premises. In 1867 there were 45 publicans fined for Sunday trading, and nine for permitting drunkenness on their premises. In the same year there were 384 beer-sellers fined for Sunday trading, and eight for permitting drunkenness on their premises. I can also produce a return of the number of public-houses and beer-houses in Liverpool licensed from the year 1858 to the year 1867. In the year 1858 there were 978 beer-sellers licensed to sell on the premises, and eight to sell off the premises; and in that year there were 1,499 licensed public-houses. In 1859 there were 969 beer-sellers licensed to sell on the premises, and eight licensed to sell off the premises, and 1,500 publicans. In 1860 there were 1,056 beer-sellers licensed to sell on the premises, and six to sell off, and 1,528 publicans. In 1861 there were 1,007 beer-sellers licensed to sell on the premises, and 14 licensed to sell off, and 1,543 publicans. In 1862 there were 919 beer-house licensed to sell on the premises, and 12 to sell off, and 1,643 publicans. In 1863 there were 1,10 beer-sellers licensed to sell on the premises, and eight licensed to sell off, and 1,636 publicans. In 1864 there were 1,050 beer-sellers licensed to sell on the premises, and 12 to sell off, and 1,775 publicans. In 1865 there were 974 beer-seller licensed to sell on the premises, and 14 licensed to sell off, and 1,874 publicans. In 1866 there were 953 beer-sellers licensed to sell on the premises, and 10 licensed to sell off the premises, and 1,900 licensed publicans. In 1867 there were 897 beer-houses licensed to sell on the premises, and 11 licensed to sell off, and 1896 publicans. If the Committee will contrast the number of beer-houses in 1858 with last year, 1867, they will find a reduction in the number of beer-houses though there is an increase of some 300 or 400 in the licensed public-houses; but the inference from that is, that as you increase the licensed public-houses, which are conducted with much greater order than the beer-houses, you diminish what is omitted to be a greater evil, the number of beer-houses.

7573. Are you aware of the number of licensed public-houses in Manchester?—No, I do not know the number, but I know that the number of licensed public-houses in Manchester is very much less than those in Liverpool, and I also know that the number of beer-houses is very much more numerous than in Liverpool.

7574. The licenses in Manchester are about half the number that they are in Liverpool, are they not?—I dare say they are, but I cannot speak precisely to the exact number; I know that it is considerably less.

7575. The cases of drunkenness that are brought before the magistrates in Liverpool, I believe are nearly double the cases of drunkenness brought before the magistrates in Manchester, are they not?—I do not know the number of drunken cases brought before the magistrates in Manchester, but I dare say, looking at the different conditions of the population of the two places, they are much more numerous.

7576. What is the difference in the conditions of the population?—There is a large floating population in Liverpool which there is not in Manchester; I am speaking of the difference in the character of the populations.

7577. You are aware, of course, that a very extensive canvass of householders took place in Liverpool with regard to the charge of public-houses on Sunday?—I have heard so.

7578. Are you not aware of it?—I heard it stated so, but I am not aware of it in any other way; nobody canvassed me; I heard of it.

7579. Do you reside in Liverpool?—I do not at present; I resided there about three or four years ago.

7580. I presume that you were not there when the canvass was made?—Probably I was not.

7581. Have you not seen and read the account of the canvass which was published in the papers?—Yes; I have read an account of the canvass having been made, but I do not know what proportions of householders signed it at all, except, I believe, there was said to be a very considerable number of persons who signed.

7582. Have you not written in the newspapers in opposition to the views propounded by those gentlemen who have canvassed the town in favour of closing public-houses?—I have written in the newspapers in opposition to persons who are in your of restrictive legislation on this subject.

7583. But specifically in opposition to the views of those gentlemen who canvassed the town with the view of closing the public-houses on Sunday?—No; I do not remember ever having written anything with regard to the canvass particularly.

7584. But have you not written with regard to the principle of the canvass?—As I say, I have often written with regard to the principle of free trade as opposed to restriction.

7585. Having committed yourself to those views, of course you are anxious to maintain them?—Certainly I am, irrespective of whether have committed myself or not.

7586. Are you aware that a very large number of publicans in Liverpool, amounting to 700 or 800, are in favour of entire closing on Sunday?—I have heard that a great number of publicans have signed a memorial, or whatever it was, in favour of closing; I know nothing of my own knowledge about it.

7587. Have you seen any return of the number of persons employed in public-houses on Sunday?—No, I have not.

7588. Mr. Yorke.] I understand you to be an opponent to this Bill principally on theory?—Yes. I think that legislation of this kind is founded on a false principle.

7589. How were you led to become an opponent of the principle; was it from observing its results in practice, or merely from a priori opinion?—I may say that I have been led to it from the observation, not merely of what has taken place where I reside, but from reading and reflection, and from what I have seen in other countries; for instance, where the facilities for getting drunk most abound, as Honourable Members well know, in the wine-growing countries in Europe, where the populations are precisely the most sober, and from that I argue that sobriety does not at all depend upon the facilities for getting drunk.

7590. Do you think the analogy to be complete between the conditions of those wine-growing countries and those in that part of England which you know best; do you think that the circumstances are the same, and that the conditions of the two populations only differ in respect of restriction in the one case, and free trade in the other?—It seems to me that the only difference is with regard to the habits. There is certainly a difference of climate, but I very much doubt whether that has so much influence as to account for the great difference between the sober habits of the one, and the drunken habits of the other.

7591. I understand you to go almost as far as to say that restriction is actually the cause of drunkenness, for you say that where restriction does not exist there is very little drunkenness, and where restriction does exist there you find drunkenness abounds; am I to understand that to be your theory?—I do not go so far as to say that restriction actually causes drunkenness; all I mean to say is, that I do not think that restriction is any remedy for drunkenness. I think that as long as you have merely restriction partially applied, everybody who wishes to get drunk will get drunk. I can easily imagine that if you wanted to put down drunkenness, if that is to be the object of this measure, there should be a total prohibition; that is to say, prevent people from getting access to drink, make it impossible that they can drink, and then you will have sobriety if you think it worth while to incur the great inconvenience that would arise.

7592. Mr. Roebuck.] But is that possible?—No, certainly not; I do not think it is; it is only a question of inconvenience after all.

7593. Mr. Yorke.] Is it your opinion that under the existing restrictive laws, drunkenness is increasing or the contrary in Liverpool?—I think it is diminishing; and that is another reason which perhaps I might have urged for the opinion which I have formed, that drunkenness does not necessarily depend upon the number of public-houses, because, though the public-houses were largely increased during three or four years owing to a suggestion which I made to the Bench with regard to the mode of granting licenses, those public-houses being still in operation and doing business, or at all events, the great majority of them, yet, still we find this last year or two that drunkenness is diminishing. If the converse of the proposition were true, it appears to me that the cause continuing to operate the effect would remain precisely the same, or rather still stronger, and that drunkenness, so far from being on the decline, ought to be increasing.

7594. Do you not think that the existence of a large number of public-houses in proportion to the population, constitutes a temptation to drinking, or do you believe that it does not tend to increase the amount of drinking?—One can only form a conjecture as to temptation; I dare say it may be a temptation to some people.

7595. Do you believe that the fact of those houses being open on Sunday operates as a temptation to people, or not?—No; no doubt if there are facilities for getting drunk, and people are inclined to get drunk, they can do so with greater ease, that is all.

7596. But do you believe that the question of public-houses being open, or not, on the Sunday, makes any material difference in the degree of the temptation which people have to drink, and consequently in the amount of drunkenness which results?—I think very little.

7597. You think that they would drink in private?—I think so, certainly.

7598. Mr. Evans.] You were speaking of the state of things in foreign countries, were you not, when you spoke about restriction not producing much effect; are you much acquainted with the state of things in foreign countries?—I have been a good deal on the continent, I speak more particularly of France.

7599. Am I to infer that you have observed that in France where very little restriction, if any, exists, that the people are more sober than they are here?—Yes, certainly.

7600. I suppose you would hardly go to the length of saying that restriction actually causes drunkenness; but what I suppose you would mean to say is this, that sobriety or the reverse does not depend much upon the existence of restriction, or not; but that in your judgment it depends upon other causes?—Precisely.

7601. Therefore, holding that view, you would believe that the diminution of intemperance which you say as taken place in Liverpool is caused not by additional restriction, but is caused by other reasons?—It is caused by other influences; perhaps it might not be very easy to analyse the causes of the diminution of drunkenness on the Sunday, but they appear to me to result in the first place from improved education. There is a large free library, which has been in operation in Liverpool for some years. I should think that that was an element in the improvement, and there is improved sanitary legislation in Liverpool, and an improvement of the dwelling-houses of the working classes; I think that is also another element; and then there is probably an increasing taste for excursions on the river and elsewhere, and for amusements of a more innocent character.

7602. Then, in fact, regarding drunkenness, supposing it is to be considered as an enjoyment or amusement, you consider that those other enjoyments and amusements compete with it?—I do.

7603. I understood you to say several times that in your judgment there were a certain class of men who liked to get drunk, and that they would do so whatever restrictions were put upon them, short of absolute prohibition?—That is my opinion.

7604. Do you mean to say that you think that every man who gets drunk in a public-house, or the majority of men who get drunk in a public-house, or in a beershop, go there with that intention?—No, certainly not; I think that the drunkards are in a very considerable minority; I have heard what appeared to me to be exaggerated statements about the amount of drunkenness which goes on in public-houses and beer-houses, but I certainly do not believe it to exist to the extent which I have heard it stated before this Committee. I believe that although there may be a good deal of drinking in public-houses and beerhouses, yet the greater portion of the persons who drink there do not get drunk.

7605. I do not think you quite understand my question; are you of opinion that nearly every man who goes to a public-house or a beer-house, and, as it turns out, gets drunk there, goes with the intention of getting drunk there?—That I cannot say.

7606. Do not you think that many men who go to a public-house or to a beer-house, without any intention whatever of getting drunk, as a matter of course take more than they ought?—No doubt of it.

7607. Then, so far as that is concerned, the beer-house or the public-house would be a temptation?—It might, just as property is a temptation to people to steal.

7608. Mr. Horsfall.] In the comparison which you drew just now between France and this country, do not you think that the difference in the beverage which they drink in France has something to do with the extent of drunkenness, in the one case it being the common light wines of the country, and in this country it being spirits or beer?—I dare say that has something to do with it; but I took the trouble some years ago, when I was in Paris, to make some inquiries upon that subject, and I found, through a gentleman connected with the police department, that the persons who get drunk in Paris are very few, but those who did get drunk in Paris, got drunk upon brandy.

7609. Those were the exceptions, but the general drink of the country, we know, is light wines, of which a man can only take a certain quantity, and therefore the inference is, that they do not act upon him in the way that spirits may act upon the people in this country?—

Exactly; and the thing is to increase the taste for light wines among the people of this country.

7610. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You are understood, are you not, to be an advocate for the entire absence of all restriction upon the opening of public-houses and beer-shops?—Of all legislation upon the subject; I think if you have a trade which is legalised, such as the publican trade or the beer-house keepers' trade, then ought to be as few restrictions upon it as of any other trade, except so far as proper police regulations go, to restrain excesses.

7611. And you come here with the very legitimate and proper object of making your opinion known?—Yes, I do wish to make my opinion known, as I have always maintained those opinions, almost ever since I had anything to do with the licensing department in Liverpool.

7612. Will you tell me when the free trade licenses in Liverpool began?—I think in 1862.

7613. And it practically finished in 1866, did it not?—I do not exactly understand what I meant by being practically finished; all the public-houses which were called into existence by free trade are in existence still; therefore, it is not practically finished.

7614. Did not the magistrates, in 1866, refuse to grant any more licenses?—No, certainly not; they refused to grant licenses upon what I may be allowed to call my principle; that is, a fixed principle instead of an arbitrary one, and that has been within the last two years, 1866 and 1867.

7615. Was there not a great amount of public attention called to the meeting of the magistrates on the licensing day, in 1866?—There was.

7616. Was not there considerable discussion upon the subject?—Yes.

7617. Was not the discussion unfavourable to granting more licenses?—Yes; there was a majority not against granting more licenses, but against granting licenses upon the principle which had been in operation for the three or four years before.

7618. And that has been practically the rule of the Bench since?—Yes, for the last two years it has.

7619. From 1862 to 1866, every man who had a decent character and who applied for a license got it, did he not?—Every man who, in the judgment of the Bench, was a fit person to hold a license, and whose house was fit for the purpose, got a license.

7620. Upon this principle, was it not, that it was the duty of the magistrates to carry out the law fairly as between man and man, rather than express any opinion as to the spirit and working of the law?—Yes; and the principle of doing equal justice to every applicant for a license.

7621. As between man and man, judging without any reference to the working or operation of the law afterwards?—No, not at all. I consider that those magistrates who voted for granting licenses in the free way which I have described, or many of them, at all events, were of the same opinion as myself, namely, that it did not tend to increase drunkenness.

7622. Might I ask you, as it is a very important question, to state exactly and definitely what you believe to have been the principle of granting licenses in Liverpool up to 1866?—The principle upon which the magistrates granted licenses from 1862, I think it was down to 1866 or 1865, was simply this, that every applicant who satisfied them em that he was a person of good character, and at his house was a house of a certain capacity and respectability, got a license; and every person who could not satisfy them upon those two points was refused a license.

7624. They did not take into consideration the effect of the number of beer-houses, but all they considered was the character of the man and the character of the house?—Yes, precisely so. It was considered that it was impossible in a large place like Liverpool to take into consideration the wants of the neighbourhood. It was supposed to be utterly impracticable to do that, so as to do justice, and to grant a sufficient number of licenses exactly where they were wanted, and to refuse them where they were not wanted.

7625. As I understand, the principle of the magistrates was this, that they would leave the man himself, as they did in other cases of trade, to decide whether it was advantageous for him to establish his house, without regard to whether it was disadvantageous or not to the public at large, but there should be any quantity of public-houses in the neighbourhood?—Precisely; they thought it was his business. That as he was asking to be admitted into a certain trade, it was for him to take the responsibility whether that trade was likely to succeed or not; they considered that they had nothing to do with that question.

7626. Mr. John Abel Smith.] A man might have two houses joining together?—Yes.

7627. Mr. Horsfall.] The effect of the alteration was this as given by Major Greig, and I apprehend it is a correct statement, that in the year 1864 I think there were 147 new licenses granted; in 1865, 126 new licenses; and in 1866, when the system was altered, there were only 12 licenses?—I have no doubt that is perfectly accurate. I was not quite sure whether it was 1861 or 1862 that the free trade system commenced.

7628. Mr. John Abel Smith.] I understand that, in 1866, there was a very large memorial presented to the justices of Liverpool; did you see that memorial?—I do not know whether it was in that year, but I remember that, for the first several years, there have been memorials presented to the justices at the opening of their sessions against granting any more licenses, particularly by the teetotallers.

7629. Mr. Horsfall.] And others than teetotallers?—They were by avowed teetotallers, and, I dare say, there might have been others.

7630. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Was not that petition or memorial in 1866 signed by 31,227 people?—That I cannot say.

7631. But did it not attract your attention?—No; I do not think that the petition was received by the magistrates; I think they held it to be illegal.

7632. What was illegal?—To petition the Bench to, in short, abdicate their functions, and grant no license. They were there for the purpose, convened by law, as a sessions, for granting licenses, and they did not think that they could receive a petition asking them not to do that which the law bound them, at all events, to take into consideration.

7633. And, therefore, they did not receive the petition at all, although they might not act upon it?—I think they did not receive it; that is my impression.

7634. I think I understood you to say that you are clerk to the magistrates?—I am.

7635. Do you not know whether they received it or not?—They certainly did not act upon it; they might, in courtesy, have received it, and order it to lie upon the table, but they did not act upon it, and they intimated their opinion that they could not listen to any memorials or petitions couched in that form to grant no licenses whatever.

7636. But still, the number of licenses granted were reduced from upwards of 200 to 22?—Yes; that was the year before last.

7637. Though they did not receive the petition, as you think, they still acted on the spirit of it?—That was owing to peculiar circumstances, which altered the state of things.

7638. Then there was another very remarkable memorial presented to the magistrates or the corporation on one occasion, signed by 123 medical practitioners in Liverpool?—There was.

7639. Did that receive no attention?—No more than the other.

7640. That was not thought deserving of consideration?—No, I do not think it was. I do not think that the magistrates thought that they had anything to do with the medical aspect of the question.

7641. Have not the municipality of Liverpool appointed a committee called a Death Committee?—Yes, the town council, I believe, appointed a committee, called the Mortality Committee.

7642. Did that committee report to them?—Yes.

7643. Do you know what they reported?—No; it did not come officially before me, and I cannot charge my memory with the language of their report.

7644. Do you know whether they attributed a large amount of death to drunkenness?—I dare say they did.

7645. And did they not advise the closing of public-houses on Sunday?—That I do not remember; their report would show that it may be so, but I did not pay much attention to it.

7646. Have you ever seen any comparison of crime including drunkenness at Liverpool, as compared with other seaport towns?—No, I have not; I take it to be admitted that there is more drunkenness in Liverpool than in most other seaport towns. That I may admit at once; but I cannot charge my memory with having seen any comparative return upon the subject.

7647. You never saw a return comparing Liverpool with all the large ports in the kingdom?—No, I have not.

7648. If you heard that, as compared with South Shields, there were in Liverpool 12½ times as much population and 17 times as many drunken cases, as compared with Tynemouth 13 times as much population and 24 times as many cases of drunkenness, as compared with Sunderland five times as much population and 14½ times as many drunken cases; and going on the same with Bristol and numerous other places, to what should you attribute that great difference?—I do not know whether the population is assumed to be equal in all those places.

7649. No, I am assuming the population to be accurately stated, which I believe it to be, or else I would not mention it to you, and I ask you to what would you attribute that great difference?—To the habits of the population in those towns; that

Mr.

1868.

Mr.
J. Wybergh.

that in some they are more drunken than in others.

7650. But do you think that that would extend to all the ports of England except Liverpool?—I should think that in all the seaports of England there would naturally be more drunkenness than in populations of equal amount in inland towns.

7651. But that is not my question. The question is, whether you can give me any reason for the fact, which I believe to be true, that the drunken cases and offences in Liverpool are so much larger in number than in any other seaport town in Great Britain?—I can only account for it from the peculiar nature and the character of a very large class of the population who are connected with shipping, and who are much more drunken in their habits than other people.

7652. There is no doubt that there is a large population connected with shipping in Liverpool, and of course it is very much larger than in any other port, but still to a certain degree they are people of the same class as in every other port, are they not?—Yes, no doubt to a certain extent they are.

7653. I want to know how you explain the great difference between Liverpool and those other places in that respect?—I am not prepared to give you any explanation that I think worthy of the attention of this Committee, but at the same time I may say that I do not attribute it to the greater number of public-houses or beer-houses in Liverpool.

7654. You do not think that restriction has any effect upon drunkenness?—Little or no appreciable effect, I think.

7655. Do you recollect Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in 1854?—Yes, I remember it; but it was so short lived that I can hardly say that I remember its effect. It was repealed the very next session.

7656. Do you know how it worked?—I remember that there was very considerable dissatisfaction expressed with regard to it.

7657. By whom?—I cannot pretend to say who the individuals were, but I know that there was a general feeling that it caused very great inconvenience.

7658. Did it create any public disorder?—No, I cannot say that it created any riots or anything of that kind.

7659. With the interest which you take in this question, did you examine the question at all to see whether or not it affected any reduction in the habits of drinking in Liverpool?—No, I think that it was in operation too short a time to effect any alteration, even supposing that you can make people sober by increased restrictions.

7660. It might not have had an effect upon their habits, but did it not produce a diminution of drinking?—I am not aware.

7661. But there was no difficulty in carrying the law into effect, was there?—No, I do not remember any difficulty, except very great dissatisfaction from the inconvenience which it occasioned.

7662. Do you believe that there are other countries where the habits or the desire for drink are so powerful as in England?—I should think that in Norway and Sweden the desire for drink is almost as strong as in England.

7663. In Germany do they not drink a great deal of beer?—In Germany they do drink a great deal of beer, but they do not get drunk, or, at least, to anything like the extent that people do in England.

7664. To what do you attribute that?—I attribute it to the fact that the people in those countries have more opportunities of innocent amusement than they have in England.

7665. There have been very great efforts made in Liverpool to diminish drunkenness, have they not?—Very great indeed.

7666. Whether wisely or unwisely, very great efforts have been made?—Very great.

7667. Do you think that those efforts have had but comparatively little effect?—I think but very little.

7668. And that you explain by the fact that certain people who want to get drunk, will have it, do what you will?—Yes, I think so. So long as there are such places where it can be sold they will get drunk. I know the effect is, that as you restrict those places, other places spring up of an illicit character, where they get drunk in places that are known technically by the police by the name of hush shops, of which I am told there are a very great number in Manchester.

7669. Do your views lead you to go so far as to wish that every grocer should have the power of selling beer and spirits?—Yes, they do so.

7670. You would give everybody who was of decent character the power to sell beer and spirits?—I would.

7671. Mr. Roebuck.] Would you not have an extension towards them of the police regulations?—Yes, certainly; that is, assuming persons were allowed to drink on the premises. I think that the police should always have access to houses where people may drink to excess, or where any disorder might be committed.

7672. What I conclude from your statement is simply this: that if a grocer chose to be a beer-shop keeper he might?—Yes, certainly.

7673. Or if he chose to be a licensed victualler he might?—Yes, he might; but he should require a license for the purposes of the revenue of course.

7674. Mr. Horsfall.] I apprehend that your views would not meet those of the licensed victuallers?—I think they are gradually being educated up to those views.

7675. Mr. John Abel Smith.] I suppose that you do not entertain any doubt that intemperance is the parent of crime and misery amongst the working classes?—I certainly do think that intemperance is productive of a great deal of misery as regards the individual (that I have not the slightest doubt of), and of a certain class of crimes; but I believe that all the worst crimes are committed by people who do not get drunk.

7676. What do you mean by that?—That felonies, murders, and crimes of the highest class, I think, you will find upon examination, are generally committed by persons who do not get drunk and who are sober.

7677. And you should view drunkenness only as the parent of more venial offences?—Yes, I do; offences of violence, no doubt, but not of the grand class of crimes.

7678. You do not believe that crime is concocted in public-houses?—Yes, I think it is rather in beer-houses, I should say, but it is concocted by persons who have their senses about them, and who plan and deliberate without the influence of drink; that is my opinion. Of course, I never was present.

7679. You do not regard the drinking habits of the population with the same apprehension as many others do?—Yes, I do; I think that nothing ing can be more to be deplored than the drinking habits of the population; but at the same time I do not think that you can improve them by penal legislation. I trust to very different means.

680. Do you not think that the present habits of drinking are not only injurious to the morals, but to the health of the rising generation?—Yes, doubt they are.

681. Then, you wish to see a decrease of the present habits of drinking and drunkenness?—I trust devoutly.

682. Do you think that the way to do that is to take off all restrictive laws?—No, I do not say that that is the way to do it; quite otherwise. I think the way to do it is, to increase, if you can, the opportunities for innocent amusements, and draw the people out of their wretched dens into the country, and provide a better system, if possible, of education. I think that these are the influences which will in the end promote sobriety, as they have done among the classes above the class that we are now speaking of.

683. Do you think that the diminution of drunkenness in the classes above is owing to increased amusements?—I think that that is one cause.

684. Do you not think that the habits and opportunities of the poor, with regard to their houses and places that they stay in during the hours of rest, have not a great deal to do with their frequenting the public-house?—Such a large number of the poor live in such wretched houses that I think that the influences of home would be rather depressing, and would, therefore, favour drinking habits than the contrary.

685. Has there been much done in Liverpool with regard to improving the dwellings of the poor?—Yes; the municipality has spent and is spending annually very large sums of money in endeavouring to improve their habitations. I am afraid that they have not done very material good yet, but they are gradually, I believe, improving them; and I think that it will be found to tell in one or two years upon the habits of the poor.

686. Have they not rooted out the dwellers in those miserable cellars in Liverpool to a great extent?—Yes, I may say that they have abolished the cellar dwellings.

687. Mr. Horsfall.] In fact, they have got a Bill to that effect, have they not?—Yes.

688. Mr. John Abel Smith.] The municipality are very much in favour, as a whole, of either restriction upon the hours of drinking, are they not?—I have not heard any opinion expressed by the municipality upon that subject.

689. Did they not introduce a Bill into Parliament with that provision in it?—Yes; I think that the Bill introduced into Parliament did contain a provision, but not similar to this Bill.

690. It went further, did it not?—I am not sure; I think not; it also contained my principle, that is, for doing away with the discretion of the magistrates as to granting licenses, and the consideration of the wants of the neighbourhood.

691. Mr. Baines.] You have several times used the expression that restriction is no remedy for drunkenness; supposing that were to be admitted, that when habits of drunkenness are once established, it were to be admitted that they could not be broken except by total abstinence, which we know has in very many thousands of instances broken them, and supposing the question—

tion is not merely of remedy, as you say, but a question of prevention, I want to ask you, without in the least implying that you are not as great a defender of temperance as I am, do not you think that, by way of prevention, something might be done?—I have already expressed my views with regard to prevention. I say that restriction does not prevent drunkenness, and I may illustrate it in this way, that restriction is like keeping the door ajar, and total prohibition is locking and bolting it.

7692. Do you know that we have had evidence to the effect, that a great number of drunkards themselves have entreated to be delivered from the temptation?—I dare say they may have done so, but what I object to is, laying under disabilities an immense majority of people who do not abuse those good things.

7693. Have you heard that a great number of drunkards have themselves expressed an earnest wish to be delivered from the temptation under which they are physically compelled to succumb?—That may be so; but they are usually in such a maudlin state, that I should not attach much importance to anything that they said upon the subject.

7694. There is another class, namely, the young people, and I want to know whether you do not think, that opening such a vast number of places where there is that kind of liquor sold which does intoxicate, is not a serious temptation to present to the rising generation of a town like Liverpool?—My view is, that people should be educated to resist temptation. I do not think that a virtue which exists in the absence of temptation is worth anything at all.

7695. But still, if you could not avoid temptation, you would not multiply temptations of any kind, or present them to the public, would you?—Certainly not. At the same time I would not deprive a great majority of innocent people of what I consider a reasonable gratification, merely on the ground that it might possibly tempt other people to excess who were viciously inclined.

7696. You said that the more malignant crimes, and the most to be condemned, you think, are not produced by drunkenness. I ask you, as a clerk to the magistrates, whether you do not see a vast number of instances come before you, and come before the magistrates, of disorderliness and outrage, and outrages upon wives and children and others, which are produced absolutely and exclusively by drunkenness?—Undoubtedly there are a great number of assaults occasioned by drunkenness, and what are called disorderly cases.

7697. Are there not many murders?—No, I think not.

7698. Are you aware that several judges of the land have expressed a very strong opinion upon this subject, that a very large proportion, some of them carrying it up to nine-tenths and some up to four-fifths, of the crimes which come before the courts of justice arise directly or indirectly from habits of drinking?—I believe it is a very common topic at quarter sessions and assizes for a judge to charge the jury to a similar effect.

7699. Colonel Fane.] I suppose you think that the beer-houses ought to be put under licenses as well as the public-houses?—Yes; I think that they ought all to be put under one license.

7700. Chairman.] The Honourable Member for Leeds asked you whether many drunkards were not crying out for protection and assistance; such as would be afforded by this Bill, to assist them to be sober. I understand you to be quite opposed to admitting the principle that drunkards ought only to be protected by means of muzzling every individual?—Quite so.

7701. Mr. Roebuck.] To sum up some portion of your evidence, I think I may say that it is your opinion that deliberate crime is not perpetrated by drunkards?—That is my opinion.

7702. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] The comparative proportion of drunken cases that come before the magistrates in different towns depends somewhat upon the comparative strictness and efficiency of the police, does it not?—Very much.

7703. Have you a very strict and efficient police in Liverpool?—Very strict indeed; and a very numerous body of police.

7704. Mr. Evans.] I understood you to say,

Mr. MICHAEL BEAL, called in; and Examined.

Mr.
M. Beal.

7708. Mr. Roebuck.] You are an inhabitant of Sheffield, are you not?—Yes.

7709. And you are a Common Councilman, are you not?—Yes.

7710. How long have you been a common councilman in Sheffield?—On and off, perhaps 10 or 12 years.

7711. I think you are now a tradesman in Sheffield, are you not?—Yes.

7712. Of what trade?—A watchmaker and jeweller.

7713. In the early part of your life I understand you had been a journeyman?—Yes, for 20 years.

7714. You hold other offices, I think; you are President of the Chamber of Industry at Sheffield?—Yes.

7715. And you are an officer of the British United Order of Odd Fellows?—Yes; I am treasurer of that society.

7716. I think I may say that you were a very strenuous opponent of my election during the last general election?—I was.

7717. Have you read the present Bill?—Yes.

7718. As regards the past restrictions upon drinking, do you think that they have been beneficial?—I think not. My opinion about it is that legislation has gone quite far enough upon the subject.

7719. I want to know whether you believe that past restriction has been beneficial?—I do not think that it has.

7720. I am talking now of the existing law, do you think that the law, standing as it is, has worked beneficially?—I think that it entails considerable restriction upon the community, but it is bearable, and that is about all that I should say for it, and I have my reasons for that.

7721. I need hardly ask you if you are against any further restriction?—I am entirely opposed to any further restriction.

7722. On what ground are you opposed to it?—When I was a young man along with a great number of others we used to be in the habit, and the working classes generally were in the habit, of taking excursions into the country; we have many remarkable historical places in the neighbourhood of Sheffield, and we made a practice of visiting those places on a Sunday.

that you thought that murders were not frequently caused by drunkenness, but I suppose you would admit that a great many cases of manslaughter and aggravated assault are caused by drunkenness?—Certainly, I do.

7705. Mr. Baines.] In my former question I intended to include cases of manslaughter as well as murder?—My answer simply referred to cases of murder.

7706. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] Have you ever known of a number of pockets being picked as people were coming from church?—Yes; that is generally the case where there is a crowd; and there is temptation to steal wherever there is property.

7707. Mr. Baines.] Do you believe that this is done by people who have been inside the church?—Yes; very frequently pockets are picked in church.

We made up parties of half-a-dozen, and we found great inconvenience at times in obtaining shelter and refreshment when the public-houses were closed, for the local magistrates interpreted the word traveller to have very different meanings, and we were very frequently refused necessary refreshment. I have walked as much as 30 miles on a Sunday for recreation, and perhaps not had more than a pint of ale and my tea or dinner at a public-house.

7723. Now let me direct your attention to Mr. Wilson Patten's Act; do you recollect any report being made to the town council by a Committee especially appointed to consider that subject?—Yes, a report was made.

7724. Was any action taken upon that report by the Council?—No, it was in 1852 when the report was presented to the council, that report was received by the council, and a motion was made that 1,000 copies of it be printed for distribution, but the motion was negatived.

7725. Was any other action taken upon the report?—No.

7726. It was merely received?—It was merely received.

7727. Do you recollect the passing of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—Yes.

7728. What was the effect of that Act upon the popular mind of Sheffield?—I think that they considered it a very harsh and severe measure. I remember being in the habit then of going to a public-house on Sunday evening to read the "Examiner" and the "Spectator," and have a friendly chat upon local and public affairs, and it was found a great grievance to have at 10 o'clock like apprentice boys, to be turned out and told you must go home, as if you were not fit to take care of yourself.

7729. Do you recollect whether there was any feeling about that Act before it was passed, or did the opinion respecting it arise after it had been passed?—The greatest agitation that we had upon the subject I think in Sheffield was in 1855.

7730. Was that after the Bill became an Act or was it before?—It was after.

7731. Before that, I take it that people knew nothing about what was going on?—No; I think not.

7732. When the Bill became law, did there arise any strong feeling in Sheffield against that of Parliament?—I am not very sure upon that. There have been very strong agitations in Sheffield upon this question, but I cannot speak as to whether it was just at that time or not, there was one respecting the Maine Liquor Law, and another respecting the restrictions which, I think, preceded Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill. I believe the agitation was preceding the passing of that Act.

7733. Had you any public meeting about Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—I believe it was on Mr. Wilson Patten's Act that the public meeting was held in the Temperance Hall. I think it would be in December 1854, when the meeting was held in the Temperance Hall. I went to that meeting, and told them that I thought the number present there was not sufficient to speak for inhabitants of a borough so large as Sheffield with 220,000 people, and I moved an amendment that the meeting be adjourned, and that we have a public meeting in Paradise-square. I forget exactly the termination of that meeting, but the result was that we got up a requisition to the mayor to call a public meeting in Paradise-square, and I was one who presented it to him, and that was signed by above 9,000 requisitionists. A meeting was accordingly held, and the mayor, Sir John Brown, was in the chair; the meeting was held on a bleak day in December, and the resolution against the measure was carried by about 10 to 1.

7734. That was against Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill?—Yes, it was either that, or it was against Mr. Somes' Bill.

7735. You are perfectly sure there was a meeting about the restriction of trade in drink?—Yes, I have attended several.

7736. I am now talking about that one which was held in Paradise-square, at which Mr. John Brown presided; that was a meeting held on the subject of restriction upon the sale of liquor?—Yes.

7737. Was that as to the restriction on the Sunday or the general sale; can you tell me that?—If it was Mr. Somes' Bill, it would be on the general sale.

7738. Mr. Horsfall.] Mr. Somes' Bill, I think you understand, was for entire closing?—Yes.

7739. Mr. Roebuck.] The feeling of the meeting was entirely against that, was it not?—Yes.

7740. I want to get at the present feeling of the town; are you at all aware of any canvassing being made upon this subject lately?—Yes, I am aware of it through the newspapers, but not further.

7741. You know nothing about it?—No, not speak confidently.

7742. Colonel Fane.] Did they not canvass you?—No.

7743. Mr. Roebuck.] Do you think that it was a partial or a complete canvass?—Judging from what I have read in the newspapers, I think the signatures, pro and con, would not be above 1000 or 8,000, and we have about 40,000 adults in Sheffield.

7744. Are you aware whether the town council has taken any action upon this Bill?—No, they have not; it has never been before the council.

7745. Has there been any application made to them on the subject?—No.

7746. So that if there has been any canvass, it has not been within the knowledge of the constituted authorities of the town?—No.

7747. And not with their aid?—No.

7748. What do you believe would be the effect of the present Bill, if carried into law, upon the inhabitants of your town?—I think it would press very hard indeed upon the parties who do not agree with the principle of it. There are two ways in which drunkenness may be thought to be remedied. The remedy proposed by this Bill is, restricting the hours of public-houses being open, but a great many people believe that the proper remedy for drunkenness is education, social reform, and improvement in the habits and morals of the working classes; and this is to be done by other means than by legislation. I have often found that the people who seek compulsory powers are people who take very little interest in education, and in public movements for the social and moral elevation of the people. My own impression is, that the public-houses are like the public streets, places of public resort, and that they ought to be regulated upon similar principles, but that no restraint should be put upon the orderly people who frequent those places, any more than you would put restraint upon people who do not disturb the peace in the public streets.

7749. So that you would not coerce the whole of the community, because there are a certain small number of habitual drunkards?—No; you do not put a strait-waistcoat upon a sane man; you only put it upon an insane man; and I should not think of putting restriction upon a temperate man because an intemperate man abused his privileges and his liberties.

7750. Should I be right in saying that a large proportion, at least, and perhaps a majority of the working men, are against any further restriction?—I have no doubt about it myself; my impression about it is, that if you take the municipal elections as a fair test of public feeling upon this matter, whenever a teetotaler has come forward upon temperance principles, he has always been rejected; I do not think that our town council would muster half-a-dozen people who were for this Bill.

7751. Then you take that to be a symptom of the popular opinion in Sheffield?—It is a good test, I think.

7752. And you would say that anybody who came to this Committee and told us that the feeling of the majority of the working people of Sheffield is in favour of this Bill was in error?—I think so.

7753. To test your means of judging of the working men, I suppose you do not yourself employ any large number?—No.

7754. How many do you employ?—I am a watchmaker and jeweller, and I only employ two men.

7755. What facilities have you for learning the feelings and opinions of the working classes in Sheffield?—All my life I have mixed with them in all their social movements for their moral and social elevation. I was connected with the Mechanics' Institution for some years. I have been mixed up with them in connection with different societies. I have been mixed with them in freehold land societies. I think we have a greater number of freehold land societies in Sheffield than perhaps in any town in the kingdom for the population.

7756. Taking into consideration all those means of judging of the habits and manners of the working men of Sheffield, have you perceived ceived any great change, of late years, in their habits and manners?—Yes, a considerable one. The feeling against drunkenness now is such that you seldom hear or see a drunken man making an exhibition of himself in the street. Formerly it used to be a very common practice with ignorant people, who were drunk, to go shouting and bawling along the streets, but you do not see that now.

7757. Has there been any diminution in the drunken cases that are brought up before the magistrates in Sheffield?—I believe they have diminished about one-half, taking into consideration the increase of the population.

7758. You have a very large Irish population in Sheffield, have you not?—Yes, a considerable one.

7759. Have you any notion of the number?—It would be a rude notion; say 10,000. I do not know exactly.

7760. I do not mean to put it invidiously; but is it not the fact, that a great portion of the disorderly cases that come before the magistrates are composed of that Irish population?—There may be rather an over proportion of the Irish, but there is a moderate share of the English, I think, amongst them.

7761. So that there is still a good deal of drunkenness in Sheffield?—I think it is considerably abated; it is gradually diminishing, and by proper encouragement, by education, and other means, I think it might be dispelled.

7762. And, amongst other means, I suppose you would say the means of innocent recreation on Sundays?—Yes.

7763. Have you not had some parks lately opened in Sheffield?—Yes, we have; not very lately; it was some years ago.

7764. Are those frequented by the working men?—Yes.

7765. I mean the park given by the Duke of Norfolk; was that opened 20 years ago?—Yes; but that park, I may say, has not been put into the very best condition; it has not been made so attractive as it might be. There is a very nice carriage drive through it, and that is the most that you can say for it. I believe the working classes of Sheffield prefer either going trips by railway to Grimsby, or to Worksop, to get into the Dukeries, or to going into the lovely glades of Derbyshire and to the Wharfedale Craggs, and to all those delightful spots that we cherish and enjoy so much.

7766. You think that those are the attractions which lead the Sheffield men away out of Sheffield on Sunday?—Yes.

7767. And those men thus led away, and usefully led away, would be restricted and inconvenienced by a Bill of this sort?—Yes; I was expecting to be examined by the Committee of which Mr. Berkeley was Chairman in 1855. The Committee came suddenly to a conclusion, and my evidence was not called for, but I received a letter then which I was requested to attend to, and if the Committee will allow me I will read it now; it was from six or seven working men in Sheffield.

7768. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Are they alive or dead?—Some of them are dead and some are living.

7769. Mr. Roebuck.] But they are working men, and you know them all, or you did at that time?—Yes. They say, "Sir,—Hearing that you are collecting evidence to show the operation of the Sunday Closing Act preparatory to appearing before the Committee of Inquiry, I take the liberty of furnishing you with the following case of extreme hardship. In the summer of last year a party whose names are below, started from Sheffield one Sunday morning for the purpose of visiting Wentworth Park, in which is situated the splendid mansion of Earl Fitzwilliam. We took the train to Masbro'; we had then between four and five miles to walk; we had proceeded about a mile when it commenced raining smartly; we pushed on for Scholes, a village about two miles from Wentworth; having been before a man times we felt sure of getting both shelter and refreshment; we arrived without being seriously wet, and began to congratulate ourselves on our prospect of shelter, when, on applying for admittance at the first public-house, we were told that we could not possibly be admitted as the constable was expected every moment, and if we found company in the house they would be fined. We said we were from Sheffield; that we were a party of respectable mechanics, and that it was raining fast then; that we did not care for refreshments so much as for shelter while the shower was over. We further stated that we would give our address, and become responsible for anything that might take place. But it was all in vain. We met with the same success at another public house in the same village. Here we were two miles from Wentworth, and no appearance of the rain abating. Well, on we went, sheltering occasionally under a tree, till we reached the village of Wentworth, at about 20 minutes to 1 o'clock in the forenoon, completely soaked through with rain. We applied for admittance at the 'Rockingham Arms,' but was told they dare not allow it as they would lose their license if they did. We told them we would be satisfied if they would allow us to shelter, but it was of no use. They told us we might go into an old barn or outhouse and stop while Divine service was over, which at last we were obliged to do, and then we remained for two hours giving our opinions both loud and deep, and wishing all Sunday law makers a taste of what we were enduring at that moment. However, there was no alternative but submit we must with the best grace we could. After those two hours were over, we were made acquainted that service was over by seeing certain fine carriages rolling through the street of Wentworth, a circumstance not calculated to engender any very kindly feeling between the class and the class we belonged to. However, after a while, we were told we might go into the house until three o'clock, when we were obliged to leave though the weather was very bad, and to walk to Greasborough, a village two miles distant, it raining nearly all the time. The above I know to be correct in every particular, being one of the unfortunate party myself. Yours respectfully Edwin Colley. The others comprising the party were, the writer of the above Edwin Colley (Scissorsmith), John Machon, William Turner, Thomas Clark, William Wildblood, William Ashby."

7770. Do you know whether there has been any petition presented from Sheffield about this Bill?—Yes.

7771. What petition was that?—The petition presented against the Bill from Sheffield and the neighbourhood are as follows: From the inhabitants of the town of Rotherham, county of York signed by 938 persons; from the township of Kimberworth timberworth, parish of Rotherham, county of York, 600; from the township of Greasborough and Rawmarsh, parish of Rotherham, 612; from the townships of Swinton Masbro' and Kilnhurst, county of York, 744; from the townships of Ath, Wentworth, Elsecar, Hoyland, Wombell, and Hemmingfield, county of York, 745; from the village and parish of Ecclesfield, Wortley Union, county of York, 280; from the townships of Stannington, Wadsley, and Grenoside, county of York, 814; from the township of Upper Hallam, parish of Ecclesall, borough of Sheffield, 266; from the hamlet of Blackburn, township of timberworth, county of York, 187; from the townships of Dronfield and Eskington, county of Derby, 821; from the borough of Sheffield, county of York, 25,776, making a total of 31,783 within nine miles of Sheffield.

7772. Do you know anything about the number of petitions presented for the Bill?—Nothing more than what I have seen in the newspaper. I have made no inquiries upon the matter.

7773. Mr. Horsfall.] You have told the Committee that you are opposed to any further restrictions with regard to the sale of liquors, but you do not object, I apprehend, to the present law?—I think it is working tolerably; no one is much dissatisfied. I think there are efforts going on to diminish drunkenness, and that if they are encouraged they will gradually abate it, both on Sundays and week days.

7774. You spoke of the population of Sheffield, and yourself amongst the number, generally going on excursions on Sundays, and on one occasion you took a walk of 30 miles; I presume that that was not after being at a place of worship?—No; we started early in the morning.

7775. And it occupied the whole day?—There is a difference about what we call worship. I call worship going to look at the beauties of nature. I can find worship in the fields as well as in a chapel.

7776. In the usual acceptation of the term, you had not been that day to a place of worship?—No.

7777. You do attend one, of course?—Yes, occasionally.

7778. You told the Committee of a great meeting which had been held at Sheffield, but I think I recollect from your evidence that you did not know whether it was on the subject of Mr. Somes' Bill, the Maine Liquor Law, or Mr. Wilson Paton's Bill?—It appears that I have got a little wrong in my notes upon the matter.

7779. But you cannot speak with any certainty?—I can speak with certainty that we had a large meeting in Sheffield upon the restriction of the sale of liquor, at which all took place that have stated, but the precise date I do not know.

7780. You do not know with regard to what specific Bill the meeting was held?—No, I would not be positive upon that.

7781. You said that you thought it hard that restrictions should be put upon the temperate men, because there were intemperate men; do you think that the temperate men would object?—Yes; I object.

7782. Do you think that the great body of the temperate men would object?—I think a great number; the majority would.

7783. You further told the Committee that there were not six men in the town council of Sheffield in favour of this Bill?—I think there are not.

7784. Has the Bill been considered by the town council?—No.

7785. You are merely giving your opinion as to what their view of it would be?—Yes.

7786. You further stated, which, as I understand, accorded with the opinions that had been given before, that there is a great improvement in the working classes of Sheffield, and you attribute that to education?—Yes. Since I have been a resident of Sheffield during the last 40 years as a mechanic, a vast number of institutions have sprung up amongst the working classes, all tending to their elevation. There are free libraries, mechanics' institutions, land societies, peoples' colleges, and a vast number of efforts have been made within the last 30 years, which have done a great deal towards the social and intellectual elevation of the working classes.

7787. You gave us a glowing description in a letter of some hardships which had been undergone by some of your fellow-townsmen in Sheffield, in not being able to get into a public-house during the rain. You are, perhaps, not aware that they were entitled to go into a public-house, and that it was a misapprehension on the part of the publican in not admitting them?—Then it is a very common misapprehension in our district, for I know that the law was carried out very stringently.

7788. I am only anxious that you should not put any misconstruction upon the existing law; you were probably not aware of the fact as I have stated it?—I think the intention of Parliament was defeated in that measure; but it was defeated by being placed in the hands of people who had, perhaps, rather narrow notions upon the subject.

7789. You would not desire that the public-houses, in a general way, should be open during the hours of Divine service, would you?—No, I do not know that I should press that at all. I should leave the law very much as it is.

7790. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] You were asked whether a temperate man would object to protective restrictions; I suppose you draw a distinction between a temperate man and a temperance man, do you not; what I mean is this, that a large number of persons may use and do use those public-houses on Sunday who are perfectly temperate men, and who, of course, would object to further restrictions, as interfering with themselves?—Yes.

7791. A temperance man is a man who is equally temperate, there is no doubt, but who wants to impose his peculiar views with regard to restrictions upon temperate and intemperate alike?—Yes, quite so.

7792. Mr. Evans.] Are there many persons in Sheffield belonging to the working classes who live in lodgings?—Not a very large number; we are a more domesticated population than is almost any other large town, with the exception of Birmingham.

7793. With regard to those who do live in lodgings, because I presume there are some, where do they generally take their meals?—They take them in the places where they lodge.

7794. With regard to excursionists, you have told us that a great number of persons in Sheffield are in the habit of making excursions into the country on Sunday either on foot or in other ways; do they, generally speaking, come home late in the evening?—No.

7795. About what sort of hours do they generally come home?—From nine to ten o'clock generally.

generally. The seat of the Duke of Devonshire, Chatsworth, is 12 miles away, and you will see dozens of vehicles go out every Sunday, and very often pedestrians going. It is a hilly country, and there is no other means of getting there but either walking or driving.

7796. As a rule you would say that the persons who make Sunday excursions from Sheffield would be home by 10 o'clock at night?—Yes; some few may be from 10 to 11.

7797. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You say that you have been a very considerable number of years a municipal councillor at Sheffield?—Yes.

7798. How long ago were you elected?—It would be about two years ago now since I was elected last.

7799. And had you many failures before you succeeded?—I never spent anything over elections myself; the public had to elect me. About seven years ago they put me out, because I was a great sanitary reformer. I waited till the public came round, and they invited me, and put me in without expense again.

7800. Was that the only time you failed?—There was once a ruse practised upon our party. That was before the three-day notice had to be given to the town clerk before the municipal election of all candidates. During the night before the election a party got up an opposition; we were sleeping upon our oars, and they worked and beat my party; that was the time I think.

7801. Was that the only other time?—Excepting on the Improvement Bill.

7802. Mr. Roebuck.] I suppose you have been defeated three times; is that the case?—No, I think only twice; I do not remember any other time.

7803. Mr. John Abel Smith.] But you have been in now two years?—Yes, two years.

7804. You say you are president of the Chamber of Industry; will you tell us what the Chamber of Industry is?—The object of it is to teach political economy by lectures and discussions.

7805. How many members are there in the Chamber of Industry?—I have not come prepared to speak upon that.

7806. Are there 100, or 50, or 200, or 1,000?—There may be 50, but we operate upon public opinion by engaging competent lecturers like Professor Leone Levi, and others, to teach the working classes what we believe to be the truths of political science, and economic science.

7807. But it consists of about 50 people, does it?—Yes, I should say the continuous members amount to that number.

7808. Does that bring you much into connection with the workmen of Sheffield?—We have large gatherings at times; we have sometimes several hundreds together; I think when we invited Mr. Roebuck to give us an address on labour and capital, there were thousands went away as well as thousands who got into the building.

7809. You say that you were a great opponent of Mr. Roebuck's in former years; I suppose you have made up matters with him now?—No; there is nothing personal between me and Mr. Roebuck.

7810. About those meetings that you talk of, do you recollect the meeting of the town council in 1852 with reference to drunkenness?—Yes, I recollect it; I think I was not in the council at that time.

7811. But you recollect it?—Yes, I recollect it.

7812. And you recollect the report of the committee?—Yes, and I have referred to it in the books of the council.

7813. Was not that report received and adopted?—Yes; I must just explain that if we appoint a committee to inquire into any question, if the report is not in accordance with the feeling of the council we always receive it and adopt it out of compliment to the committee but we take no further action upon it, and very likely that was the case with that report.

7814. Do they never send reports back?—Sometimes they do to be amended.

7815. Then you did not send that report back?—The council, I think, did not, according to the minutes.

7816. Mr. Roebuck asked you about 1854 and 1855; do you recollect anything happening then?—According to my data, I say a large meeting was held in December 1854, I think it was.

7817. What was it about?—They say it was Mr. Soames' Bill. Some one has corrected me upon that matter; I thought it was upon Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill.

7818. Are you sure that there was a great meeting in 1854?—That I am certain about.

7819. Was there any one later than 1854?—Yes, I think there was.

7820. What meeting was that?—I cannot call to mind all those things, for I let those matters pass.

7821. Recently has been a meeting?—Yes, there was one called lately, and about 100 persons according to the newspapers, were present.

7822. I do not mean the other day, but in more recent year; it is a long way to carry you memory back to those old meetings, and I do not want to trouble you about them, but was not there a great meeting held in 1863?—I can remember several of those meetings, but the precise date I could not give, for it appears I have got wrong with them, and I am not in a position to set myself right.

7823. Will you take those two newspapers and tell me what they are and whether they contain any statement that you recognise (handing two newspapers to the Witness)?—Yes; this is the "Sheffield and Rotherham Independent" of April the 22nd, 1863. The meeting here referred to was a meeting in the Temperance Hall for the closing of public-houses on Sunday.

7824. Whose Bill was that?—That would be Mr. Wilson Patten's, I think, but I do not remember precisely; I was present at that meeting and moved an amendment, and here are my remarks.

7825. Will you read the first paragraph?—"A public meeting was held in the Temperance Hall, Townhead-street, last evening, to consider the Bill now before Parliament for closing public-houses on Sunday." It does not say whose Bill it was, or what Bill it was.

7826. Will you take the other paper in your hand and tell me what the paper is?—The "Sheffield and Rotherham Independent" of Saturday, April the 25th, 1863, and the first paragraph is: "This measure is receiving in various parts of the country a great degree of support, and popular meetings are found, after warm debate, to adopt it. The proceedings on Tuesday evening, at the meeting convened and presided over by the mayor, suffice to show that there is a very large large part of our population disposed to give at least a modified support to the Bill."

7827. Then we must receive with great allowance for the inaccuracy of your memory your statement about the meetings?—I have no doubt that this article would justify what I have said if I was to read it through.

7828. But your recollection is inaccurate as to those meetings; as to the time at which they took place, and the motive for which they were called?—Yes, as to the particular objects of the Bill I do not precisely recollect.

7829. You do not recollect that, in 1863, Dr. Hale moved a resolution which was carried by a large majority?—I do not know what the resolution is which you refer to. If you read it, perhaps I can tell you if I recollect it.

7830. You say that you are very much in favour of education; would you tell me what you have done for education in Sheffield?—I have taught classes for some years in the Mechanics' Institution; I was secretary, and I have been president, and I am also now, to the Chamber of Industry, trying to indoctrinate the working classes by means of addresses, with right principles of political economy; and I have taken much interest in all movements of a social character.

7831. Have you been known to be for some years a strong supporter of the publican interest in Sheffield?—I have no connection whatever with it. I perhaps do not go to a public-house, unless I have business there, 10 times in a year myself. I am entirely out of their influence. I go upon my own opinions and convictions.

7832. You talked about a petition got up at Sheffield, to which there were 25,000 signatures. Do you know who were employed to get up that petition?—No, I cannot tell now.

7833. Do you know who did it?—I cannot speak to that now.

7834. Did you ever hear of a man of the name of Thomas Haynes in Sheffield?—I think the name should be Haigh. I know Haigh.

7835. Do you think he had anything to do with it?—He might have had, but I had nothing to do, I think, with the getting up of it.

7836. You think it is possible that Haigh had something to do with the getting up of the petition?—It is possible.

7837. What has happened to Mr. Haigh since or before, has he not been unfortunate?—It was some municipal squabble that he was sent to prison about.

7838. Mr. Roebuck.] I suppose you know Mr. Skinner?—Yes.

7839. Is he a very respectable man?—He is a very respectable man.

7840. Do not you think he had something to do with getting up the petition?—Yes, I have no doubt he had. He is secretary to the licensed victuallers; he is a very respectable man; he has been a member of the town council, and is very much liked.

7841. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] With regard to those reports presented to the town council, if I understand you rightly, you sometimes send them back to be amended, that is, I suppose, when you agree with the principle, but you think that there is some detail which might be altered?—Yes.

7842. But if you disagree with the principle of the report you put it upon the shelf, and that you call adopting it?—Yes, no further action is taken upon it. The copy of the report I believe that has got here has not been sent by the town clerk.

7843. Colonel Fane.] With reference to the observations of the Honourable Member for Liverpool just now, he said when you read that interesting letter of long date, from those mechanics who went to a distance from Sheffield, that it is well known that the public-house keepers were wrong, inasmuch as those men were travellers, and therefore they ought to have been admitted; but you are, perhaps, also aware that the wiser men than the public-house keepers in the neighbourhood of Sheffield have differed considerably about the word "traveller," and that there is such a great difference of opinion among the public-house keepers as to how it is to be read, that they are frightened to death upon the subject?—Quite so.

7844. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Was there not a man of the name of Wildblood who signed that letter to you making that complaint?—Yes.

7845. Has he not become a teetotaler since?—I see he belongs to the Hallelujah Band now.

7846. I suppose he would not write that letter now, would he?—I cannot tell, I am sure, what he would do, but he signed that letter.

Mr. JOHN WILSON, called in; and Examined.

7847. Mr. Roebuck.] You are a mechanic, of Sheffield, are you not?—I am a Sheffield grinder.

7848. How long have you been in Sheffield?—All my life. I am the son of a Sheffielder, the grandson of a Sheffielder, and the great grandson of a Sheffielder; and both my father and mother are living.

7849. I suppose you believe that you know something of the feeling of your brother workmen?—I do.

7850. I think that you have been employed for 35 years at the works of Messrs. Rodgers?—Upwards of that time.

7851. Were you not appointed to represent the working class of Sheffield at the Paris Exhibition?—I do not know that I was to represent the working class. The Mayor recommended me as a suitable person, as a skilled artisan, to represent the old staple trade of the town.

7852. You went to Paris, did you not?—I did.

7853. You then probably had an opportunity of watching the proceedings of the Parisian working population on Sunday?—Yes.

7855. Will you explain them to the Committee?—In the first place, I have been a successful competitor in three or four prize essays bearing on their social interests, which has forced me to inquire into their habits. In the next place I was for about 20 years connected with the People's College, an educational institution, and for three nights a-week I took classes for a number of years. I have been a Sunday school teacher. I was a member for many years of the Mechanics' Library, and also a member of its committee committee. I have been a member of the Free Public Library, voted in year by year by the Corporation from its commencement. I was one of the promoters of the freehold land movement, and a member of its first committee, and one of the first who got a vote. I am connected with one of the largest building societies in Sheffield as a director. I am the only artisan director; the others are much higher in social position. I was honorary secretary of the Working Men's Committee, after the Holmfirth flood, after the bursting of the Bilberry reservoir. I was treasurer of the Working Men's Patriotic Fund during the Crimean War, and I was honorary secretary of the Workmen's Tools Committee after the Bradford inundation.

7856. From all those circumstances, you believe yourself to be capable of judging accurately of what the opinions of your class are?—I believe that I should be thought so in Sheffield.

7857. Has there been any canvassing amongst them, and amongst that class generally, as to the effects of any further restrictions upon the sale of liquor on Sunday?—I believe that there has been a partial canvass of a number of workshops by the promoters of the Bill.

7858. Had there been a full canvass, what do you think the result would have been?—My opinion is decidedly that there would have been a great majority against the Bill.

7959. So that if anybody came to this Committee, and stated to us that the feelings and opinions of the majority of the working men of Sheffield were in favour of this Bill, he would be in error?—I should think that he was greatly mistaken.

7860. During your life, which has been passed amongst the people of Sheffield, can you speak to any great change in their habits and manners?—A very great one.

7861. Of what sort?—In the improvement of the character of their homes, in the personal appearance and habits of the workmen, in their more prudent habits, as manifested by the immense sums invested in freehold land societies and building societies, and, perhaps, what would not be a bad criterion, the increasing number of savings bank depositors.

7862. In contrasting their habits, as regards drunkenness, with past habits, has there been any great change with respect to that?—More in that than in any other respect.

7863. And I suppose the change has been for the better?—Certainly.

7864. Is that shown not merely by their own personal appearance, but by the very appearance of the town?—Decidedly so.

7865. Putting aside the terrible things that we have heard of in Sheffield, would you not say that, taking them as a class generally, they are a sober, well-conducted, honest, industrious body of men?—I believe, setting aside the class of outrage to which you have alluded, they will bear a favourable comparison with any town in the kingdom.

7866. And all that improvement has taken place under the present state of the law?—Yes.

7867. In your opinion, as a man well understanding the habits of your class, do you think that any further restriction is needed for their better improvement?—I do not; because I do not think that the improvement has been brought about by restriction, except in one case; I allude to the closing of public-houses on Sunday forenoon.

7868. You think that that has led to good?—I am sure it has.

7869. Will you explain in what way?—When I was a boy, I remember a number of characters who used to be constantly drunk on Sunday morning. They had been drunk on the Saturday and they got something to drink on the Sunday morning before they had become sober, and they became a perfect pest to society. But I may say that I intended to bring a letter up which evinced the other morning, alluding to a public house that I well knew when I was a lad. An uncle of mine was a visitor there, and he said that the landlord used to sell three barrels of beer on a Sunday morning; and that was only a small public-house.

7870. Putting the question directly to you that restriction having done good, do you think it requisite in the present state of improvement on the part of the working men, that there should be further restriction upon their liberty in that respect?—No.

7871. You think, then, that their habits enable them to take care of themselves, and to keep themselves out of mischief without the aid of that fostering law?—I think the law assumes every sane man to be competent to take care of himself.

7872. Do you think that the great body of the working men to whom we have confided the government of the country, require this nursing mother of the law?—I do not think they do.

7873. Do you think that they would be offended by it?—The great majority of them would.

7874. You think that those people are misled who believe that they are winning the good favour of the working men by promoting a law like this?—Most decidedly.

7875. Directing your attention to Paris, I suppose that was a new world to you, you had never been there before?—I had never been out of England, except to the Isle of Man, before.

7876. Then, when you got to Paris, you got into a new world?—I did.

7877. What was your opinion as to the behaviour and appearance on Sunday there?—I was very much struck with it. I saw some things which I very much approve of, and others to which I had a decided objection.

7878. Will you explain what you approved of and what you disliked?—It was certainly distasteful to me to see men following their ordinary occupation on Sunday, and on that point I think I take a workman's view. I should be very sorry to see that in this country, because I believe that such would be the force of competition that the workman would get no more for seven days' labour than he does for six. As such I should not like to see that part of a continental Sunday become common in England. That opens the wide question as to how far one should be the judge of what rest a man requires; but I may say that upon the question of sobriety and some other questions of morals, Paris was infinitely before many of our large towns, the metropolis here not excepted. In the public gardens and museums I saw a great number of people orderly and clean. You see in the neighbourhood of Sheffield a larger proportion perhaps of well-dressed and expensively-dressed people on Sundays, but I should not see on Sunday mornings so much personal cleanliness as I saw in Paris.

7879. Was

Mr.
J. Wilson.
1868.

879. Was it the social habit and manner of the people in Paris to take their wives and children to enjoy whatever they enjoyed on the Sunday in common with themselves?—That was almost the very time when I saw children, in the gardens of the Luxembourg and in some of the museums, in the Exhibition itself.

880. Did they differ much in that respect from the habits and manners of your own class in Sheffield?—There are many Sheffield people who take their wives and children out on a Sunday evening; but coming to the worst stratum perhaps of our society, they would not be the class, because we have a large class in Sheffield that would be popularly known there as those who burn charcoal on Sundays; that means keeping the houses, because they have no clothes to wear out in. We may see them on Sunday evenings early, but not afterwards.

881. Is there any large number of that class in Sheffield?—Not anything like what there used to be. We have another expression which is never said of a man on a week day: "I have seen such an one in his Sunday clothes; he is going to work in his Sunday clothes." That means that the man has not any other; he has only what stands up in, and perhaps those are some that have been given him by a more fortunate or more intelligent fellow-workman, or perhaps a master, or that he has had given him in charity.

882. Do you think that the working class in England is capable of being entrusted with the same degree of liberty that the French artisan is?—I find more order in France, which I think results from the more efficient supervision of the police, in public assemblies, in the theatre, and in places of public resort, at the railway station, and other places.

883. But what I want to know is, whether you believe that the working man in England can serve himself sober without the aid of law, as he does in France?—I believe that the great majority would.

884. Do you think that it would be fair towards the large majority that are temperate to force them because there are a few intemperate people?—That is one of my great objections to the principle of the Bill.

885. Then summing it up, as a whole, do you think that we should do wisely in putting this other restriction upon the liberty of the working man?—No, and for this reason: all legislation on social questions I think must be a compromise between extremes; and as allusion has been made to a meeting in Sheffield on the Sunday evening, Dr. Sale, I believe, proposed a compromise to you over Mr. Somes' Bill. I recollect that meeting better than Mr. Beal does.

886. What was that?—I have the paper here, and I can give Dr. Sale's words, I believe.

887. Was I present at the meeting?—I believe it was made to you personally; I think you were the time the guest of Mr. Brown, who was the Mayor. Dr. Sale says, "Then came the question, are you going to propose to close the public-houses on the Sunday whilst you allow the club-houses to remain open?" That was one of the objections of the Sheffield workmen.

888. That, I think, has reference to a proposed amendment of mine?—Yes; Dr. Sale says, "A portion of what took place in his interview with Mr. Roebuck had been reported, and the honourable Gentleman appeared to have said that (Dr. Sale) only wanted the public-houses closed on the Sunday evenings and not in the middle of the day. He would tell the meeting exactly what he said: he found Mr. Roebuck decidedly opposed to this Bill, on the ground that it would not be fair to the working classes. His reply was, that at a meeting which he attended a few evenings before, a working man who spoke on behalf of 50 others, assured him most earnestly that they would regard the Bill as a very great boon, because it would remove temptations which were too often irresistible. That man told him that working men yielded to the temptation held out to them on the Sundays, and that, in consequence of the excesses in which they indulged, they lost their self-respect, and were rendered miserable during the rest of the week. That showed that the working classes were not so much opposed to this Bill as those who had an interest in opposing it would lead people to believe. Still further, he assured Mr. Roebuck that he believed that a great part of the innkeepers had declared in favour of the measure. Some of them were asked, 'Will you sign a petition in its favour?' but they refused, alleging as their reason that their landlords would be offended by it. Mr. Roebuck told him the Bill would not pass the second reading, and he thereupon suggested, as a sort of compromise, if it could be shown to be expedient that permission should be given to open the public-houses for two hours in the middle of the day; say, from one to three, or from 12 to two; during which persons could get their dinner beer. If after that time the public-houses could be closed, he should consider that a very great amount of good had been done."

889. Do you agree with Dr. Sale in that?—I do not. I think that Dr. Sale's opinion of the working classes is inadequate.

890. The fact is, you fancy that you know the working classes a great deal better than he does?—I think I could illustrate that by the fact that some time ago a Member of the House of Commons was in Sheffield making some inquiries with reference to a Committee of which he was a member, and Dr. Sale personally brought him to me and asked me to take him round a number of our manufactories. I allude to Mr. Powell, the Member for Cambridge; I spent a good part of a day with him, and he heard the opinions of the working classes more freely expressed than he had ever heard, the open opinions of any of our working men in the country. It was on some Bill in connection with the extension of the Factories Act, I believe.

891. To sum your evidence up, you are entirely opposed to this Bill; you speak as a working man, and you think that you speak the opinions of working men?—I believe that I speak the opinions of the majority of intelligent men, setting aside those who take a religious view of the question.

892. Mr. Horsfall.] How long were you in Paris?—I think about 17 days.

893. And you think that you had a good opportunity of judging of the character of the working classes of Paris?—I visited some places that, perhaps, I should not have visited in this country, on purpose, because of the points recommended by the society. These were the instructions of the society, leaving us perfectly independent to treat them as we thought fit. We were to inquire into the "Quality and character of the work turned out by different nations. Influences affecting the character of the work and the trade generally, such as, for instance, cost of materials, wages, conditions and division of labour, education, habits of life, amusements, &c., trade associations."

7894. My object in putting this question is to complete some evidence which you have given; you told us that in a certain small public-house, when you were a boy, there were three barrels of ale consumed on a Sunday morning, but you did not give us the amount consumed now; can you do so?—I believe that the person keeping it now was an apprentice at the same place where I work, and I should think that he is not selling more than that per week. I do not know positively, but I know that it will not keep him without working.

7895. You have told us that it is your opinion that the majority of the working classes of Sheffield are opposed to this Bill?—Yes; I have the result of the canvass here.

7896. You do not deny, of course, that there are others who entertain a contrary opinion, and, in accordance with the evidence given here, that there are a majority in favour of it?—Yes, there are a majority, but I think nothing like that has been suggested; but, perhaps the best test of public opinion upon the question, as was alluded to by Mr. Beal, is the action upon the municipal elections. We have had a good deal of Sunday legislation in Sheffield.

7897. But with special reference to this Bill there has been no discussion in the town council?—I believe not.

7898. Mr. Roebuck.] You do not belong to the town council, I believe?—No.

7899. Mr. Evans.] You state that you remained about 17 days in Paris; I suppose that the opportunities of observation which you mentioned would be those of seeing the general demeanour, and appearance, and dress, and so forth, of the working men in Paris during the time you were there?—Both in their shops and in the cafés, and in their amusements.

7900. You say that, on the whole, the impression was favourable?—As far as sobriety and remarkably good and orderly conduct were concerned.

7901. But I understand you to say that what you did not like was the ordinary work being carried on on Sunday the same as on other days?—As a working man, I should not like that to be habit in this country.

7902. It is a thing which you would not think it desirable to imitate?—I should not.

7903. Mr. John Abel Smith.] I do not suppose that you think that the people in France have more liberty than in England, do you?—In certain respects they have more; in others they have less.

7904. In what respect have they more liberty than in this country?—They have more liberty in the matter of enjoyment on Sunday; how they shall spend their Sunday is a personal question.

7905. You allow that the museums and such like places are open?—Not merely that, but there is less attempt to interfere with the individual by society, that is to say, with the rights of the individual man.

7906. Can you tell me what you mean by that, for I really do not understand; I do not know what attempt there is to interfere with the individual man in this country?—I think that this Bill is an attempt to say on the part of certain people what the other portion shall do.

7907. You mean with regard to drinking, that is an interference with their rights or an invasion of their liberty?—I do so.

7908. Is there any other matter that you allude to in that respect?—That is one portion of it so far as Sunday is concerned; but there are other objections besides the Sunday.

7909. This Bill does not go to any other legislation than the Sunday, does it?—It does; Good Friday and fast days.

7910. You object to those days being included?—The majority of the artisans work on Good Friday in Sheffield; I worked last Good Friday.

7911. Does this Bill interfere with that?—It would interfere with many of my fellow workmen who live perhaps four miles off; they cannot go so far to dine, and they get their dinner in a public-house.

7912. Do many men in Sheffield dine in public-houses?—A number of those who live in their freehold allotments in the suburbs always dine in the town, some in their workshops, and some go to public-houses.

7913. Do many go to public-houses for the dinner?—A good portion of those who do not live in the borough; but I may say that some dine in the town at an eating-house; that is becoming more common than it was; but as a rule the bulk of the artisans reside in houses in their own occupation.

7914. And they dine in those houses?—Yes; they dine at home.

7915. They are a very limited number, then, who go to a public-house for their dinner?—Yes; there are no lodgers much in Sheffield.

7916. Again I say there would be a very limited number that would be affected by this Bill?—That depends upon what you mean by limited. It would be a small per-centage of the whole population, but it would not be a small per-centage who leave Sheffield on Sunday to go into the country.

7917. And there is a large proportion, you say, of people who go out on Sunday to the country to the neighbourhood of Worksop and various places?—Yes.

7918. What time do those people come back is it between nine and ten o'clock?—I am sure I do not know what time the trains return; but I think the Grimsby trains used to come in later than 10 o'clock.

7919. Of course, if they go to Worksop, they go by train; but the general habit, as we have been told, is not to go out by train, but walk out or go in carriages?—There would be some carriages, but more pedestrians; that is the general habit of the working classes.

7920. What time do they come back generally?—It would vary; all hours; I could not say.

7921. They are generally all back before 10 o'clock, are they not?—No; because sometimes people will walk to Chatsworth, or to Castleton, or to Hathersage; they walk there in the morning. I have walked to Hathersage and attended the Church service on a Sunday morning.

7922. How far is that?—I think it is about 10 miles.

7923. What time did you get back?—About 10 o'clock in the evening.

7924. Then the public-houses being shut at 10 would be no inconvenience to you?—It was not to me, because I drink water.

7925. Are you a teetotaler?—I never was, but at I was about nine years, and I did not drink any intoxicating drinks.

7926. I have no doubt, as your other evidence shows, that you are a person entitled to very great weight, and whenever you state a deliberate opinion, as you do here to-day, I am prepared to attach great importance to such evidence as you have given. With regard to the canvass which has lately taken place in Sheffield, I think you would that you had got it before you?—Yes, I have here.

7927. Have you the "Independent"?—Yes, I have the "Independent."

7928. Have you read the paper in which they state their opinion about the canvass in the leading article?—I have read it; but I know the working classes better than the editor of that paper.

7929. But it is a very respectable paper, is it not?—Very respectable, indeed; the editor is a personal friend of my own.

7930. He entertains the opinion, does he not, that it was a fairly conducted canvass; I do not think what its results were?—I do not think that uses that expression, he may do so.

7931. Mr. Roebuck.] Do you think it a fairly conducted canvass as representing the opinions of the town?—As far as the promoters, Dr. Sale, Mr. Flather, and the committee are concerned, I believe they intended everything to be right; but as far as its fairly representing the opinions of the working classes, I do not think it a fair one.

7932. Mr. John Abel Smith.] I quite mean what I am going to say, that I attach great importance to your opinion, and that I feel perfectly persuaded you have come here to give real, honest, and candid answers to the questions put to you, but you do believe, though it might not be its results prove much, that it was honestly and fairly done?—As far as the promoters were concerned, I believe they intended it to be perfectly honest.

7933. But you do not think that all their agents are accurate and careful?—I think not, by the results of the canvass varying so in different factories; if the people were left to themselves such could not be the case.

7934. But you still do believe that it was undertaken in a spirit of honestly meaning to get at an understanding of the inclinations of those men in those factories?—Yes.

7935. And that those were a fair representation of the trades of the town?—I scarcely think that the factories selected were a fair representation, as a whole.

7936. What have you to allege against them? I can only find one grinding wheel named as a grinding wheel. I am quite aware that the wheels are not canvassed, because I work at a grinding wheel. I find places where they employ perhaps six people, and I find one where there are only two voters put down their names. In crossing diagonally one street there are two grinding wheels; at one there are about 230 men employed, and at the other about 200, and neither of these were canvassed.

7937. I know that it is a fair representation of the whole opinion of the town, but you do not think that it is a fair representation of the feeling of the town, even as far as it goes?—Taking the works with which I am best acquainted, our own works, Messrs. Joseph Rodgers & Sons, I do not think it is a fair representation; it does not give a fair view of the feeling of the town.

anything like the number. That it was fairly done, I admit.

7938. You stated that there has been a great diminution of drunkenness in Sheffield. There have been great efforts made to reduce the amount of drinking and drunkenness which existed at one time, have there not?—We have a very energetic body of teetotallers who have done a great amount of good.

7939. Are those what are called temperance societies?—We have had a split in them. I think the temperance societies now are divided into a religious portion, and one which takes a more secular view of things.

7940. Can you tell me whether there is not a large society called the Temperance Society?—I believe we have the Sheffield Temperance Society, and we used to have a Little Sheffield Temperance Society, but I think they joined together, but I cannot tell at all who belonged to it. I do not remember the two names, but there is a Sheffield Temperance Society, and I say that many of them are very ardent teetotallers, and have been so for a great number of years.

7941. I suppose from your answers to me that you are very strongly persuaded of the evil consequences of indulgence in drink?—Most decidedly so.

7942. Both moral and social?—Yes; I should think nobody can doubt it.

7943. But you think that restriction has gone to the very utmost limit that you think can be fairly endured?—I think that it would frustrate the object which many religious people have in view.

7944. Independent of the religious consideration which you say yourself in your evidence you would exclude, but socially do you think that restriction has gone to the utmost limit at which it would be tolerable?—I am led to that from the action in our municipal elections whenever any one has come forward advocating restrictions, either Sunday closing on religious grounds, or taking up the question of the Permissive Bill, or anything like a Maine Liquor Law.

7945. They have always been rejected, have they?—Yes, and some good men too. I have not always voted for their rejection. I have voted for a gentleman at present in the room who has been rejected two or three times, and I should be very glad to see him in the town council.

7946. Do you recollect the Act of 1854?—I do.

7947. That was in operation for 12 months, was it not?—Yes, it was.

7948. Do you recollect any evil consequences resulting from it?—I remember a good deal of disapprobation on the part of the working men. I can give a remarkable instance that was told me by a fellow-workmen on Saturday. Two fellow-workmen of my own, two very intelligent men, who are in the habit of walking many miles, walked out on a Sunday, and they called at Beighton on their return. It was during the time the Act was in operation, and they were too late to have refreshments. I think the houses were closed at two o'clock, but they were too late, not dreaming but that they would be admitted as travellers, but there had not been those decisions on what bonâ fide means at that time. They started from Beighton, though they were much in need of refreshment; the rain began to descend in a perfect torrent, and they were thoroughly drenched when they got home, and my informer told me that the only punishment he should like to inflict upon upon the promoters of this Bill would be, that they should have a walk from Beighton hungry and tired in a storm like that.

7949. Were those the same parties that were mentioned by Mr. Beal?—No, not at all; they are a higher class than the "Wildbloods."

7950. In 1854, there was no public disorder in Sheffield in consequence of the Bill, was there?—We are not a disorderly town, and I do not think that there was any public disorder. I remember a public meeting to promote Sabbath closing in 1854.

7951. And that was a failure, was it not?—No, it was not, it was carried; that was a meeting of the Sheffield Temperance Association, presided over by the late Edward Smith, Esq., a very zealous supporter of all philanthropic movements. I remember that being followed by a motion in the town council for closing public-houses, and it was carried, but less than half the council voted on the question. Councillor Bassett brought it forward; he is a very zealous local preacher, and a man of good social position, and a zealous friend of education; and yet, the very November following, he was ignominiously rejected by the burgesses. Seventeen voted for Mr. Bassett's motion, 10 against one neutral.

7952. Mr. Locke.] What was the precise proposition, then?—To close the public-houses on Sunday; I would not speak positively from memory whether it was for the total closing, but my impression is, that the meeting of the Temperance Association was for total closing.

7953. That was a mere expression of their opinion; was any action taken upon it by the council?—Mr. Bassett brought forward that motion, probably influenced by the feeling of the meeting at the Temperance Hall.

7954. Then they carried it; did they take any further steps?—No, Mr. Bassett was put out on that question; the issue was raised upon Mr. Bassett's Sunday view. He has put up again, and been put out by a brewer; he had a colleague (a brewer) on the first occasion, but he was put out, and has been prevented from getting in by another brewer since.

7955. Mr. John Abel Smith.] After the opinions that you have expressed about Sunday working, have you any feeling for the great number of people who are employed in public-houses on Sunday?—I think that would rather be a religious question.

7956. I understood you to say that you object to any law which compels a man to follow his weekly occupation on the Sunday?—No, I did not put it on legal grounds; I think I put it on moral grounds.

7957. You may put it on any grounds you like; but after what you said upon the subject, have you no feeling for the number of persons employed in public-houses on Sunday?—I should try to set them a better example. The publicans would voluntarily close if people did as I do on Sunday.

7958. Then you would like to see the public-houses closed?—I should like to see them closed not actively, but passively; the publicans would close then themselves if people stayed out of them as I do.

7959. You wish to see them closed, but you object to their being closed by law?—I think that gets beyond the province of the Legislature because it appears to me that the ground which Mr. Bassett put forward the Sunday question in the town council was, that we were a Christian community; and I think the danger, that if we are to begin to legislate to enforce the Decalogue you may take the seventh commandment, and why not take that as well as the fourth? Some of them are utterly impossible for the Legislature to enforce; you could not frame a law to convict for violating the 10th commandment. We are agreed upon the 8th, 9th, and 10th; there is no difference at all about them.

7960. Again, I say, whether on social or religious grounds, you would like to see the public houses closed, if they were closed in consequence of the temperate habits of the people?—Yes, because I should be glad to see the people become sober and prudent.

7961. But you object to that soberness being enforced by restrictive laws?—No, this is it; object to enforce my particular views on the conscience of another man. For instance, there are many habits that I think pernicious, such as smoking and snuff-taking, but I would not come and ask the Legislature to pass a law forbidding a man to smoke or take a pinch of snuff. I should like to put in one paper, as I have made a statement as to what I consider the great improvement in the social and moral condition of the people, shown by the Savings Bank Returns. In 1841 Sheffield had 5,284 depositors. I have been working man since that time, and that is why I take that time, and the deposits amounted to 161,000 £, that was equal to 1 £. 8 s. 10 d. per head of the population. In 1851 the number of depositors had increased to 8,346, and in 1866 to 19,581, with a balance due to them of 430,460 £. 18 s. 8 d. From the last Returns from the Savings Banks presented to Parliament for the year ending November 1866, divided by the population of 1861, because they were combined in the return so that it is the returns of 1866 divided by the population of 1861, I find that in the United Kingdom the deposits are equal to 1 £. 5 s. per head. In England and Wales they are equal to 1 £. 11 s. 4 d. In the manufacturing county of Lancashire they are equal to 1 £. 10 s. In Yorkshire they are equal to 1 £. 11 s. 0 ½ d. In Leeds, a highly moral town, they are higher, being 1 £. 13 s. 10 d. Sheffield, in 1866, divided by the population of 1861, with all its bad character, it is 2 £. 6 s. 6 d. per head of the population, so that it is far above the average. But to contrast it with Leeds, the metropolis of Yorkshire; in 1866 Leeds had 12,809 depositors, or one in 16 of the population, and the United Kingdom had one in 20; whereas Sheffield, in 1841, had one in 21 of the population, in 1851 it had one in 16 ½, and in 1866 it had one in 9 ¾.

7962. Mr. John Abel Smith.] I suppose with regard to those charcoal burners, you do not entertain any doubt that their burning charcoal is owing to their intemperance?—To some extent, in some cases it may be that they are inefficient workmen, but mainly it would be owing to drunkenness.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

MR. JOSEPH WADHAMS, called in; and Examined.

7963. Mr. Locke.] ARE you a member of the Birmingham Town Council?—Yes, I have been for the last 10 years.

7964. Are you a licensed victualler?—I am at a licensed victualler now; I was a licensed victualler for 20 years. I retired from that trade about four years ago.

7965. Are you president of the United Towns Association and National Licensed Victuallers' Defence League?—Yes, I have been about four years, and from its commencement, 15 or 16 years ago, I was a member of the committee of that association.

7966. What towns does that association represent?—At the present time it represents Aston, containing 95 licensed victuallers; Birmingham, 100; Burton, 80; Bath, 152; Bradford, 100; Coventry, 264; Derby, about 200; we have not an exact return for that; Dewsbury, about 200; Dudley and the district, about 255; Hull, 300; Leeds, about 400; Lichfield, 60; Lutterworth, 10; Northampton, about 100; Sheffield, about 100; Stockport, 136; Stourbridge, 58; Wolverhampton, 218; Walsall, 100; Warrington, about 100; Worcester about 150; Wednesbury, 70.

7967. Is Kidderminster one?—I have not got here in my list. The association numbers, in the whole, about 4,000 licensed victuallers.

7968. What are the objects of the United Towns Association and National Licensed Victuallers' Defence League?—There are associations established in most of the large towns for the protection of their trade interests, and the United Towns Association is the centre of those associations used to watch over proceedings in Parliament. Whenever any gentleman introduces a Bill into Parliament, affecting the interests of the licensed victuallers, the Bill is examined by them, and we are in communication also with the London association, and we communicate to the societies in the League, and, if necessary, we endeavour to take such steps as we deem proper for the purpose of averting, or, if possible, preventing or making our views known to the Members of Parliament, with a view of opposing, by petition or otherwise, such Bills as are introduced which are calculated to injure the trade to which we belong.

7969. Has the Bill which is now before this Committee been examined by your society?—

Yes.

7970. And have you yourself given your attention to the provisions of the Bill?—Yes, I have, and further, we have sent a circular which has been carried to all the towns in union with us, and we have received their replies. We find that the present Bill is a much worse Bill, more stringent, and affects the interests of the trade and the interests of the public considerably more than the Bill which we had to deal with last Session.

7971. Was that Bill introduced by the honourable Member for Chichester last year?—The same gentleman who has introduced this Bill: but this Bill prohibits the sale of ale, wine, or spirits upon the premises at all, excepting to travellers and lodgers, and persons with their meals. Last year, the Bill introduced by that gentleman was not so restrictive; it was restrictive in the hours, but it allowed the sale of ale, wine, and spirits, and proper refreshments, to persons on the premises.

7972. Mr. Yorke.] You describe this Bill as prohibiting the sale of liquors without qualification; that is not the case within the metropolitan area?—No, not within the metropolitan district, but it is so with regard to the country.

7973. Mr. Locke.] However, within the metropolitan district the exceptions are with regard to lodgers, travellers, and persons taking liquor for consumption during a bonâ fide meal?—Yes.

7974. It permits the consumption of wine, beer, or spirits during that meal?—Yes.

7975. You say that the Bill of last year permitted the sale of liquor, to be consumed off or on the premises, during the hours which the public-houses were allowed to be kept open?—Yes; I think either to be consumed off or on the premises.

7976. With regard to that circular which you spoke of, will you read it?—In order to ascertain the feeling of the towns which I represent, we sent a circular to those towns, and required their replies, which we have.

7977. Mr. Roebuck.] When you say the towns, you mean the licensed victuallers of those towns, and not the people of the towns generally?—Not the people of the towns generally. We sent it to the secretary of the Licensed Victuallers' Association

ciation of those towns which I have named, to ascertain as far as possible if they had any objections, and what, to the Bill before the House, and ascertain their views, and whether there were any special reasons why this Bill would act inconveniently to the licensed victuallers. The questions put in the circular are these: "What are the feelings in your town, as far as you can ascertain them, respecting further restrictions on the time for the sale of liquors, &c., on Sunday, and especially the total prevention thereof upon the premises, as proposed by Mr. Smith's Bill?" That is one question. The next is, "What are the opinions of the trade, and how many of it (if any) close now the whole of Sunday?" that is to persons who are in the trade; how many close of their own accord on the Sunday. "Did any meeting take place for or against Wilson Patten's Act, when in operation, and what were the feelings or the expressions of feelings upon it generally, and especially by the Press?" "How many public-houses and how many beerhouses have you?" We asked the secretary to ascertain that for us; and also, "How many persons or traders besides the licensed victuallers and beersellers, such as omnibus, car, &c., drivers and conductors, &c., tobacconists, confectioners, fruiterers, and others are engaged in their occupation or business on Sunday?" "Do you intend offering any person or persons (or do you know of any person or persons who do) to give evidence against this Bill?" We received their replies, uniformly condemning the principles of the present Bill, and stating in various ways that it would operate prejudicially and inconveniently to the public in general.

7978. From all those places to which you sent, did you receive replies?—Yes.

7979. Mr. Roebuck.] Have you the reports with you from those places?—We have reports from most of them; their letters.

7980. Will you read one which you think fairly represents the reports which you have had?—Here is one from Dudley: "Sunday Closing Bill.—In reply to your communication, and in answer to the questions it contains in reference to the above Bill, the following information is to the fullest extent within my power relating to the town of Dudley: (1.) The members of our Society are decidedly against any further restrictions on the time for the sale of liquors, &c., on the Sunday, and the majority of the inhabitants generally are altogether opposed to Mr. Smith's Bill. (2.) The majority of the licensed victuallers are against Sunday closing, and only 12 close the whole of Sunday. (3.) I have no recollection of any meeting against Wilson Patten's Act. (4.) In Dudley there are 255 public-houses or licensed victuallers, and 100 beer-houses. (5.) Other trades, besides licensed victuallers, are engaged in their business on Sunday. (6.) Our society has no one to offer to give evidence against the Bill, nor do I know any others here who have;" and there are a number of letters, all to the same effect.

7981. Did any of them offer witnesses?—None of them; the names of persons have been sent to the secretary of the London Association, and some have been heard, I believe, and others will probably be heard.

7982. But they did not send any to you?—No, not to us.

7983. What is your own opinion with respect to this Bill?—My opinion with reference to the Bill is, that the present law is amply sufficient for all purposes, if it is properly carried out but I believe it is not properly carried out. In my opinion, there is more drunkenness caused on Sunday morning within the prohibited hours a great deal of Sunday drinking takes place within the prohibited hours up to a certain time on the Sunday morning. I have conversed frequently with some of the principal persons in our town with reference to this very question and it appears to be attended with some difficulty as to carrying out further restrictions by the present police arrangements. As a licensed victualler, I know that when I was a licensed victualler, I neither did business myself in prohibited hours, and I knew a large number of persons who did not do business in prohibited hours, and we were very much annoyed at certain persons in different parts of the town who did do so, because it is very unfair for the trade for persons to be allowed (and if they are not allowed they are passed by) to do business in prohibited hours, while other persons are visited by the police pretty regularly and the evil is that persons, after the Saturday night's drinking, are drinking again early on the Sunday morning, and those are the persons who are taken into custody for drunkenness during the Sunday. From my experience, I believe that if a person is kept sober during the Sunday morning, and he dines with his family, and the afterwards takes a walk to a park, or a walk into the country, or a short trip by the railway, or anything of that kind, although he may call at several houses, or one or more houses, and take a little refreshment, that person never gets drunk. Then again, very frequently, the same persons who are habitually accustomed to get drunk on Sunday morning are the persons who are frequently before the police court over and over again. In order to prove my opinion that drunkenness has considerably decreased of late years, I applied at the office of the police at Birmingham, and, out of courtesy, they gave me the following return. I asked them for the number of persons charged with drunkenness between the hour of 12 at midnight on Saturday and 12 at midnight on Sunday during the years 1853, 1854, 1855, and 1856; that was during the operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act; of course, not the whole time, but it took in the time, and I also took last year, 1867, and up to the end of March in the present year. In 1853 the total number of cases was 148; in 1854, 145; in 1855, 149; and in 1856, 174. I did not go on any further until last year, for I did not ask for it, and I did not think it necessary but it is singular that the number of cases apprehended during this very last year was 174 precisely, the same number as in 1856; although during that time there must have been an increase in the population of Birmingham of from 80,000 to 100,000 persons; that, to my mind, clearly shows that drunkenness cannot be on the increase.

7984. Mr. Locke.] Has there been an increase of from 80,000 to 100,000?—Yes, I doubt.

7985. What is the population now?—The population at the present time is about 350,000; the number of cases in 1868, at the end of March, 39, and that multiplied by 4, makes 156.

7986. Do you deduce from that that drunkenness has decreased in Birmingham?—It must have have done; and I consider that that is attributable to a variety of causes. I think not, by any means, to any restrictive measures, but to the establishment of various kinds of institutions in the town. We have, of late, parks; we have three parks; we have public libraries; and we have other scientific institutions; and I believe there is a general improvement in the character of the working people.

17987. Have you reading-rooms in addition to the free libraries?—We have three free libraries, and one central one upon a more extensive scale, making four free libraries, and four reading-rooms.

17988. For whom are those libraries and reading-rooms intended?—They are open for the use of the public in general, and they lend out books to any person finding a ratepayer to certify that that person is a proper person to be entrusted with the care of the book, and will take care of it; that is all that is required; and he has the loan of a book for a certain time, say a week.

17989. How are those institutions supported?—They are supported out of the public fund by the Free Libraries Act, which has been adopted by the town council within the last 10 years; I do not recollect the exact date.

17991. Mr. Yorke.] Are those libraries open on Sunday?—No; they are not open on Sunday; the parks are open on Sunday, where people in large numbers go to take a walk with their families; and I have no hesitation in saying that yesterday, from 8,000 to 10,000 people visited Aston Park, and it was the same on Sunday week, because I happen to be chairman of the parks sub-committee, and I inquired for myself, and I found that between 9,000 and 10,000 people visited, yesterday, Aston Park; that park which was opened by Her Majesty some few years ago; and I have a return of the number of persons who have attended the three parks at Birmingham, and visited the hall, which is an ancient place of great interest, and a large number of persons walk through the hall, and although there is very little to see excepting a small museum and a few matters of interest at Aston Hall, yet the grounds are very nicely kept and much frequented; they are open on Sunday from nine in the morning till, at the present time, eight o'clock at night.

17992. Mr. Locke.] Do you say that the libraries and reading-rooms are not open on Sunday?—No, they are not open on Sunday.

17993. Why are they not open on Sunday?—I do not know the reason why, but I believe the council have not adopted it as a rule. I am not aware that they open any of them at all on Sunday; the question has never been raised with reference to Sunday.

17994. But the museum and the park was open on Sunday from the commencement, was it not?—It is open since it has come into the hands of the corporation; the corporation support the parks under the Three Parks Act. One park was kindly given by Mr. C. B. Adderley, one of the honourable Members of this House for our district of the county, and another has been given by Lord Calthorpe; he gave 30 acres of land; 0.69.

at least, as far as he was enabled to give the use of it during his lifetime, and we trust and hope that the present Lord Calthorpe will extend the same privilege to the town; and that park is used very frequently, as you will see. The number attending on Sunday only, from 6th January 1867 till December 1867, has been, as nearly as can be estimated—and it is a return officially made to the council from the Parks Committee—the number of persons amounted to 167,200 who visited Aston Hall; the number of persons who visited Aston Park is 354,000; the number of persons who visited Adderley Park is estimated at 135,510, and Calthorpe Park 233,290. I thought that it was my duty to show that the people of Birmingham did not sit in public-houses to drink, but that they went to those places which were afforded them with their wives and their children, but that after walking about an hour they require some little refreshment, and they call going home at different houses that I know, and take their glass of beer and their crust of bread and cheese, or anything of that sort that they might require. During the present year, from January the 5th to June the 14th, the numbers on Sunday only who attended Aston Hall were 86,900; Aston Park, 203,450; Adderley Park, 64,250, and Calthorpe Park, 148,330; that is the estimated number of persons who have attended the three parks on Sundays during the present year up to June the 14th.

17995. Is there any music in those parks?—None whatever; there is no attraction more than that Aston Park is very nicely laid out, round the terraces and round the hall, with floral arrangements; and they promenade among the trees, and walk about, and enjoy the fresh air. In Calthorpe Park it is only an open space, divided by walks. In the autumn of last year the committee planted an avenue of trees in Calthorpe Park; and Adderley Park is divided by walks, and there are also trees planted in Adderley Park. There is also the Whitton Cemetery, a very nicely arranged cemetery, beautifully planted; and the people take a walk there, and that is about two and a-half or three miles from the centre of the town.

17996. Do you think that the thousands of people who take excursions in those different parks on Sunday would be inconvenienced if this Bill were passed?—I think considerably so; because a person takes his dinner at home, with his wife and family; he then, about three o'clock, takes his walk, as many of them cannot afford to ride, and do not ride; they go to one of those places which are open, and they walk about, and enjoy the fresh air there for two or three hours; and they necessarily want some refreshment. They can get tea and coffee at one of those places, because there is a refreshment room provided in the park; but they sell neither ale, wine, nor spirits. There is another very nicely arranged place, which formerly formed part of the park, but which is now gardens, called the Lower Grounds, at Aston, and there they can get a glass of beer or a glass of wine, during the time which is allowed by law for persons to sell; that is to say, after five o'clock until I do not know how long the man keeps open; but it is generally well conducted, and attended by respectable people, and there is good order and regularity maintained there. I have no doubt that he sells until 11 o'clock, the proper time which is allowed by law; not at all times in the the gardens, because the gardens are closed at dusk; but there are other persons who go and sit down in the house, I have no doubt, afterwards. I have never been there; but I have no doubt that is so. Persons returning after walking about the park necessarily require some refreshments, and my opinion is that they should be at liberty to take them. I see a very great deal of that, having taken an interest in the park. I have walked down there on a Sunday, and I frequently go at other times, and I have never seen any pretensions to drunkenness in the afternoon; in fact, there are too many sober and well-conducted people to countenance it, and for that reason I consider that it would be extremely inconvenient were they not allowed to get, if they require it, a glass of ale or a bit of bread and butter, or a crust of bread and cheese, or anything of that sort, on their return. Then there is another mode in which the inhabitants of Birmingham enjoy themselves; they go out by railway. There are three lines of railway; the London and North Western, the Great Western and the Midland; persons go to Worcester and they go to Bromsgrove by one line of railway, and they go to Sutton by another, and Aston by another railway; and they also go to Solihull and Knowle by the Great Western Railway; a number of persons go out; it varies, of course, in accordance with the weather; on fine days a large number of persons go there. The last trains that come back arrive at Birmingham, one a little before 10 and the other a little after 10. Those people having been out there walking about and breathing the fresh air, when they come home probably require their supper, and they are persons generally who do not keep ale, or wine, or spirits in their own houses; the majority of them cannot afford it; so that they necessarily go to the houses in the vicinity of where they live, and buy what they want fresh. I have heard the argument used that persons could get it on Saturday night, but my own experience is that I prefer beer drawn fresh from the barrel, rather than have it bottled the night before.

7997. You are not singular, I believe, in that opinion?—No; those who understand what a glass of good beer is would prefer it, like myself, drawn fresh from the barrel.

7998. Probably teetotallers would not care whether anybody else had it fresh or not?—They do not take it themselves, and therefore they cannot be very good judges.

7999. You think that this Bill would be a great inconvenience to all those persons?—I have no doubt of it, for the reasons which I have set forth to the Committee.

8000. Do you remember the passing of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in 1854?—Yes, very well. I was a licensed victualler then. In fact, I was one of the committee who took some part in opposing that Bill, or the Bill that was introduced, which resulted in the one which regulates the trade now. The Bill that was introduced was more stringent than Mr. Wilson Patten's; and when it was introduced by Mr. Wilson Patten, it was more stringent than the one that was agreed to.

8001. You mean the Bill that was introduced during the Session of 1854 by Mr. Wilson Patten, and the Bill which was altered and passed?—Yes; as introduced, it was more stringent than as it passed. We were advised by several friends that we conferred with, and honourable Members likewise, to agree to the present Act; but from that time up to the present, we have been blamed for doing so. We were blamed for consenting to it; and although I do not remember that there were any public meetings held in our town, yet great general dissatisfaction was expressed not only by the licensed victuallers, but by the people at large; and at that time I was a licensed victualler, and knew it to be the case. Persons after they had been out on Sunday afternoon, and taken their walk at the present time of the year, would not call upon me until perhaps nine o'clock in the evening, and we found it was extremely inconvenient to request gentlemen to go away as soon as they had sat down perhaps at 10 o'clock, and I was very glad and so were the trade, and the people, as far as I became acquainted with them, were very glad when that law was altered.

8002. There were great objections made to you by persons living in Birmingham, as to the operation of that Act whilst it was in force?—Continually so by members of the trade, and by the public at large. The public do not believe that Parliament will pass such a restrictive Bill, but there is no organisation among the public and therefore it is necessary for an organisation in connection with the licensed victuallers, or some other body, to bring forward a movement in opposition.

8003. Do you consider that further restriction would tend to diminish drunkenness?—I do not think so; I say, unhesitatingly, that the present law in the restriction of hours is not carried out and if any means could be devised whereby better supervision could be established, during the present prohibited hours on the Sunday morning, it would tend to improve the condition of those persons who are disposed to get drunk for they are but comparatively few in our town. The working men, as a rule, are a respectable and intelligent class of men, but there are some who will get drunk, and who, after receiving their wages on Saturday night, cannot hold it in; they can get drunk, but I think that the whole community should not be blamed or inconvenienced consequent upon the few persons who are determined to get drunk, if they have got the means to get it. I think it would be a great benefit indeed to our town, and I believe the same principle applies to other towns, if some further or better means of supervision was established by the police force, in order to carry out the present law.

8004. What description of supervision would you suggest?—I do not think that an ordinary policeman is a man that should supervise houses of this kind. I think it would be better to have a superior officer for the purpose, because I have no doubt at all that there is a great temptation in the way of the police officer who goes to visit those places.

8005. You mean that he is tempted?—He may be tempted to receive money; I never saw it given, but he may be tempted to receive money or a reward to pass by one house, and visit others. In fact, I have known, personally, that houses have been so conducted, and I have reported them myself to the police, and others have done the same, and the superintendent has immediately sent another person upon that beat and detected the offence, but after supervision is passed over I have no doubt that they fall into the same error again.

8006. You mean that the supervision should improved?—I think that the supervision should improved, and you would find it do more good the law could be strictly carried out on Sunday morning, as it immediately follows the Saturday night, when a man has perhaps had rather more drink than he ought, and but little to eat on Saturday night, and he begins to drink again if can get it on Sunday morning, and he does himself more harm, and that man continues in a drunken state all day, in all probability, and if the better supervision could be carried out, I think it would have a greater tendency to improve the condition of that class of persons than the Bill for further restrictions, because further restrictions means further evasions.

8007. Mr. Roebuck.] In giving the list of the names of towns in connection with your society, you did not mention York; can you tell me any reason why York is not one of the towns in connection with your society?—When our United Towns Association and National Licensed Victuallers' Defence League was first established, it was the only one, but since then there is another of a similar character in the Manchester district; it is established for the same purpose, but it is not included in our district. There are no societies now, and there are some societies which stand independent; Bristol, for instance.

8008. Then the answer would be, that York is not in your district?—It is not, it belongs to the Manchester district, which has a similar association for that district.

8009. I want to know how you make out your opinion as to drinking in prohibited hours; you say that drinking in prohibited hours in the earlier part of Sunday, leads to great drunkenness afterwards; how do you ascertain that that takes place?—From my knowledge of the trade. I am now following the trade of a maltster, and consequently I have to go in different parts of the town on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday upon my business, and I frequently hear of those complaints. Only three weeks ago a very respectable person who is a licensed victualler told me that three or four weeks ago, yesterday, just at the time she was opening her house-door at half-past 12 o'clock on the Sunday, and the people were coming from St. Thomas's Church, a person came up to the step at the moment; he was evidently tipsy; she saw it, and she told him that he could not allow him to come in. He began to swear, and was determined to do so, and he created a disturbance, so much so, that there were from 50 to 80 or 100 people assembled round, and she was obliged to send for the police. He did not tell me where the house was, but he told me that it was evident that there were houses open in the neighbourhood, otherwise this person could not have got drunk; and he was not only drunk, and there were other people passing, and she had to suffer this inconvenience, and no doubt the persons who were passing from St. Thomas's Church in the immediate vicinity supposed that she had been supplying that man with drink and had just turned him out, or something of that kind, and therefore she had to sufferodium for other people's misdoings; and I know that such a thing does exist in various parts of the town.

8010. I rather gather from your evidence, though you have not stated it distinctly, that there is some sort of improper dealing with the police to prevent complete supervision by the police?—I firmly believe that it is so; I have conversed with different mayors at Birmingham upon this very subject and they have said that there is great difficulty in carrying out the law, and I believe that you would require to have a considerable increase of police force to do it, but I believe that the best way of dealing with this question is to give the supervision of the houses to a superior class of men than the ordinary policemen.

8011. Could not the town council do that with their present powers if they pleased?—They could if they pleased.

8012. You being a town councillor, have you ever proposed that to them?—I should rather that some one else would do it. Then I would suggest, as individually I am here to give what my candid opinion is, and I hope it may be beneficial to them, that I am satisfied what I am stating is the truth, and I hope that some good result will arise from it. If you see policemen smoking cigars while visiting the houses, I believe they do not buy their cigars, but are given them, and they are given glasses of beer; in fact, not of late years, but frequently, men have been discharged for getting drunk in supervising public-houses.

8013. Seeing the inefficiency, even of the present inspection, do you think there would be any increase of inefficiency if greater inspection were required?—I think that, instead of giving a man who receives his 18s. or 17. a week the power to supervise houses of that kind, it would be better to give the power to a superior man at 30s. or 35s., because you would get a more responsible man, and the man, for his own sake, would pay more respect to his office.

8014. My question was, if the police be inefficient now, would they not be much more inefficient if they had a great deal more to do?—I am of opinion that it would be quite impossible to carry out any further restrictions, and that is why I said that any further restrictive measures would lead to considerable further evasions.

8015. So that this law, instead of being a restrictive law for good, would be merely a restrictive law for evil, by increasing the breaches of the law?—There is not the least doubt of it.

8016. Have you any mode of ascertaining the number of working men who attend the public libraries in Birmingham; has there been any account taken of them?—There are returns published; the Free Libraries' committee report quarterly. I did not think to bring the report with me, but it can be very easily furnished.

8017. Could you state what are the number of the working men who attend the libraries throughout the day?—I could not tell; it would be impossible for me to tell you; but I have frequently gone into the libraries when I have been in the neighbourhood, and I see the working men during their dinner hour run in there frequently and read the newspapers or books, and they eat their dinner there, and they stay there as long as they can, and then they go to their work. Other classes of persons go when they have an hour to spare, and I have never gone into either of the three libraries without seeing a number of persons belonging to the artisan class reading quietly either a newspaper or some work there.

8018. Has no right-minded man ever proposed to the town council to keep them open on Sunday?

Mr.
J. Wadhams.

1868.

—The question was spoken about at first, but it was decided not to open them on Sunday.

8019. Do you know what reason was given for not opening them on Sunday?—No; there were some persons who objected even to the parks and the hall being open on Sunday, but, however, the question was carried, and the parks are open from 9 o'clock in the morning until 8 at night

8020. I gather from you, as far as I can understand, that there was really some opposition to opening those sources of instruction on Sunday?—Yes, there was, but that was some years since; I do not remember it precisely.

8021. You do not think that there has been any attempt of late to open them so that the workmen may improve their minds on Sunday?—No, it seems to go on very smoothly. They can get out on Saturday and read them at home, and therefore it appears to work satisfactorily; because persons would prefer going into the open air, and they either prefer going by a short railway trip, or a walk to some place and back again, or they go to the parks and back again, and walking back again they want some refreshment.

8023. You have paid a good deal of attention I have no doubt to your business, has it ever entered into your mind to get out any calculation of the quantity of capital employed in the trade of licensed victuallers in England?—I do not know what it is in England, but for my own satisfaction I got out the enormous amount of wealth which belonged to the trade which I represent here to day. The number of licensed victuallers that I have enumerated amount to 4,000, and if you take them upon the average of 500 l. each, that gives about 2,000,000 l.

8024. Supposing a Bill like this were to pass, what do you suppose would be the degree in which that 2,000,000 l. of money would be deteriorated?—Speaking of the loss that they would sustain through being unable to sell on the Sunday, it would be considerable; besides, they would have to keep the same staff of persons and pay them the same wages, and it would be a considerable loss; it might not be one-seventh, but it would be a considerable loss.

8025. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] Have you got any return of the amount taken by any particular licensed victualler on the Sunday, compared with other days?—No; that would vary according to circumstances. Houses in outlying districts, and in country and rural districts would do more business on the Sunday than on any other day in the week, but houses in the town would do but a small amount of business on the Sunday; but yet it would be extremely inconvenient if this Bill were carried, and it would be a loss to the persons who are doing business, and be extremely inconvenient to the inhabitants in the immediate neighbourhood, because people like to get what they require when they require it.

8026. With reference to an answer which you gave respecting persons who returned home, and who then, not keeping ale in their own house, go to the licensed victuallers for it; have you a return from any of the licensed victuallers' houses in Birmingham, which would show that there is a considerable trade carried on upon that day, with reference especially to those persons?—I do not think it would be a considerable trade, but it would inconvenience the persons who lived in the neighbourhood, and it would have a tendency to produce evasions of the law. Supposing I was a licensed victualler living in the neighbourhood, although the law might require me to close at 10 o'clock, yet if my neighbour came from a 10 miles walk, and he wanted beer at his supper, I should be disposed to accommodate him, though I should know at the time that it would be contrary to law; and my reason for doing so would be this: that if I would not accommodate my neighbour at that time he would consider it a hardship, and he would go somewhere else during the weektime for his beer, and I should lose his custom.

8027. If you, who are a scrupulous person, would not scruple to evade the law in such a condition of things, you think that persons who are less scrupulous than you, who must be very numerous, would constantly evade the law?—I have not the least doubt of it; and it would be rather a matter of duty to do it, because if they were to offend their customers from time to time they would lose their custom altogether, and persons who would be more accommodating and less scrupulous than they are would have their trade.

8028. When you say that they would find it their duty to evade the law, that could only be on account of their believing that the law was of an extremely harsh and inconvenient character?—Precisely so, and therefore I think that the present law in my opinion is amply sufficient for all purposes, and it has been arranged from time to time.

8029. Mr. Evans.] How long have you lived in Birmingham?—I was not born in Birmingham, but I came to Birmingham about 45 or 46 years ago.

8030. Do you consider that Birmingham has become a more or a less sober place than it used to be in your time?—There has been a considerable improvement in the character of the working people. Before I was a licensed victualler I worked at a trade, and consequently am thoroughly acquainted with the habits, or what were the habits, of the working people at that time.

8031. To what do you attribute that improvement?—To the establishment of the institutions which I have named, the establishment of free libraries and other scientific institutions and the parks, and if men are induced to go to the parks to see the beautiful floral arrangements there, and to breathe the fresh air at the same time, I think they feel themselves invigorated by such scenes, and are anxious to go there again; I think that also education in general has tended to improve the condition of the working classes.

8032. In fact, I suppose you would be of opinion that the working classes are generally improved, and are improved in other things besides in the matter of drunkenness?—I am satisfied that that is so; I am satisfied that the same steady progress, if it is made in the same direction, will still further improve those persons that you are most desirous of dealing with, that is to say, persons who have not sufficient control over themselves; I mean persons who receive their money on Saturday night, and can scarcely hold it until they have spent it all, and who want legislating for.

8033. Are

Mr.
J. Wadhams.

8033. Are there many working living in lodgings in Birmingham?—Not a very large number.

8035. In fact, I understand you to say, that there are not many persons among the working classes that live in lodgings, but that of those who do, some of them take their meals at public-houses, some of them take their meals in the park, and some of them on the premises where they are employed?—Yes. When I was a licensed victualler, 20 or 30 persons used to come during the dinner hour, and bring their meal and take it, and have their pint of beer, and at six o'clock go back to their work.

8036. Where would those persons take their meals on Sunday?—At their own houses.

8037. Is it a custom for a large number of persons to go out of Birmingham on Sunday by excursion trains or otherwise?—They do not go by excursion trains; they go by ordinary trains. I have not heard of any excursion trains, but a number of persons do go out; they either walk, or drive, or go out by railway.

8038. Mr. Baines.] You have mentioned that there is a want of supervision of the public-houses on Sunday; if there is not an efficient supervision, is it not very probable that the number of cases of drunkenness is really much greater than that of the persons apprehended and brought up before the magistrates?—As far as we are enabled to see, it is those persons who are apprehended. I do not suppose that the police apprehend all persons who get drunk on a Sunday, because they do not see them; but as far as the apprehensions go, this is a correct return which I have given, which shows that in 1867 there were only 174.

8039. I do not doubt the return; but my question was whether there may not be a very much larger number of cases of drunkenness; but the police wink at those things?—We have no means of ascertaining that.

8040. Is it not probable that it must be so; for instance, if a man is found drinking unto drunkenness in a public house, and if the policeman is bribed by cigars and beer, may he not overlook it, and leave that man there?—There is no doubt of it; and that is why I say that we require better supervision. If some better system was established it would be better, and would deal with the class of persons that this Bill is intended to improve, far better than by any more stringent measures which may be enacted.

8041. I have no doubt that you are perfectly correct in your fact, as well as perfectly honest, if you will allow me to say so, in your wish that drinking should be placed within the limits of moderation; but you have expressed an opinion that further restriction would do no good, and you have said that there would be evasion. I want to ask you whether, although there has been evasion in Scotland, as is alleged, yet whether you are not aware that the closing of public-houses altogether in Scotland really has had the effect of very greatly diminishing the number of cases of drunkenness and the amount of liquor consumed on that day?—That is as far as the information which the public have generally received goes; but I am informed that although, since the Forbes Mackenzie Act has been in operation in Scotland, it appears that drunkenness has decreased, a considerable amount of private drunkenness goes on; that is to say, persons assemble, first in one house and then in another, and they provide spirits for that purpose. They drink privately, and consequently do not come under the eyes of the police at all, and there are no returns of them.

8042. Chairman.] On what information do you state that?—I have read from time to time reports upon the subject. I have no basis to give for it, further than that I have understood by my reading in the newspapers, and hearing the opinions of different persons from time to time during several years, that that is so.

8043. Do you mean general statements in the newspapers, or extracts from official reports?—Not extracts from official reports; but I have seen some of them.

8044. You mean just loose statements in the newspapers?—Yes.

8045. Mr. Baines.] You are aware that a Royal Commission was appointed which went over Scotland and examined into the fact, and after very careful examination they reported that the Act was working extremely well?—Yes, I have read that.

8046. Do not you think that we must attach reliance to that?—I attach great reliance to it; but still that does not alter the fact that I have heard from time to time that such is the case, namely, that private drinking goes on notwithstanding.

8047. But you are not able to show any authority for that?—No.

8049. Do you not think that the restrictions which have been already imposed have done good?—When I first became a licensed victualler it was in 1844, and I think that about the year 1846 the metropolitan police regulations were extended to the country. Before that time any licensed victualler could keep his house open from Monday morning until Sunday night, with the exception of during the hours of divine service; and on Saturday evenings we were compelled to sit up; when I say compelled, there was great difficulty in doing otherwise, because persons would stay until 12, and even 1, or later than that; and we hailed, at least I did as a licensed victualler, and I know that I am expressing the opinion of others, we hailed with great pleasure the adoption of that law which required us to close at 12 o'clock on Saturday night. There is also a law, under which we are now regulated, which requires us still to close at 12 o'clock on Saturday night till 12:30 on Sunday morning, and then we open till 3 o'clock and close again from 3 till 5, and then open again from 5 to 11. Those things have done a great amount of good; but I think that they are very fairly balanced now, and they seem to work very satisfactorily.

8050. You do not think that further restriction would do more good?—I think not.

8051. Mr.

Mr.
J. Wadhams.

8051. Mr. Hill, the recorder of Birmingham, is a man whom you know very well?—Yes, and I very much respect him.

8053. But do you not suppose that Mr. Hill, when he expressed that opinion, was speaking of that very class, the working classes; I will read you just two sentences of a letter which he has addressed to this Committee, in which he says, "The Bill referred to your Committee, applies, it is true, to Sunday drinking only, but it is a great step to protect one day in the week from the fearful temptations which now pervades the whole year." Then with regard to the young, he says, "And it is frequently on that day that fatal indulgences are fostered among the young;" so that he must refer necessarily to the working classes and especially to the young amongst the working classes?—Yes, but for the working classes the only day they can go out for any recreation is Sunday. There are some persons who would prohibit any kind of recreation or amusement on Sunday, but I do not approve of that principle; working men have to work from Monday morning till Saturday night, and the only few hours during which they can have any recreation at all is on Sunday.

8054. We are not arguing about that now; we are simply arguing whether it is desirable to have the public-houses open, and whether there are not, as Mr. Hill here states, fearful temptations presented to many persons by their being open on that day?—If the houses were closed altogether, and persons could not get drink, of course everybody would be sober; but then we know that working men are in the habit of taking their beer in moderation; a large number of them take it in moderation, and they do not pretend, and do not get drunk at all. I am happy to say that a very large proportion of the population of our town are that class of persons, and I think that they should not be inconvenienced. They take their beer in the ordinary way; they do their work, and they take their beer at night; and I think they can take it, and I know that they do take it and enjoy it the same on Sunday as on any other day; and I think that they should not be prohibited from obtaining it.

8055. Then you differ from Mr. Hill in the recommendations that you make to the Committee?—I do most decidedly; I think that the steps taken by Mr. Hill, and other gentlemen, in establishing scientific institutions, reading rooms, public parks, and recreations have a better tendency to improve the condition of the working men than stringent laws; because stringent laws, which cannot be carried out, have an injurious effect upon the people; because it is not fair to allow a large number of persons to do business, while the majority of them are disposed to obey the law.

8056. Have you many Sunday schools in Birmingham?—Yes, a large number.

8057. Do you approve of those Sunday schools?—Most certainly, and I support them.

8058. Are you aware what are the opinions of Sunday school teachers, generally, as to the public-houses being open on Sunday evenings?—Religious persons, in general, are disposed to close them, but they look at it in rather a one-sided way, I think.

8059. It is the fact, is it not, that they are generally opposed to the opening of public houses?—I have no doubt of it.

8060. Mr. John Abel Smith.] As an old publican, and having had great experience, can you tell me at all what proportion your Sunday sale bore to the sale on other days of the week?—As I said before, I do not think that it is one-seventh it may be one-fourteenth, but I have no means of telling. I do not think that any licensed victualler would look at the amount of business they do, so much as to the inconvenience to their neighbours.

8061. Then you do not think that it is a question in which the interests of the publican are greatly involved?—Publicans or licensed victuallers look at all this continual interference and harassing them continually Session after Session, with very great dissatisfaction. We have thought some years ago, and I say this, because I was on the committee who took a very active part with others to adjust what we thought the law, and on advice with others, we adopted some regulation which would be satisfactory to both parties, in the hope that we should not be harassed in this way, Session after Session, because it is very expensive and very annoying.

8062. May I ask you again to go back to this question, that this particular Bill before the Committee is not one which would greatly affect the interest of the publican?—It does most inconveniently, and for this reason; it is a worse Bill than that which was introduced last year, because it prohibits the sale of beer or wine or spirits on the premises altogether, and for that reason it is more objectionable.

8063. But I think you told me that the question of profit is not one which would move the publican very much?—At the present time I said that I do not think it amounts to one-seventh, but supposing it to be one-half of that, or one-fourteenth, it would be something considerable in their business during the year. They would have to pay the same amount of wages to their servants, and the same rates and taxes, and all those things.

8064. Do not you think that you would have better servants if they had some rest on Sunday?—No, I think that they are accustomed to it. They go out during the hours that the houses are closed, and they return to their duties.

8065. They are only closed two hours, are they?—Two hours in the afternoon, that is all. They go to church or chapel on Sunday morning, and those who do not do that, take a walk.

8066. You think that they do not require any further relief as to time?—I have never heard any objections to it; they engage to do the duty, and it comes as a matter of course. I do not think that, as a rule, persons keep so many servants employed on the Sunday as they do on other er days; consequently, those who have a sufficient number, let one portion of them have the day's holiday occasionally; first one and then another.

8067. Then the way in which it would affect the publicans, as regards profit and loss, would be that a certain portion of the beer now sold on Sundays would be lost to them?—No doubt of 8068. Can you at all give me any estimate of what the loss would be as regards that portion? I could not tell; that would depend upon the class of house, and the class of business; one person might during those hours take several pounds, and others would only take several shillings; I could not give you any idea.

8069. With regard to the inconvenience to the public, admitting as I do very readily, very cheerfully and very fully, the admirable account which you have given of the public, and the conduct of those who visit those parks, would they be practically, by this Bill, be able to get what they wanted, if they wanted a glass of beer, say they came home between eight and ten; why could not this Bill meet that?—There are some persons who go there after dinner, at three o'clock; others at four; others at five; and others at six, so that there are always a number of persons going to and fro; consequently during the hours after five o'clock there would be first one and then another, and there would be a system of business carried on in supplying refreshments to a large number of persons one after the other: if this Bill passed they could not get a glass of beer at all.

8070. You mean till the time came for the opening of the house?—They could not get it on the premises at all. If I understand the Bill rightly, persons would not be able to get a glass of beer: If I went to Aston Park and walked back again, and if I had been walking from home to or three miles, and walking about for two hours on a hot day like yesterday, I could not get a glass of beer, at all, till I got home.

8071. Can you suggest any way of getting over that difficulty?—I would let the matter remain as it is.

8072. But supposing there was any legislation, can you suggest anything?—The best suggestion at I can offer is what I have already stated; and I believe that what this Committee is very desirous of aiming at is, to diminish drunkenness on Sunday, and, probably, drunkenness altogether; and the best way is, to endeavour to adopt better means of carrying out the present law. I believe that there is much drunkenness arising from drinking in different public-houses during the prohibited hours on Sunday morning; and the majority of those persons who get into the hands of the police are those persons who get drunk in the prohibited hours on Sunday morning.

8073. Were you not one of the gentlemen who had an interview with Mr. Bright some time since at Birmingham?—I was the person who conversed with him upon that subject.

8074. And what advice did he give you?—He gave us some very excellent advice, which we find that we cannot possibly carry out.

8075. What was that?—He advised us as a matter of course; but we seldom hear of persons acting in that way. He said that we should voluntarily come forward and advocate the same principle of further stringent laws to operate on ourselves; 0.69.

that was what he said, or that was the general sum and substance of it. He admitted that there was great difficulty about it; but he said that there would be great credit due to that individual who would propound some general system or general scheme, and would come voluntarily forward, and also advocate and endeavour to persuade others in the trade of licensed victuallers and beersellers to advocate a law which would close them up on Sunday altogether. That was generally looked over by persons with whom I am acquainted; but I have never found anybody who agreed with the suggestion made by him.

8076. Let us go to your mayor, Mr. Avery; did you hear or read his evidence?—Mr. Avery is a very excellent man and a gentleman.

8077. What have you got to say about his opinion?—I think that he was wrong in this, when he referred to a meeting over which he presided, an annual meeting of persons who were favourable to what is called the Permissive Bill, and which took place at the townhall.

8078. Do you believe that he made a misstatement?—I think that it was wrong in this respect, that he said that there were about 3,000 persons, and that they represented the working classes.

8079. Did he not state that it was a meeting called by him as the mayor?—I do not think that it was called by him, and I do not think that he said so; as one of the corporation I was invited to the meeting.

8080. He stated that it was a meeting called by him as mayor?—The way I understood it was, that he presided as mayor of Birmingham, but that it was called by the Permissive Association, and that it was their annual meeting. I had an invitation also. I do not think that he said that it was called by himself. Mr. Avery, I am sure, would not make a mistake knowingly, but I think he did make a mistake. I will tell the Committee another mistake that he made: he said that those 3,000 persons who were there present represented the working classes as a body; I think he was mistaken there, because they were a selected number of persons occupied in a very praiseworthy occupation as teachers in Sunday schools, and they were brought forward there as members of the Permissive Association by the religious communities of the borough of Birmingham of all denominations, and they could not, in my opinion, be considered as representing the body of 100,000 persons of the working classes.

8081. You contradict the fact, as far as your knowledge goes, that that meeting, as he stated, was attended by working men?—There were working men, young men and women, working men, teachers in Sunday schools principally, as I have said before; but to take them as a body they could not be considered, in my opinion, as representing the 100,000 of the working classes of Birmingham.

8082. You mean that they were not a fair representation of the general feeling of the town?—That is what I intend to convey; they were of the working classes, but they could not be taken as a fair representation of the working classes of Birmingham, because, as I said, they were a selected few; they were young men and women occupying their time and attention in a very praiseworthy occupation as teachers in Sunday schools, and well conducted people.

8083. How do you know that they were Sunday school teachers; what makes you say that?

—Because

1868.

1868.

—Because I happen to go to St. Thomas's School in my neighbourhood, and I know that most of the ministers of religion of different denominations advise young men and women, and very properly so, to be moderate, and even teetotallers.

8084. But that is not an answer to my question. I ask you how you know that those who attended this meeting were, in any large proportion, Sunday school teachers?—By reading over an account of the meeting, which I did, I saw that many ministers of religion were present; and I presume that they were those persons.

8085. But you know nothing about it?—I know that much: I come to the conclusion that they were, because those associations are composed mainly of those persons.

8086. It is a general impression, for which you have no foundation except your general opinion?—I have seen them from time to time in other capacities, and I know some of them. I was not present at the meeting, although I was invited.

8087. But you know nothing about the attendance there?—No, I was not present.

8088. Do not you think that such opinions as Mr. Hill's and Mr. Avery's deserve attention on the part of this Committee?—I have no doubt of it; but still they entertain extreme views sometimes.

8089. You do not think that there are extreme views on the other side among the publicans?—By bringing such testimony as my own, when I come here to give what information I can to the Committee, in order that the Committee may arrive at some satisfactory conclusion upon the matter; that is all.

8090. Do not imagine that I am cavelling at your evidence; but you are in the position of Chairman of the Licensed Victuallers' Association, are you not?—Yes.

8091. Then I say that your opinions on the other side are open to question, the same as theirs are?—Exactly; and by hearing the two extremes the Committee will be able to arrive, I hope, at some satisfactory conclusion.

8092. You think that Mr. Bright's suggestion of your making some proposal, as a trade, is one that is quite out of the question?—I think that we should never be able to do it. I should not like to propose it myself.

8093. That, I think, is very likely; but do you think that it is impossible to get it done?—I think it is impossible to get it done, because I do not know who is to do it. I do not think that you would be able to get a large majority in favour of it; and therefore it would end in nothing.

8094. In your association that you have spoken of in the various towns, do you know whether any beershops are included?—No, they are licensed victuallers only; they have no connection with beerhouses at all.

8095. You do not admit any?—No, not into our association.

8096. Did you give the number of beerhouses in those towns?—Yes. There are about 1,300 beerhouses in Birmingham; but there are only about 700 licensed victuallers, within one or two.

8097. How many people are there in Birmingham?—350,000 is the estimated population.

8098. Then there would be one beershop or public-house for every 175 of the population?—Yes, and it is a great deal too many.

8099. How do they live?—Some of them live upon other people; a great many of them do. Some of them have been living upon me the last year or two.

8100. There must be a good deal of drinking to keep those people going, must there not?—Yes; if I were asked (but the Committee is not sitting here for the purpose of inquiring in that), I believe that I could set forth a plan that would alter it; but it is another question, and at the proper time I shall be prepared to do so, I think.

8101. But there must be a good deal of drinking amongst those 175 people to keep the beer house or public-house going?—They open beer houses now in such small places, that they only exist for a short time and shut again, and other open, and the revenue benefits by that process.

8102. You cannot get over the fact, that for every 175 people, men, women, and children there is a public-house or beershop; that does appear an enormous number?—Yes; that is the fault of the present law.

8103. That may be; but the fact remains the same, that that is the case?—Yes.

8104. I ask you whether there must not be an enormous amount of drinking to make a sufficient profit to keep this number of houses open?—Of course, there must be a large amount of drinking.

8105. On Sundays as well as on other days?—Yes.

8106. I suppose that you have not the smallest desire to encourage drunkenness as a habit amongst the working classes?—Certainly not. If there is anything that gives trouble to licensed victuallers, it is a drunken man.

8107. I quite agree with you, and I have not the least disposition to dispute it. My impression is very strongly, that that habit of drinking on the Sunday entails the drinking on the Monday and the loss of Monday's work; and that until the wages are pretty well exhausted, the man goes on drinking, if he begins on Sunday?—I do not think that that is the case now so much as it used to be; I think that there is considerable improvement in that respect.

8108. Do you think that that improvement goes to Saturday night also?—There is an improvement on the Saturday night and on the Sunday; but there are some persons who, as long as they have any money, will get drunk possible; and if this proposed law was passed, believe that those persons would get drunk.

8110. Of course, you are in favour of getting rid of the difference between a public-house and a beershop, as to the license?—Yes.

8111. You would put them all upon the same footing?—If I could alter the law to-morrow would suspend giving any more licenses; and where licenses were for the future granted, they should be the licensed victuallers' license. It would not interfere with those that are already in existence.

8112. You are in favour, are you, of free trade in selling beer?—Certainly not; that is not free trade.

8113. Mr. Locke.] With respect to beershop is beer the only thing that is sold in those shops?—No; under the Wine Licensing Act, which was passed a short time ago, persons have only qualify themselves by becoming eating-house ers, and sell a chop or a pork pie, or some-of that sort, and then they can take out a license as well as a beer license; and in many instances they make themselves as though they were wine and spirit

114. I do not mean to allude to beer and wine, mean food?—Within the last few years, since Wine Licensing Act has been established, there are a number of persons who keep what called a luncheon store, and they almost all sell wine as well as beer, and they sell a chop, or a sandwich, or a pork pie, or something of that sort.

115. They do sell things to eat as well as to k?—Yes, and that has increased the number that are termed beerhouses now, because many those that have been established within the few years are of that class.

116. Are there persons who take their meals those houses on Sunday as well as other days?
do not know that there are; I should think it very probable that it is so.

117. Do any of the working classes take their ds there, to your knowledge, on week days?
Yes, many of them, in various parts of the town which are established in the neighbourhood of ir manufactories.

118. Are they there supplied with beer or he if they please, and food?—Yes.

119. What description of food?—Some cook nts and others sell sandwiches; and various ds of food are cooked, and they sell some small tes for dinner.

120. That must be a great convenience to the rking classes?—No doubt it is, but I do not nk that those places are open so much on the nday.

121. Are they closed on the Sunday?—Some them are.

122. In addition to their selling food and so rth, is it very frequent that the wife manages e beershop?—Yes, and the man goes to his ork.

123. The beershop very frequently is a small ldition to the take of the family, to their suport?—Yes; they require to have premises essed at 15*l.* in Birmingham; the evil is their rking very small premises; they get other remises put together in one assessment, and ey then go to the excise and demand their cense.

124. If they carry on a very small business, hat would be in addition to the wages which the aster of the house would be gaining elsewhere?
—Exactly so.

125. It is a supplement to what they are arning?—Yes, it is so.

126. Then in point of fact, in those places as ou have stated, the living of the persons who keep them is not entirely obtained by the beer-house?—No, certainly not.

127. In some of them they may gain very ittle, and in others a good deal?—Some, I should think, scarcely pay the rent of their establishment.

128. But they must have a house to live in?
—Yes.

129. And they pay for it out of the man's wages?—Just so.

130. That is to say, if they do not get it out of the beershop?—Yes; they would have to live somewhere.

8131. A great many wives of working men keep shops of other descriptions, do they not?—
Yes; grocers' shops, huxters' shops, and drapers' shops, and all kinds of little shops.

8132. And some of them prefer to keep a beer-shop?—Yes; some of them prefer to keep a beer-shop.

8133. And are they tolerably well conducted?
—Very many of them are.

8134. Do they sell good beer?—Some of them sell very bad beer, and others good.

8135. That is like everybody else, is it not?
—Yes.

8136. Mr. John Abel Smith.] What do you mean by bad beer?—Thick beer that is not fit to drink.

8137. Do you think that there is anything else that they put into the beer besides malt and hops?—Not as a rule; there may be exceptions, but not as a rule; I do not think by any means that improper articles are used; I have heard of none; I do not believe it to be a general practice.
In Birmingham most of the licensed victuallers, or nearly all of them, are brewers.

8138. What is the wholesale price of gin?—I have not bought any gin for some years, but I think it is about 13*s.*

8139. What is about the retail price?—I do not know.

8140. Do not you recollect what you charged yourself?—Yes, we used to sell gin at 16*s.* a gallon, I believe, but then we did not sell it the same strength.

8141. What did you put in?—As much as it could stand.

8142. Mr. Locke.] You stated with regard to beershops and eating-houses that other articles of food are supplied in them besides beer and wine; is it the same case with the public-houses in Birmingham?—Yes, but that depends upon circumstances; there are some licensed victuallers who keep what are termed spirit vaults only, but there are a large number in Birmingham who keep what may be termed the old-fashioned licensed victuallers' houses; general licensed victuallers' houses.

8143. Who supply food as well as drink?—
They can have either bread and cheese, or a chop, or as they used to do when I was in my house;
persons used to bring a steak or a chop, or a slice of bacon or a slice of ham, at their meal time, and it was usual to cook it for them. There was a good fire provided, and a room, and chairs and tables, and everything that they required.

8144. You afforded the convenience for a man to sit down and cook his chop, and then you supplied him with drink at his meal?—Yes; we supplied him with a pint of beer, and those persons became customers day after day, and some of them we knew for years.

8145. Did those men ever come on Sunday?
—Those persons who took their walk after dinner on a Sunday, and who knew me, would come; the same persons who attended my house on a week-day, would come to my house on Sunday afternoon; and so I presume it would be in other cases, that a person would walk two or three streets' length in order to go into a house that he was accustomed to go to on a week-day; and I have seen working men clean and tidy in the tap-room, and the persons associated with my house in various ways, by their friendly societies, and other societies which we had; those persons, if they went to Aston (and I was in the neighbourhood

Mr. J. Wadhams. bourhood of Aston), they would come in at six, seven, or eight o'clock, and sit down and have their cup of ale and talk about anything for an hour or two, and with no pretensions to drunkenness at all; not the least.

8146. If this Bill were passed it would be a great inconvenience to those people, would it not?—It would be a great hardship to them. I used on Sunday evening to be prepared to receive 6, 8, 10, or 15 persons of the same class that I speak of, the superior portion of the working classes, who would stop at home and have their dinner probably, and go to church or to chapel in the morning, and have their dinner at home with their families, and after dinner take a walk to the places which I have referred to, and on returning they would go home and have their tea, and then the man would come to my house while the wife was putting the children to bed, or what not, and spend an hour with me, and in the interchange of conversation upon any subject that might turn up.

8147. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Were those parlour guests or tap-room guests?—They were parlour guests that I associated with, but I have seen as good order in the other side of the house with the working men. My house was situated by the side of a number of manufactories, and I have seen a number of those persons, working men, come and sit down there and have their pint of beer, and conduct themselves with as much good order as they did in the room where I was with my friends, many of them scores of times.

8148. Mr. Locke.] You have been asked by the honourable Member for Leeds, with regard to the diminution of drinking in Scotland; are you aware that a very great increase has taken place in the duty upon whisky in Scotland?—I have heard of it, and I have had conversation with some friend from Glasgow.

8149. Do you know what the duty is now?—It is the same as in England, 10 s. per gallon.

8150. Are you aware that it used to be 3 s. 6 d.?—I do not know the exact sum, but it was considerably less than it is now.

8151. That would make a difference in the price, and when things are dearer and persons have not the money, the probability is, that they are not able to buy so much of the article though they like it?—No doubt about it.

8152. Would that diminish the quantity of liquor which was drunk?—Certainly it would diminish the quantity.

8153. If a man did not drink so much liquor, he would not get so drunk, and if there is a diminution in drunkenness, may not that in a measure be one of the reasons for it, that the liquor is dearer?—I should think so.

8154. Chairman.] Still the price of spirits is low enough to allow almost anybody to get drunk who likes, who has any money at all, is it not?—No, I think not; beer is the general article of consumption of our working men; in Scotland they drink more spirits, but I am not prepared to speak with regard to Scotland so much as I am about Birmingham.

8155. My honourable friend was putting so facts to you, and asking you to make deductions from them, and you stated in answer to him that you thought that the present high prices of spirits must have operated, to a certain extent, to reduce indulgence in them?—To reduce drunkenness would do so, because if a person had but so much money to spend, and the article was nearly double the price, he could only have what his money would purchase; but I gathered this information some time ago from persons who reside in Scotland; they told me of this private drinking that was going on, as well as having seen statements in the newspapers and other publications with regard to it, that there was a great deal of private drinking in Scotland, and that those persons who come under the cognizance of the police, do not by any means represent the amount of drunkenness that still exists in Scotland.

8156. Mr. Locke.] A man drinking in a public house would stand a greater chance of being taken up by the police than a person drinking in one of those illicit places, would he not?—Exactly; they would not see him at all; they would be liable to be visited by the police in a public house, whereas in the case of private houses the police have no right to enter.

8157. And besides, the man who had been in a public-house would have to walk home, whereas the other man would not?—In all probability he would go out into the street, and there become more drunk, and get into the hands of the police.

8158. But if he got drunk in one of those illicit places, there is no reason why any one should know anything about it?—No, they would perhaps put him to bed, and the police would know nothing about it.

8159. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] You were asked about Mr. Bright's advice to you; did not Mr. Bright advise you, in order to stop agitation going on upon the question, to come to some amicable settlement with those who are seeking for further restrictions, and agree upon a compromise upon some fair basis?—Yes.

8160. Are you aware that we have had evidence given over and over again, that many of those who are promoting this Bill only consider this as an instalment of some much larger measure?—Yes, I have so read it.

8161. Therefore, if you were to support this Bill, you would have no hope that by so doing you would promote that amicable settlement which Mr. Bright advised?—I think it would not by any means settle the question, because this agitation has been going on a long time, and will continue, I think, after this.

8162. You do not support this Bill, not because it has anything to do with Mr. Bright's advice, but because the settlement which Mr. Bright wished to see would not be effected by it?—It would not be effected by it.

Mr. WILLIAM AITKEN, was called in; and Examined.

Mr. W. Aitken. 8163. Chairman.] ARE you a Schoolmaster at Ashton-under-Lyne?—Yes.

8164. What sort of schoolmaster?—An independent teacher. I keep a private school.

8165. Unaided by Government?—Yes.

8166. Mr. Locke.] Is that the only profession that you have?—I sometimes write for magazines, and act as an accountant.

8167. Are you at all connected with the working classes?—Yes, I am auditor for one very large friendly society; and I am also secretary for different societies, and also largely connected with the working classes in many ways in my neighbourhood for the last 35 years?—Yes.

38. Have you had opportunities of ascertaining the habits, wishes, and wants of the working classes?—Yes.

39. Have you taken any public part in any movements for their improvement?—Yes; I have taken an active part in wishing to see education advanced. I also took a very active part in reference to the abbreviation of the hours of labour; a measure which, I think, has done a large amount of good alike to the employer and the employed, and is satisfactory, I think, to all classes, both the employers and the employed.

40. Will you state what your experience is regarding to the progress that the working classes have made?—When I was a little boy such things as a child reading was almost unknown, boys who could work the rule-of-three were considered wonders. The great improvement that has taken place in the working classes during the last 30 years, I think is astonishing in every point of view, both in a moral and social point of view. For instance, the old factory system made us work on Christmas-day and Good Friday; all that is done away with now, I am glad to say.

41. Have you read the Bill which is now before the Committee?—Yes.

42. Have you given it your consideration?—Yes.

43. What is your opinion of the Bill?—My opinion is that the Bill which you are discussing is seriously inconvenient to the public at large. You must understand that I have no personal interest as far as the public-houses go; but it is so infinitesimally small that it is not worth talking about.

44. What is that infinitesimal interest?—It is this: we have an Odd Fellows' Hall in the borough of Ashton-under-Lyne, which was principally built by shares, and the lodge, of which I am a member, has 70 shares, at 2*l.* per share. There are about 80 members, so that my connection with the hall is my proportionate share in it.

45. Then you have a 40*s.* interest in it?—Not so much as that.

46. Will you go on to state the reasons why you think that this Bill would be most inconvenient if passed into a law?—In the manufacturing districts we are an aggregate of towns, and we are not entirely stationary people; a large number of people are compelled by force of circumstances to go from one town to another in search of employment, and those individuals at week's end often pay visits to their relatives and friends; and it is the opinion of a large number of the working classes in our part of the country that on that ground alone it would be a serious inconvenience if this Bill were passed. Again, I am quite in favour of a due regard being paid to the Sabbath, and I think that the restrictions which are in existence at the present time are sufficient for all purposes. I will suppose a case. Suppose, for instance, that I take a walk on Sunday afternoon for four or five miles, and on my return to the borough of Ashton-under-Lyne I find that I can have no refreshment upon the premises in the borough of Ashton-under-Lyne. I object to it on that ground. I object, again, on this ground: why should a distinction be made between the metropolis and the provinces; that is another reason why we object to it, because what holds good to the provinces would equally hold good for the metropolis. These are the several reasons.

8177. Has drunkenness increased in Ashton-under-Lyne?—I should say, as a rule, the individuals who get drunk in Ashton-under-Lyne are the abandoned of the working classes. As a rule, all round about our part of the country they are not drunkards; indeed, they have neither the time nor the means to get drunk. From a return which I had yesterday in my hands from the chief constable, but which, unfortunately, I have lost, I would have given the Committee particulars; but I have lost it. But, speaking from memory, I should say that the number of apprehensions of individuals during the year 1867 for being drunk on Sunday between 11 a.m. and 11 p.m., amounted to 23 during the whole year.

8178. You stated that you have taken part in provident societies; do you consider that it is necessary that public-houses should not be closed no Sunday for the convenience of those societies?—As far as those large affiliated societies are concerned, they are already closed by the general laws of those societies. For instance, I am a member of an Odd Fellows Society, one of the largest in the world, and they transact no business on the Sabbath-day, but there are a large number of what are called burial clubs, which are spread all over the manufacturing districts, and the managers of those societies are all employed in the workshops or mills all through the week, and the subscriptions for those societies are all collected on the Sunday and paid into the hands of the treasurer on Sunday evening. If this Bill was passed, I do not see very well how those societies could carry on as far as the deposit of the money was concerned.

8179. Could not they have those subscriptions paid on some other night?—It answers them best to carry the business on as they do at the present time. They might do such a thing I dare say, but still it would be more satisfactory to them, and the feeling of all those whom I have come into contact with is to let the law remain as it is.

8180. Then you state that they would be inconvenienced if the system which they have hitherto adopted, were put an end to by this Bill passing?—Yes.

8181. They would be prevented from meeting on Sunday evening and paying those sums of money for the burial funds?—Yes.

8182. Are there any other societies besides burial societies who would be inconvenienced?—I do not know any other.

8183. Do those burial societies exist to a very large extent?—Yes, in all our manufacturing districts, in every large town.

8184. And it has been their custom to pay in those monies on Sunday evening?—Yes, to collect it on the Sunday, and to pay it to the treasurer on the Sunday.

8185. Are the subscribers to those burial societies more thrown together on Sunday than they would be on any other day?—They are more at home; the individuals who are subscribers are at home on Sunday, and there is a convenience in consequence of that in collecting the monies. If those societies are broken up or injured very materially, they would injure very materially the parish funds.

8186. Have you given your attention to the effect

Mr.
W. Aitken.
1868.

Mr.
W. Aitken.

effect of restrictive legislation?—Yes; I can remember when public-houses were open during Divine service, and I humbly conceive that that was a very great misfortune. I think that the closing of public-houses, up to the close of Divine service in the morning, was a very great advantage decidedly, and I also think that the keeping of public-houses closed during Divine service in the afternoon is also another advantage, for I should be exceedingly sorry to see the same usage in our country as I have seen in others.

8187. But you think that that restriction goes as far as it ought?—I really do think so.

8188. Have you considered the arguments in favour of the Bill?—Yes.

8189. What is your opinion upon them?—One of the arguments is, that it would check drunkenness on the Sunday, but I look at it in this way: supposing, for instance, you closed the public-houses altogether on Sundays, are the gentlemen, who use this argument, quite sure that all the money that was saved on Sunday would not be spent on drink during other portions of the week. I answer that question by asking another?

8190. You think it is very doubtful?—I do; I really doubt whether if this Bill was carried into effect it would have the advantage which the gentlemen require, but rather upon the other hand I think it would be a disadvantage. I am of opinion that if you close the public-houses in our part of the country, on Sunday, you will cause what I call illicit drinking; that we should have what are technically known in our part of the country as hush-shops and black-hank-shops, and we should have a very large number of them established almost in every street. The meaning of those two phrases is simply this: that women and men would brew ale themselves, and sell it to their neighbours, and drink it in their cottage homes instead of drinking it in public-houses.

8191. Does that exist, to any extent, at the present time?—It used to exist, to a larger extent, than it does now; it is very little known in the borough of Ashton-under-Lyne, but still there is some little known, but very little I am glad to say.

8192. You think that if the restrictions that are contained in the Bill were enforced, those houses that you have spoken of, would be revived?—Yes, I think so.

8193. Therefore, in that respect, you think that it would be very detrimental to the sobriety of the people?—I think so.

8194. They would be more drunken than they are now, you think, instead of being less so?—Yes, that is my opinion.

8195. Is there any other reason that you have?—I think that the convenience of the people of England requires what they have at the present time; and as regards a very large majority of the working classes, that I have come in contact with in various parts of the four surrounding counties from whence I come, they are quite prepared to accept the law as it is, and they think that its restrictions are sufficiently stringent.

8196. Do you think that they are satisfied with the law as it is?—The large majority are; I may as well say that some of my friends who are teetotallers quite disagree with me; that is all right enough; they have a perfect right to do so, and I have a perfect right to disagree with them; some of my friends who are magistrates believe that this Bill which you are now discussing is to pass, whilst a large number of other gentlemen who are magistrates believe that it ought not to pass.

8197. Therefore it is a matter of opinion. Yes, it is a matter of opinion.

8198. You have had experience in these matters; do you recollect Mr. Wilson Patten's passing?—Yes.

8199. Was it popular in the district of Ashton-under-Lyne?—It was very unpopular. I, one, as a citizen of this county, felt dissatisfied with it, and I know that it gave a very amount of dissatisfaction to the inhabitants round the neighbourhood where I live.

8200. Are you aware whether it caused any inconvenience?—Yes, it caused the same inconvenience as we have been speaking about just now; for instance, we conceive to be encroaching upon the liberty of the sun as far as it goes. Putting down drunkenness is one thing, and encroaching upon the liberty the subject is another; liberty may be carried too far, and restrictions may be carried too far.

8201. Can you mention any instances where individuals were inconvenienced in consequence of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act?—They were inconvenienced in this way, that they did not go out. I will suppose a case: suppose that I, my family had been taking a walk, that I might go right enough; very well; suppose that after five or six miles walk we wanted to get a refreshment, and at 10 o'clock you are ordered off, before you could sit down. We conceive that in our part of the country we know the inconvenience when we should go home; as far as that goes, it is a very great inconvenience at a decent hour, at any rate.

8202. You thought that you ought not to have legislated for in a manner that treated you as unreasonable beings, when you consider yourself as reasonable individuals?—Yes, we certainly think so.

8203. And therefore you objected?—Yes.

8204. Was this Act of Mr. Wilson Patten universally unpopular at Ashton-under-Lyne? As a rule, it was very unpopular.

8205. And it was repealed the next year?—Yes, it was repealed.

8206. Did its being repealed give satisfaction to persons at Ashton-under-Lyne?—Yes. I am very sorry that I have lost the figures that I got from our chief constable, Mr. Daglish, with reference to the amount of drunkenness on Sunday, but that of course I could not help.

8207. Before you came here to give evidence upon this Bill, had you any conversation with any number of persons at Ashton-under-Lyne upon the subject?—I had heard of it discussed in a great many places.

8208. Were there a number of people in Ashton-under-Lyne and the neighbourhood desirous that their objections to this Bill should be conveyed to the Committee through you?—There were.

8209. And did they express that wish to you?—Yes.

8210. Any great number of them?—Not a very large number.

8211. But those persons with whom you were acquainted were desirous that you should convey their objections?—Yes.

8212. They consider it then a restriction upon their privileges, which ought not to be imposed upon them?—That is their opinion. We consider it a restriction upon their privileges.

that legislation of this description is more a matter for social reformers at home, and for religious influence, and the influence of ministers of Gospel. That is the opinion of those individuals who are favourable to my side of the question; and certainly it is my opinion it is a question for the moral influence of all social reformers, such as ministers of religion, and other gentlemen who take an interest in the well-being of the working classes, than for legislation in the Imperial Parliament.

8213. That they should lead them by argument, instead of coercing them by sumptuary laws?—That is our opinion.

8214. Is that a general opinion amongst those persons with whom you come into contact at Ashton-under-Lyne?—I should think, amongst the majority of those with whom I have come in contact; and I should think the opinion of a very large majority of the people.

8215. Chairman.] How did you come to be a witness before this Committee; did you offer evidence?—No, certainly not.

8216. Who asked you first to come and give evidence before this Committee?—The question was discussed by a great many individuals in the neighbourhood; and I gave my opinion about it in several places; and I was asked whether, if I was summoned before this Committee, I would come; I said that it would be a matter of inconvenience for me to come; I should have to study it. After discussing it over, they waited on me again, and I came to the conclusion to come; and when I received your summons, of course I considered it my duty to come.

8217. I suppose that communication was made to some persons that you were willing to come, otherwise how did you come to be summoned?—I was asked to come, and I took time to consider, and then I agreed to come.

8218. Who was it, do you know, who sent up to London to say that you were willing to come?—I really cannot tell you that.

8219. In what company was it that it was proposed that you should come?—It was proposed in the company of the working classes.

8220. Since this Bill has been before the Committee, I understood you to say that you were acting in company, when it was proposed to you to come before this Committee; of whom did the company consist?—Of working men, and various other people.

8221. You were sitting amongst some working men?—Working men, and men of the middle classes.

8222. Where were you?—At the "Talbot" inn.

8223. Was it a meeting of the Licensed Victuallers' Association, or some member of it, who asked you to come?—It was a member of the Licensed Victuallers' Association who asked me to come, as well as other individuals besides.

8224. So that it was the Licensed Victuallers' Association, or somebody connected with them, who, knowing your sentiments, asked you as an independent person to come and give evidence before this Committee?—Just so.

8225. Mr. John Abel Smith.] You were at one time, I think, a factory operative, were you not?—Yes.

8226. Then what did you do?—I became a teacher.

8227. What induced you to change; was there any particular cause for the change?—Yes.

8228. What was it?—I took an active part in the shortening of the hours of labour, and I had some unpleasantness with my employer, and I commenced teaching in consequence of being out of work.

8229. Did you ever take any active part with regard to strikes?—I have taken an active part with the working classes in raising the wages of labour.

8230. And you, I think, were the workmen's friend, were you not?—I do not know that.

8231. Was not that your name?—I am not aware of that; I am not ashamed of it, and if you wish for any proof I could give it you, for I have it in my pocket.

8232. Did you not go to America?—Yes.

8233. What made you go to America?—It was in consequence of the turn out in 1842.

8234. What was your reason for going to America?—We had a strike in the borough of Ashton-under-Lyne and the neighbourhood, and I, unfortunately if you will, happened to make some speeches. That is about the truth of it. There is no very great crime in that, that I am aware of.

8235. You went away to avoid the consequences of the speeches?—Yes, I think that is the honest truth; that is right enough.

8236. When you came back from America, what did you do then?—I started a school again.

8237. Then you got into trouble, did you not?—No, I am not aware that I did.

8238. Did not Government take you up and prosecute you?—I was taken up by the Government, but they abandoned the prosecution.

8239. You were confined, I think, but you were never tried?—Yes, as a Chartist, I was.

8240. What happened to you then?—I got nine months' imprisonment for making a speech in the Market-place as a Chartist.

8241. Chairman.] The Committee consider that the questions are proper, because of the different value which may be attached to your evidence in the future; but, at the same time, they do not think that you can have any objection to these things being stated, because, I suppose you are not ashamed of any of these transactions?—I am not ashamed of being a Chartist. I am ashamed that doctrines were ever preached at any time, or language used, that should have led either me or any other person into trouble. I would submit to the consideration of the Committee that, as far as I am concerned, if you had my trial before you now, you would exculpate me for any language that I used that placed me in an unfortunate position.

8242. I presume that in any of those matters with which you were mixed up you expressed your candid opinions upon the questions of the day?—Yes, certainly.

8243. Consequently, in answering the questions which have been put to you, you do not consider that you have anything to be morally ashamed of?—I do not consider, so far as I was concerned, in taking part in political movements as I have done, that I have done anything wrong. I am not ashamed of my political party; very far from it; because I see that a very large instalment of these things that were wanted are carried now.

8244. In consequence of that being the view taken by the Committee, the questions will be recorded recorded as they have been put?—I really confess that those are questions which I think in my judgment do not bear at all upon this Bill. I certainly do not think that personalities of that description should be made use of. I have come to give my evidence to the best of my opinion upon this question, and when I have done that there is an end of the chapter.

8245. Mr. Roebuck.] Would you like to make some explanation in consequence of what the Chairman has stated?—I have no explanation to make. I consider such questions irrelevant myself.

8246. Chairman.] I should explain to you that the Committee have considered the bearings of the questions upon your evidence; of course, you come here to have your evidence quoted as having a bearing upon this public question. Persons who read your evidence may say, Who is this gentleman who expresses so strong an opinion upon this question? And the questions of Mr. Abel Smith make it appear that at some time or other you had been a strong politician?—I have a strong political feeling to-day.

8247. But those questions are only showing that you are a person who hold strong opinions; there is no imputation upon your character in the questions that have been put by Mr. Abel Smith, nor do I understand that you are ashamed of any part of your conduct?—I am not a bit.

8248. Then probably you do not complain of their being put?—I would rather they had not been put, because I think they have nothing to do with the question.

8249. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you know what the population of Ashton-under-Lyne is?—Yes, the population is between 30,000 and 40,000.

8250. Do you know how many public-houses there are?—About 82.

8251. How many beer-shops?—I think about 120, speaking from memory; I would not be positive about it.

8252. Altogether there would be 200?—Yes; I am not speaking positively as to the number of beerhouses, but I think I am correct as to the number of public-houses.

8253. That gives the same number as at Birmingham, about 170 people to every public-house and beerhouse?—Yes.

8254. Has there not been a canvass at Ashton-under-Lyne?—Yes, there has.

8255. Do you know anything about it?—Yes, there has been a house to house canvass. I had a paper left at my house, but it never was called for, but as to the result of that canvass, I have not seen what has been its result.

8256. You know that there was one?—Yes, but if it has all been taken in the same manner as mine has, I should say that it is a very incorrect one. I have heard a great many other individuals besides myself say that their papers have never been called for.

8257. You never heard the result?—I never have read the result.

8258. Is there any daily or weekly paper published in Ashton-under-Lyne?—There are two.

8259. Have they not noticed it?—Our local news, I scarcely ever read, to tell you the truth.

8260. You do not know that they have not mentioned it?—I do not know whether they have or have not, because I have not seen it.

8261. Can you speak from personal knowledge at all of the public-houses on the Sunday evening?

—Sometimes I go into them, and as far as anything that I have ever seen in them, the persons are generally well conducted. I do not remember ever seeing any person drunk on a Sunday night in the public houses; not for many long years.

8262. Is there any music?—No, there is music now; there used to be music; but when Mr. Hugh Mason was our chief magistrate, stopped it. I rather think it was through influence that it was stopped; it was stopped any rate.

8263. You do not know much about it?—I could not say positively whether it was he or not, but I rather think it was through his influence.

8264. Has there been any meeting in Ashton-under-Lyne against the Bill now before this Committee?—There has not.

8265. And no public agitation at all?—No, not a public meeting against it.

8266. Or for it?—Yes, one was for it.

8267. How was it attended?—I believe that the Town Hall was full in favour.

8268. Was the meeting in favour of the Bill?—Yes.

8269. And there has been no meeting against it?—None.

8270. Mr. Locke.] Have you anything that you wish to add to your evidence?—I do not know that I have anything to add.

8271. With regard to that question which was put to you with respect to a speech which you made in the market-place, when was that speech made?—In 1839.

8272. That is very nearly 30 years ago?—Yes. I was a very young politician then.

8273. A good many young politicians, before and since that, have got into a scrape, have they not?—Yes, I believe they have.

8274. And old ones too?—Yes, and old ones too.

8275. Do you recollect Sir Francis Burdett getting into a scrape?—I recollect reading about it.

8276. Nobody ever thought that he was anything the worse for that, I presume?—No. Mr. Cobbett got into a scrape, and Mr. Hunt, and great many others too.

8277. But the ministers who prosecuted Mr. Cobbett in the year 1830 rather got into a scrape too, did they not?—I think so.

8278. When he subpoenaed them all down to the Court of Queen's Bench at Guildhall, and examined them one after the other, the jury acquitted him; that was with regard to the Swinburn riots?—Yes, something of that kind.

8279. The people of this country have always entertained strong opinions, have they not?—Yes, I believe they have.

8280. And being a free country, they have expressed them?—Yes, and they have a perfect right to do so, legitimately and constitutionally.

8281. It has not been brought up against them all the rest of their lives, when they have conducted themselves as respectable people?—I certainly think that when things of that description have gone by so long, it is hardly worth while raising them up now; although I am very glad to see that a very large instalment of those principles has been carried to-day.

8282. How many points of the Charter have been carried?—A good many. No property qualification for one.

Mr. WILLIAM REA, called in; and Examined.

283. Chairman.] ARE you a Currier at Stockport?—Yes.

284. Mr. Locke.] What is the population of Stockport?—About 60,000.

285. What is the staple trade of the borough? The cotton trade.

286. How many public-houses are there in the borough?—There are 130 public-houses and 140 beershops within the municipal boundaries.

287. What is the state of drunkenness on Sundays in Stockport?—During this last year it has been comparatively little. There have been only 40 cases throughout the whole of last year and Sunday.

288. Are you identified with friendly societies?—Yes, I have always taken an active part in friendly societies in Stockport, particularly in burial societies, and the members of these clubs are very much against this Bill.

289. For what reason are you against this Bill?—The collectors of the clubs, going from door to door, get a good knowledge of those affairs by canvassing the members, and they are decidedly opposed to it, thinking that it will restrict their pleasure on Sunday particularly; not only restrict their pleasure, but restrict them in doing their business.

290. In what way would it restrict their business?—Because they meet on Sunday evening to hand over and reimburse the money. There are hundreds of pounds turned over by those societies during the Sabbath.

291. Is it necessary, for the carrying out of these societies, that they should meet on Sundays?—It is quite necessary, because, if they go out on Saturday, they cannot find the people at home; they are either gone to market or gone elsewhere, and if they were to go round on Saturday they would have likewise to go again on Sunday; but on Sunday they are sure of catching the head of the house (that is, the female) at home; consequently, they get the collections in much better.

292. They do not catch her in a public-house?—No.

293. Why is it necessary, for the object of catching the female at home, that the public-house should be open somewhere else?—The collectors then bring the money in to the managers, at five o'clock in the evening.

294. They catch the female at home, and they tell her that the money is to be brought in; is that?—No; they collect the money of her.

295. How does that apply to the question of public-houses being open on Sunday evening?—The collectors go to the public-house at five o'clock, and bring the money to the president, the secretary, and treasurer.

296. Then the money is collected through the town in the day, and they pay it in on the Sunday evening?—Yes; generally speaking, the treasurer of those societies is a publican.

297. Then it is necessary, you say, to have public-houses open on Sunday, in order to enable them to pay the money in to the treasurer on that day?—Yes.

298. Are there a great number of persons who bring money on Sunday evening to the public-house?—No; no one brings it there but the collectors.

8299. How many of them are there?—We have a great many of them. I will read the list over, if you think proper. I called a meeting, when this Bill was brought in, being president of the Amalgamated Society, of the various societies, and those parties met to consider the Bill; and I will read the names of the various lots that there are. There were 14 societies, numbering 35,547 members. Those 14 societies called a meeting of their respective societies, and asked their opinion upon it; and they were unanimous that this Bill should be opposed, as affecting their interest.

8300. In what way?—In not being allowed to meet; they would then have to take a private room, or something of that kind, where they could meet and turn over the money to the treasurer.

8301. You confide in the landlord of the public-house as a safe man to entrust as treasurer?—Yes.

8302. Is it sometimes difficult to get a safe man?—We have not had much difficulty, because we get a bond from him as security.

8303. You get sureties?—Yes.

8304. But it is not every body who would wish to be surety for a man who is worth nothing?—No.

8305. Therefore, first of all, you have to get your substantial man?—Yes, just so.

8306. And then to get your sureties?—Yes.

8307. But if you do not obtain a substantial man you can get no sureties?—We generally bank our overplus, when there is more than 30% or 40%.

8308. What would be about the sum that you would entrust with the treasurer?—£. 30 or £. 40.

8309. And you find it convenient to entrust this money with the landlord of some public-house?—We like to do so, because we may be called upon, at any moment; when death occurs the people want the money, as soon as they can, to get him or her interred.

8310. And the landlord is always to be found at his house?—Yes.

8311. And those persons are very much opposed to this Bill, as it would interfere with the working of those societies?—Yes.

8312. Have you had any public meeting in the town on the subject of closing public-houses on the Sunday?—Yes, I believe there was one; and the mayor presided.

8313. By whom was that meeting got up?—By the teetotallers, and the Sunday school teachers.

8314. Did they circulate a bill throughout the town?—Yes, they had a house to house canvass.

8315. Were you present at that meeting?—I was not.

8316. Do you know anything about that canvass?—Yes; for instance, they brought a paper to me, and mine never was called for. I know a great many places where they called at the houses, and as the husband was not at home they signed it for the wife. The parties who went round to collect it signed it for them, whether they were agreeable or not. I know that, in many instances, where they signed it, the husband was of a different opinion.

8317. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you believe that

that the wife's opinion was in favour of the Bill or against it?—I do not say that the wife told them. I think they were silent; and that when the man said, "What must I put down for you?" they put it down to their own liking, what it was.

8318. Mr. Locke.] The signatures were not genuine signatures?—They were not.

8319. You say that the persons who made the canvass signed the papers themselves?—They did.

8320. Are you quite sure of that?—I am quite sure of it; I could bring witnesses to prove it.

8321. Was that done in many instances?—In a great many instances.

8322. Do you recollect the number of the canvass?—No, I do not; I never saw it published.

8323. Are the habits of the working classes in Stockport improved with reference to drinking?—Yes; the intellectual and moral precepts of the people are a great deal better than they were; in fact, drunkenness does not prevail to a very great extent in the borough.

8324. You say that there were only 40 apprehensions for drunkenness throughout the whole year?—Yes; I had that from the chief constable of Stockport.

8325. Are you of opinion that the present state of the law works satisfactorily?—The present law works quite satisfactorily, and I think it is quite sufficient.

8326. Are you against any alteration in a law which works satisfactorily?—We are quite against any alteration of the law; we think it is quite right; it works very conveniently, and legislation has no business to take place upon it.

8327. In your opinion, the majority of the working classes in Stockport are unfavourable to any alteration?—Yes, quite so; we are quite competent to take care of ourselves.

8328. Mr. John Abel Smith.] How long have you lived in Stockport?—Thirty-six years.

8329. Had not Stockport at one time the character of being a very intemperate place?—I am not aware that it had.

8330. You never heard that?—No.

8331. At all events, now, I am glad to hear that there is a great improvement?—I think there is.

8332. First of all, I will ask you about your societies; what relation do you bear to those societies yourself?—I am president of the amalgamated societies, those 14, and secretary of one of the strongest in the town; 4,700 strong.

8333. They are for the various friendly societies, are they?—Yes.

8334. Do you know whom I mean by Mr. Tidd Pratt?—Yes.

8335. Have you ever seen his advice to friendly societies?—I have.

8336. Is not one of the articles of advice which he gives as a recommendation to friendly societies most particularly and carefully to abstain from all connection with public-houses?—Yes.

8337. Why do not you follow that advice?—We do not spend any money there, because in meeting there is neither smoking nor drinking, nor money allowed to be spent at them; we only get the accommodation.

8338. Have you read his advice which does not bear upon that, you know?—I have read his advice.

8339. You have not read it to follow it?—We should be at a great inconvenience if we follow his advice; we should not know who to select for treasurers, or where to hold our meetings, anything of the sort.

8340. Would you have any greater inconvenience in that respect than any other society other places?—The clubs have been established so many years upon the same footing in Stockport that it would be a great inconvenience those men who collect this money work nothing, or nearly all of them, they go round rotation.

8341. It is the essence of all friendly societies that people work for nothing, is it not?—No.

8342. Those whom you speak of are none them paid agents?—No.

8343. And you could not find treasurers unless you went to the public-houses?—We think not.

8344. You deliberately prefer the keepers of public-houses as your treasurers?—Yes.

8345. With regard to the canvass, do you mean to tell me that it was dishonestly done? In many instances.

8346. Who were the persons who undertook it?—I do not know their names.

8347. Do you know Mr. Wood?—I know Mr. James Wood.

8348. You do not know him as connected with the canvass?—No, I do not know any of them; should be away at my work, and should not know who left the papers.

8349. You attribute carelessness to the persons connected with that canvass, because they did not call upon you for your paper?—Yes.

8350. Are you certain that they did not call?—I am sure they did not.

8351. There is somebody always at home, there?—Yes, my daughter is always at home.

8352. Does she never go out?—I think not very often, unless she leaves somebody else home.

8353. Because it has the character of being one of the most carefully prepared canvasses in England; have you not heard of that?—I have not.

8354. And you do not believe it?—I do not believe it, for I have known parties who have come to me and told me that their paper has been filled up unknown to them, and without their consent whatever.

8355. How do you know that the papers were filled up?—Because their wives had told them that those parties had filled up their papers.

8356. At the request of the wife?—No, without the request of the wife.

8357. Do you mean of their own accord?—Yes on their own account.

8358. You believe that, do you?—I do; I believe what I am told.

8359. But that is not carelessness; that is dishonesty, is it not?—Undoubtedly.

8360. You account for the large proportion of assets by the dishonesty of the canvass?—Yes.

8361. Can you at all prove that?—In a few instances.

8362. Do you know anybody who could give us information upon it?—Yes.

8363. Who is he?—I cannot give the name just at this moment; I did not expect to be asked this, or else I would have put them down.

8364. You cannot recollect the names?—I cannot just now.

8365. Not of any one?—No, but I could soon find them out and send them up from Stockport

8366. Who

366. What would they be?—Working men.
 367. I mean with reference to the unfairness the canvass, you could find them out and let me know?—Yes.
 368. Do you know at all how many house-keepers there are in Stockport?—Not exactly; think something like 5,000.
 369. Would it be 5,700 or 5,800?—Yes, something like that; it is upwards of 5,000.
 370. Your own personal objection to the Bill founded upon this condition of the friendly societies?—No, I have a great objection to it personally. I think it is very hard that a workman, like myself, who is tied all the week, on Monday morning to Saturday night, cannot stand and enjoy a glass of ale with my friends on a Sunday evening. I am not in the habit of getting drunk, and I should think it very hard if I was to be debarred from doing so.
 371. You go and sit there and talk to your friends?—Yes, we meet and converse upon various topics on Sunday, after church, at eight o'clock in the evening; perhaps a few friends meet, and we have a discussion even upon the sermon and the music; and from that we get to politics, but not in a greater number than one or two, and we think there is no harm in it.
 372. Do you go on Saturday evening also?—Not often; I do sometimes.
 373. And you do not see any drunkenness in the public-houses?—I do not. I do not attend any public-houses; but I do not see but very little drunkenness in the town.
 374. Is there any music at any of the houses on Sunday evening?—I believe not. I am not aware of any; indeed, I think not.
 375. That could hardly happen without your arising of it?—I think not. There used to be, but it has been stopped some years now.
 376. And the town is quite orderly in the evening?—Very much so indeed.
 377. There has been, you say, a public meeting held in Stockport?—Yes.
 378. Do you know how many attended it?—I do not. They said the room was full, but I cannot tell how many it would hold. I should think it would hold 500 or 600.
 379. Was the mayor in the chair?—Yes, the mayor was in the chair.
 380. Was it called by public advertisement or by order of the mayor?—By public advertisement from the Alliance.
 381. It was not a public meeting called by the mayor?—No, I think not, because the mayor was to preside; there was a paper put up that the mayor would preside.

382. Then it was not strictly a public meeting; it was a meeting of the United Kingdom Alliance presided over by the mayor?—Yes.

383. Has there been any petition from Stockport?—Yes.

384. Was it largely signed?—Yes.

385. In favour of the Bill or against it?—Against it.

386. How many people signed it?—There was a public petition, signed by 3,000 people.

387. Did you sign it?—I did; and in the neighbourhood there was a petition with 1,933 signatures.

388. The total signatures were how many?—Four thousand nine hundred and thirty-three.

389. Who got it up; who took the trouble of doing it?—I really do not know who got it up; canvassers went round, but I never asked the question.

390. Who sent them round?—I really cannot tell, I am sure.

391. Was it the licensed victualler?—It may be for what I know; I do not know, I am sure.

392. Where did the petition lie for signature?—They went round in various places throughout the borough and district.

393. You do not know who paid them?—I do not.

394. You never heard?—I never heard.

395. Mr. Berkeley.] You do not appear to have that desperately bad opinion of licensed victuallers that the Alliance League appears to have; you have seen a great deal of preaching and statements about the country made by the members of the Alliance at Manchester?—Yes.

396. You have heard, I dare say, names and epithets bestowed upon the licensed victuallers?—Yes.

397. And you hardly believe that they do deserve such names as those that they are called by?—I think that some of them are a very respectable set of men.

398. You would think it rather a hard term to call them "the Ganymedes of Satan"?—Yes, I should say so.

399. Or "the cupbearers to the Devil"?—Yes.

8400. And it would be rather hard on them, would it not, to say that licensed victuallers' houses were "the vestibules of Hell"?—Very bad.

8401. And yet such epithets have gone about, as you are aware?—Yes, I am aware of it.

Mr. W. Rea.

1863.

Mr. JOSEPH HENSHALL, called in; and Examined.

8402. Chairman.] ARE you an Estate Agent at West Gorton, Manchester?—Yes.

8403. Mr. Locke.] Are you likewise a Sunday-school teacher?—Yes.

8404. What is the population of Gorton?—Over 20,000.

8405. What number of public-houses are there in the township?—Eleven licensed victuallers and 90 beerhouses.

8406. Have you a large public garden in Gorton?—Yes.

8407. Is that open on Sunday?—It is.

8408. Do people frequent it to any extent?—Yes; in Whit-week it was frequented by an average of 20,000 each day.

0.69.

8409. What are the number of churches and chapels in Gorton?—About 20.

8410. What is the average attendance at Belle Vue Gardens on Sundays?—About 3,000.

8411. What is the conduct and demeanour of the visitors at the gardens?—The conduct, I believe, as far as I can learn from Messrs. Demson's, who are the proprietors, is very good. They say that it is very seldom that a flower is plucked, or any disarrangement of the grounds at all, and that the people behave well. In order to show this, I have ascertained from the New Bailey, Manchester, during Whit-week, when there was such a large number of visitors at the grounds, there was not a single case of drunkenness brought before the Bench during the whole week, and there was, on the average, 20,000 visitors on each day in the seven.

8412. Have the people some recreation or amusements there?—Yes, there are all kinds of amusements; water, and boats, and everything of that description, and museums.

8413. Do you think that amusements of that kind are better calculated to repress drunkenness than restrictive measures, such as this Bill?—Yes, I should say so; I give that as my opinion.

8414. What do you think would be the effect of this Bill if it were passed into a law?—From the experience which I have had, and the expression of opinion that has been given at several meetings that I have attended on the Bill respecting the working men, they appear to feel themselves annoyed if there should be further restriction. They think that the result would be against rather than in favour of any improvement.

8415. What is the feeling of the working men with regard to the attempt to pass a restrictive Bill of this description; how do they express themselves?—I have heard this feeling set forth, that they do not see why the working men should be prohibited from getting a glass of beer in a respectable public-house on Sunday, so long as the club-houses in London are open. That is the remark that they have made; and I have also heard them make this remark in public, that they are trusted with the franchise, and if they are fit to be entrusted with that, they think that they ought to be entrusted with the conduct of themselves on a Sunday.

8416. Then they entertain the opinion that they are not children; that they have grown to their maturity, and are able to take care of themselves?—Quite so.

8419. Do they express those views?—Yes; I may further give you that as my opinion of it from my experience. I have lived in the township about 18 years; when I first came, the population was only 3,000, and, of course, I have a good knowledge of Gorton, and I myself say there is very little drunkenness, particularly on Sunday, in Gorton. I believe that the greatest number of drunkards that I have ever seen has been between eight o'clock and half-past nine on Sunday morning, and I have ascertained from the police that they have in their books more cases that have been arrested between eight and nine o'clock in the morning than in any other period of the day.

8420. How do they or you account for that?—I can only account for it in this way, that they procure the drink from some low, what are termed, eating and beerhouses, and those sort of places which are allowed to sell beer. For instance, there is a description of license, I forget what the name of it is, that gives a person the privilege of selling beer almost at any time; I know that it is done, and I fancy they get it from those places. I do not think they get it from the respectable houses. In reading the paper I find that if a person gets fined for selling beer at an improper time, it is some of those parties to whom I allude; some of those beer-shop keepers.

8421. Supposing that the restrictions contained in this Bill were enforced, do you think that that would diminish drunkenness?—I do not; cannot see it.

8422. Do you think that it would increase it?—I believe that those parties whom I have noticed being drunk on a Sunday, are parties who would be drunk whatever restrictions there were; they would get it somehow. They are habitual drunkards, and they would get drink in some way, if the houses were closed.

8423. You think that if they cannot get it from a public-house, where the landlord is bound to keep order and conduct his house with propriety, they will go to some place to get it where there is no order at all, and get it in an illicit manner?—Yes, I think it would come to private drinking, and that, in my opinion, is much worse than drinking at a public-house. I have noticed this kind of drinking in some of the towns, particularly in Oldham, and I think that would be increased where they have what they term a private brew with a peck of malt, for instance, and drink it on Sunday. I think there would be more of that.

8424. Do the inhabitants of Gorton take a large interest in public questions affecting their social position?—Yes, they are very much improved in that respect lately.

8425. Do they take any particular interest in this subject?—Yes.

8426. Are there any meetings?—Yes.

8427. Social meetings?—Yes.

8428. And discussions?—Yes.

8429. Where are they held?—At various places. Some of them are held in schoolrooms and others, more particularly public meetings more immediately bearing on township matters, would be held at some of the respectable public-houses.

8430. You think that they are more sober and better disposed, and more intellectual, than they were formerly?—I am quite persuaded of it.

8431. And you think that they will go on improving?—Yes.

8432. Do you think that the present restrictions are quite sufficient?—I do in that respect.

8433. Do you approve of the present restrictions?—I do. Of course I pay proper observance to the Sabbath, and I have been connected with chapels and schools more than 25 years, and my experience is this, that on Sundays we have a larger number attend the evening service than at any other part of the day. I have ascertained that from every place of worship in Gorton; and that leads me to this conclusion, that if the public-houses are open on Sunday evening, it cannot be that that keeps them away from church, because there is a less attendance in the morning and afternoon when the houses are closed.

8434. Fewer attend in the morning and afternoon when the public-houses are closed, than in the evening when they are open?—Yes; and they are of that class that you would suppose go to a public-house in the evening, because the congregation in the morning are generally of a certain class.

8435. Therefore you think that whether the public-house is open or not, it does not influence those people?—As far as my feeling goes, in connection with Sunday schools, I do not think it would be any benefit or any gain; it would not induce

Mr.
J. Henshall

duce any man to go to a place of worship if the public-houses were closed.

8436. Has there been a canvass at Gorton?—Believe a canvass was attempted.

8437. By whom?—I should think by the different teetotallers, or by the strong sabbatarian party, one of the two, I am not certain which; but it was a failure I am told.

8438. What do you call the strong sabbatarian party; is that what they call themselves?—I do not know. There are some of them who would not allow people to visit the parks, or have Sunday music, or anything of the kind; I think these are extreme.

8439. They would allow no recreation whatever?—Yes, that is so.

8440. They would give them the option of walking about the street, or going to church or chapel, or stopping at home?—They would wish them to go to chapel, of course.

8441. That would be the only place that they would permit them to go to, except their own homes?—Just so.

8442. Those are what you call the Sabbatarians?—Yes.

8443. Who are the others?—The Teetotallers.

8444. Are any of those Teetotallers Sabbatarians?—I should say there are, because they are the two extremes, and they generally go together.

8445. You say there was an attempt to get up a canvass?—Yes.

8446. Did it succeed?—No, it failed.

8447. How was it that it failed?—I suppose because they could not get signatures; I have heard but very little about it; I heard that there was an attempt made, but it was given up on some account.

8448. You never heard of any result?—No, I have never heard of any.

8449. How was it that you came to give your evidence before this Committee; by whom were you requested?—It was in this way: there was a public meeting called to take into consideration this Bill, and at that meeting on the ratepayers was informed that a copy of the resolution was sent up to each member of this Committee, and they asked me to give evidence here if I was required.

8450. How long have you lived at Gorton?—Eighteen years.

8451. How long have you been a Sunday school teacher?—Over 25 years.

8452. Have you any business besides house agent?—Yes, I have two shops; I have an ironmonger's shop and a stationer's shop; I have also built a large lot of property at Gorton, and I am agent for different gentlemen as well.

8453. These are your views with respect to this Bill?—Yes.

8454. You do not wish it to pass?—No, I do not.

8455. You think it would be a great injustice if it did?—Yes. I believe it would be a great disappointment to many respectable tradesmen, who know how to conduct themselves and who do conduct themselves with propriety on Sunday; that is my opinion.

8456. And to the bulk of the people it would be an inconvenience, and do them harm?—Yes, it would be so, I believe.

8457. Chairman.] Are you a Sunday school teacher in connection with the Church of England?—No, with the Unitarians.

8458. Do you know if your sentiments are shared in by the members of your communion in your town?—By some of them; I have not consulted the whole of them upon the question.

8459. Do you think that you can say that you represent their sentiments at large, or any large number of them?—I am one of those that should not like to make an assertion of that kind, because I have not consulted them.

8460. Do you think that you are alone in your opinions?—As far as our religion goes, it is to this effect, that we ought not to inflict on another that which we would not like to be inflicted on ourselves; and that is the way I carry this out.

8461. I want to know whether you think that you are speaking the sentiments of many people besides your own?—I am not of a great number connected with our own chapel, but I have a sufficient knowledge of the sentiments of the township, as far as the ratepayers go, in public meetings.

8462. You think that a good many are of your opinion?—Yes; the majority.

8463. Do you think that you are rather opposed to your own particular communion in that respect?—I might be, no doubt.

8464. Do you think you are?—Yes, I dare say I am. As far as that goes, of course everybody has a discountenance to anything like a public-house being opened; that is to say, those who look at it from one point of view.

8465. And you will tell us equally whether you think you are speaking the mind of others as well as your own?—I do not think I am speaking the mind of the majority of the congregation that I belong to, because I have never asked them; so that I should be very sorry to say.

8466. Mr. Locke.] But you do not know that you are not?—No, I do not.

8467. Mr. Evans.] I understood you to say that in spite of the 11 public-houses and 90 beer-shops in Gorton, you consider that the place has improved with respect to temperance?—It has.

8468. To what do you attribute that improvement?—I attribute it to this, that men are becoming more educated and more enlightened; the people are much better taught than when I came to Gorton, and much better clothed, and they have time to visit the gardens also.

8469. You have told the Committee that you have been for many years a Sunday-school teacher; of course, we infer from that that you approve of Sunday-schools?—Of course.

8470. You think that they confer great benefit on the country?—Yes.

8471. Mr. John Abel Smith.] What is the provincial assembly of your church; what exactly is it; what does it represent?—It is the assembly of the various congregations of our denomination in Lancashire and Cheshire.

8472. Did not they hold a meeting last Thursday?—Yes, I believe they did.

8473. Did not they there resolve to petition in favour of this Bill?—I was not there. I saw something of it in the "Herald;" there was such a thing, I believe.

8474. You believe that there was?—Yes, I believe the report.

8475. And you believe that the representatives of your whole body in Lancashire and Cheshire did petition in favour of this Bill?—I cannot say that; I can only say that I read in the "Herald" that there was a majority in favour of it.

3 c 4

8476. But

Mr.
J. Henshall.
1868.

8476. But the provincial assembly do represent your church in those two counties?—Yes.

8477. And you believe that they did petition in favour of this Bill?—Yes.

8478. Therefore, of course, in the opinions which you express, you do not agree with the more influential part of your co-religionists?—There would be only one representative of Gorton who went to that meeting.

8479. But the whole of the Unitarians in Lancashire and Cheshire were there represented?—Yes.

8480. And therefore if they were favourable to this Bill, you, in the opinions which you express, do not agree with them?—No.

8481. What is the government of Gorton?—A Local Board.

8482. Are any of them or all of them magistrates?—No, there are none of them magistrates, I think.

8483. Is there a separate Board of magistrates for Gorton?—No, offenders are taken to the New Bailey at Manchester from Gorton.

8484. Do you know anything of the feeling of the Local Board about this Bill?—Yes, the majority are against the Bill.

8485. Has there been any movement of the Local Board?—Not any.

8486. How do you speak of that then?—I speak from a private canvass, naming it to them that I had been summoned here, and asking their opinions.

8487. Who summoned you here?—The summons was signed by the Chairman.

8488. How did the Chairman hear of your name?—I told the Committee before that I was recommended from the meeting of ratepayers, and that the resolution of that meeting was sent to each member of this Committee.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, BART., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. GEORGE CANDELET, called in; and Examined.

39. Mr. Frederick Stanley.] WHAT is your position in connection with the licensed victuallers?—I am secretary for the Manchester Salford Licensed Victuallers' Association, for the Provincial Licensed Victuallers' League; the former is a local society, but the latter is a unity of societies.

40. Can you state to the Committee, approximately, the number of persons who are included in the various associations which you represent?—The number of persons connected with the central society is 5,430, and those are spread in about 30 towns.

41. Will you give to the Committee the names of the towns which are connected with the central association?—Leicester, Oldham, Accrington, Lancaster, Burnley, Ashton-in-Lynde, Rochdale, Wakefield, Staleybridge, Middlesbrough, Bolton, Crewe, Stoke, Penhead, Loughborough, Macclesfield, Blackburn, Carlisle, Preston, Manchester, Bradford, Abury, Dukinfield, Glossop, Wigan, Chorley, Hanley, Burslem, and a number of other towns.

42. When was the Licensed Victuallers' Society instituted; and can you state to the Committee what the general objects of the Society were?—The local society, that is, the Manchester and Salford Association, was established about 21 years ago, and it directs its attention to the provision, chiefly, for old age, and for benevolent purposes, and is enrolled under the 11th section of the 18th & 19th Vict., chap. 1.

43. The association was not formed, was it, for the express purpose of opposing this Bill, or was it one of the same nature?—I may say that the central association has been in existence for 13 years, and that is chiefly for protective purposes.

44. Do you remember the passing of Colonel Wilson Patten's Act?—I remember the passing of Colonel Wilson Patten's Act very well, in 1854, and the Forbes Mackenzie Act passed in the preceding year, 1853.

45. Will you state to the Committee what your friends took upon that Bill of Colonel Wilson Patten?—There was very little action taken to prevent the passing of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act; but there was co-operation and common cause made with the general public for the repeal of that Act; and in 1855 there were pretty nearly 40,000 signatures presented from Manchester, from the general public, praying for the repeal of that Act.

8496. You are aware of the hours of sale under the Act of George the Fourth, and the amount of alteration which was made by Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill, are you not; ninth of George Fourth, chap. 61?—I am.

8497. And are you aware of what is contemplated by the Bill before the Committee, with respect to the closing of public-houses on Sunday?—The present Bill limits the sale for the consumption off the premises in the metropolis to four hours, and in the provinces to three and a-half hours. In London, under a local regulation, the houses do not open before one o'clock; and it is the case also in Liverpool; but those are the only two towns that are restricted to one o'clock. In other parts of the country they close until the end of the morning service, which, generally speaking, is half-past 12.

8498. Are those persons whom you represent unanimous, as far as you are aware, in the view which they take with respect to the provisions of this Bill?—On the 5th of February in the present year we had a delegate meeting convened in Manchester for the purpose of considering the provisions of this Bill, when the following code of reasons against the Bill was adopted: "1. Because experience derived from the operation of Colonel Wilson Patten's Act, passed in 1854, and which was repealed in 1855, evidently engendered feelings of dissatisfaction amongst the working class, whose social comfort and sustenance were affected thereby: 2. Because the preamble of Mr. Berkeley's Act, the present regulation, and which was passed on the 14th of August 1855, sets forth that the restrictions previously in force have been attended with inconvenience to the public; this Act is based upon the evidence of metropolitan police magistrates and others, taken before a Parliamentary Select Committee, and who were anxious to be relieved from the administration of a law productive of anger and never-ending disputes, as to the true definition of a bonâ fide traveller; the present Bill will also create another legal difficulty as to what is a bonâ fide meal: 3. Because the present hours of sale in in the provinces require public-houses to be closed from 12 o'clock on Saturday night till half-past 12 on Sunday morning, and closed again from 3 to 5 p.m., and again from 11 p.m. till 4 a.m. on Monday. The present law has been found to work satisfactorily to the trade, and to the wants and conveniences of the public, and without interfering with a due observance of the Sabbath: 4. Because all legislative restraint averse to the disposition of the public, will involve the trade in expensive litigation, as means of gratification will be found, if not in public in private places: 5. Because further restraint, as proposed by the present Bill, implies an untrue imputation on the conduct and character of the working class, whilst it secures refreshment for travellers in the metropolis, but excludes them from this privilege in the provinces: 6. Because the present Bill will engender animosity between the police and the populace, who will hate them, as partisans of an oppressive law, instead of respecting them as protectors of their persons and their property: 7. Because no law can produce social or moral improvement, which depends upon force or police vigilance; people may be vexed, but not reformed by law, social and moral improvement being the work of the teacher and not of the legislator."

8499. The Committee are to understand that those are the objections of the trade, as far as you represent them, to the Bill now before the Committee?—I believe they are; at all events, they represent the opinions and the views of the delegate meeting which was held at Manchester, representing 30 important towns in various parts of the country.

8500. Are you aware that it has been stated to the Committee that drunkenness is on the increase in Manchester?—I am.

8501. Are you prepared to corroborate that statement?—I am not prepared to corroborate it; I have seen an account of the statistics which have been put before this Committee by Captain Palin, the chief constable of Manchester, and Captain Palin, in that sheet of figures, includes prostitution and disorderly carters, but since he gave his evidence, I should rather be inclined to say that they were not drunken carters, otherwise they would have been included in Captain Palin's statistics under the head of drunkenness, but he distinguishes them in the information laid before this Committee under three heads—drunkenness, carters, and prostitutes. I may say that immediately after I saw the report in the public papers of Captain Palin's evidence in reference to Sunday drunkenness, I went over to the Town Hall, and applied to them for the net figures representing drunkenness only, and I found that in 1862 there were 391 cases brought before the magistrates; in 1863, 435; in 1864, 467; in 1865, 549; in 1866, 760; and in 1867, 910. Those cases occurred between one o'clock p.m. on Sunday and four o'clock on Monday morning, and of course they were brought before the magistrates on Monday morning, but the Committee will please to remember that there is a very wide difference between cases and persons. Cases do not represent persons. It frequently occurs, as in the case of pauperism and crime, that the same parties frequently get into the hands of the police, and they are marked, I am afraid, in comparing statistics, as separate and distinct persons; I can give you one instance of a notorious character, a woman in Chancery-lane, in one division of Manchester, who has been times in the hands of the police.

8502. Mr. Roebuck.] If she was brought on one day she would not be counted three times on that day, but merely as once?—As once.

8503. Therefore your observation does not apply to that?—It would be as once, certainly. I may say with reference to the increase of drunkenness, that a great deal depends upon the temper of the local authorities, and particularly so when the police are sometimes encouraged from the bench. The police are not very apt in taking a hint from the authorities, as they are operated upon by the watch committee, and the watch committee, I regret very much to say, influenced, to a very great extent, by the agitation which has promoted this Bill.

8504. Mr. Frederick Stanley.] You are aware that there is a very wide discrepancy between the figures which you have given in to the Committee, and those which have been given in by Captain Palin?—Yes, I am aware of that; that is accounted for from the fact that this Bill is confined to drunkenness only, whilst the other includes the carters and prostitutes.

8505. Are the figures which you have given authenticated?—Yes, by Captain Palin himself.

8506. When did you receive them from the office?—A few days after he had given his evidence.

8507. Mr. John Abel Smith.] What did you ask for?—For a return of Sunday drunkenness between the hours of 1 p.m. on Sunday, and 4 p.m. on Monday morning. The answer which I received from Captain Palin was, that there was no standing record of this description, but that he would put a clerk on to the books and endeavour to supply me with the figures. I endeavoured to show Captain Palin that it was unfair, when legislation was contemplated, such as the present Bill, to put statements before the Committee in reference to an increase of drunkenness, which included other offences. Perhaps the Committee would allow me to say, that I do not for one moment think that there is a more impartial public officer in connection with the police force than Captain Palin, or a more gentlemanly man—a man who is disposed at all times to do that which is right between all parties. I merely wish to explain, and, if possible, to show, how the increase of drunkenness has accumulated.

8508. Mr. Frederick Stanley.] As far as we are aware, the same sources of information were open to you as were the foundation of the evidence which was given to the Committee. Certainly.

8509. I believe there are now some few publicans in Manchester who close their houses voluntarily on Sunday?—There are a few who close their houses voluntarily on Sunday, but they are chiefly persons who have accumulated an independent fortune, and they now, I am sorry to say, think more of their own ease than they do of the public convenience.

8510. Has that question ever been brought generally before any meeting of your society?—Yes; on the 5th of February in the present year, when that Code of Reasons was adopted against the present Bill.

8511. Can you state to the Committee whether there was any considerable division of opinion upon that subject, and some in favour of closing the houses providing it was unanimous?—I am not aware.

there was a dissenting voice against adopting the resolutions; in fact, I may say that the Bill which has at all times actuated the trade is a part of the country which I am connected with has always been based upon the experience derived from the operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill; the difficulty that there was as regards interpreting the law in a uniform manner as to the meaning of the term bonâ fide traveller. That was so frequently before the superior courts in London, and almost constantly, during the operation of that Act, before the local police courts, that there were no two similar ways of interpreting what was a traveller; and, therefore, they were anxious, in opposing this Bill, to avoid the recurrence of similar litigation.

512. There have been no decisions so far in the courts which would give the trade any notion of what might be considered legally a bonâ fide traveller, have there?—No; that question is quite new. As to the question of what is a bonâ fide traveller, I think that has occurred for the first time in the Bill promoted by the Honourable Member for Chichester.

513. As far as you are aware, that would be a good deal of doubt in the minds of the courts, would it not?—Of course it would.

514. And probably end in a great deal of litigation?—Yes, it would cause a great deal of litigation.

515. Have you ever had your attention directed to the question of a six day's license?—No; I believe the first time that the question of a six days' license was brought under my notice was by the Honourable Member for Oldham. It was some five or six years ago, at a public dinner, and as I understood the Honourable gentleman at that time, his idea was, if a six day's license was established, to increase the present license duty for those who kept their houses open; but for those who closed them that the price should remain as it is. There would be very strong objection on the part of the trade to that, it might be acceptable to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is always looking out for new taxes, but it certainly would not be very agreeable to the overworked licensed victuallers.

516. It would be equivalent, would it not, to the majority of cases, to raising the price of a license?—Yes; it would.

517. Have you estimated at all the value of the capital now embarked in the license victualling trade?—The capital is estimated from all sources at about 90,000,000 £.

518. Mr. Roebuck.] Is that in the United Kingdom, or in England?—In the United Kingdom.

519. Mr. Baines.] Does that include beer shops?—Yes; from all sources.

520. Mr. Frederick Stanley.] And therefore the pecuniary loss would be very serious which would be incurred by any disturbance of the trade in so large a proportion of its weekly use? I look upon the present Bill as being a bill which would close the houses all day on Sunday, though only providing for a few hours for consumption off the premises; as regards the profits, we view it as a total closing Bill. I could say there would be a loss of 8,000 £ per week to the 5,430 licensed victuallers connected with the Provincial Licensed Victuallers Defence League. The Bill would cut down the trade even weeks in a year, and if you take it into consideration, that there would be no proportion.

tionate reduction in the cost of management, such as rent charges and charges for servants, as a matter of course, it is quite perceptible that a very great sacrifice would be made. I may say with respect to those houses, which are used in the out districts by the public on a Sunday in connection with cheap excursions and so forth, you might as well close the houses altogether if you took away the business done on the Sunday.

8521. It has been stated to the Committee that if the houses were closed on Sunday there would be a diminution of trade upon the other days also; do you concur in that opinion; that is to say, that a customer frequenting a public-house, finding it closed upon the Sunday, would be likely to transfer the custom elsewhere during the week?—I do not think that would be the case. I am aware that it has often been asserted that there are a great many licensed victuallers who would be glad if a general law were passed to make it compulsory; but all my experience as secretary connected with the trade goes to prove the reverse. I know of no such general feeling.

8522. Mr. Roebuck.] I do not think you quite understood the question; it was, whether the houses that were closed on Sunday would lose their custom during the rest of the week?—Yes, of course they would.

8523. Chairman.] You say that you pointed out to the chief constable of Manchester that his return was unfair as descriptive of the state of Manchester as regards drunkenness, inasmuch as he had mixed up with his return of persons charged with drunkenness those accused of other offences?—Yes.

8524. But did you understand that in Captain Palin's return for the last two years he had included all the refused charges; that is, those of which the police took no further cognisance; whereas in the former years those were not included?—I did not know that.

8525. If you were told that, and that that, according to Captain Palin's statement, accounts for the greater number in these last two years, do not you think that that would remove a part of the unfairness?—Yes, precisely so.

8526. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] Did you take an interest in friendly societies previous to your official connection with the licensed victuallers?—I did.

8527. You were in a position with reference to them of some trust, were you not?—I may say that I took a very lively interest indeed in promoting legislation for an improvement of friendly societies, in conjunction with a late Member of this House, the Right Honourable Thomas Sotherton Estcourt, the Member for North Wiltshire, and immediately that improved legislation was adopted, I was presented, through the medium of 13 Members of Parliament of the Upper and Lower house, amongst whom was Earl de Grey and Ripon, Lord Egerton of Tatton, the Earl of Donoughmore, Edward Ackroyd, Esq., Sir Alexander Ramsay, and the Right Honourable Thomas Sotherton Estcourt himself, with the watch which I have in my pocket, and upon which is inscribed "Presented by the members and friends of these institutions for past meritorious services in promoting useful legislation" at a public dinner, in Rochdale, on the 9th of October 1858. My connection with those societies enables me to know that such a Bill as this would very materially interfere with the management of those societies on the Sunday.

8528. Bearing in mind that this committee has had recalled to it the advice which Mr. Tidd Pratt gave to those societies, will you be good enough to state, in your opinion, why that advice is not such as would be beneficial to friendly societies, and how far the action of this Bill would be damaging to them?—Mr. Tidd Pratt, though he is the Registrar General of Friendly Societies, and it is presumed would possess a great deal of experience as regards the management of friendly societies, often acts very inconsistently; and really, when his ability is tested, it is found that he knows really and truly nothing at all about the requirements or the necessities of those institutions. I am aware that he has endeavoured to withdraw friendly societies from public-houses altogether, because there are some exceptional cases of mismanagement; but that occurs amongst life insurance companies, and limited liability companies, and other institutions that are managed, not by the working class, but by the upper class.

8529. Will you show us the precise manner in which this Bill would interfere with the management of friendly societies, and why it is that their connection with public-houses is desirable?—Friendly societies, to a great extent, have been nursed and matured in public-houses. We have a perfect network of children and adult sick and burial clubs all through Lancashire, who are necessarily compelled to meet on the Sunday evening; and through the day they are obliged to collect the contributions from the members of the societies who are confined to factories through the whole of the week. It would be almost impossible for the money to be collected on any other day; and, if this Bill should prevent consumption upon the premises, to a very great extent the usefulness of those institutions would be impaired.

8530. Mr. Roebuck.] Why should not those institutions meet at a private house?—I do not think that that plan would be so successful. I see no objection against their meeting in private houses; but I can see no objection to them, or mischief that arises from them, meeting and doing their business in public-houses on Sunday evening.

8531. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] Do those public houses afford facilities which are taken advantage of to a very large extent, for the necessary meetings of those different friendly societies?—Yes.

8532. And have there been practically any complaints as to the working of those friendly societies having been injured by their meeting at those public houses?—I am not aware of any.

8533. Have you any knowledge of the public-houses, and of the state of society in France, with regard to the question?—I have sometimes been over on pleasure excursions, but recently I went over for a day or two to Calais, which is a garrison town, for the purpose of observing the Sunday in that country, and since I left I had a letter addressed to me by one of the trade, which with the permission of the chairman of the Committee I will read. It is dated from the "Dover Castle Hotel," Calais, 10th May 1868. "Dear Mr. Candelet,—We are glad you have been over to this country to look into the observance of the French Sabbath, and also of the conduct of the French public-houses. We have perfect I may say, uninterrupted freedom to eat and drink what we like, and when we like; and this, you must admit, is what you have seen, without injury to the physical or moral welfare of the people. More restrictions the English Parliament imposes, the greater the secret desire to do that which mankind is forbidden to do, no matter whether in England or France, the impulse is the same. Your English philanthropists are mistaken. Their zeal and efforts for compulsory legislation only increase the evils they are anxious to suppress. From what you have seen in your travels you must confess the French Sabbath, if better, is certainly not worse observed than in England. As the representative of the English trade, we shall be glad, at any time, to see you again, or to supply you with any information you may require on the social state of this country of France. There is but a narrow straight line which divides the two countries; but a great difference in the public-house regulations. There is more restriction in this country on the Sunday than there is on any other day, and the French Government never, or but rarely, think of interfering with the social convenience of its subjects or with the conduct of the public-houses. We see from the English papers, that this class legislation is constantly before the English Parliament, and from our experience we only sympathize at the patience of the English senators, in bestowing so much attention upon foolish schemes and proposals, to advance by compulsion the improvement of English society. Give the people of England more educational amusements, and use less force, you then will have better results in England. The people will be better, like you, and have more respect for their makers. Yours truly, G. Woodford and others.—To Geo. Candelet, Esq., Hotel du Commerce, Rue Royal, à la Calais.

8534. Do you, generally, agree with the sentiments of the writer of that letter?—I do.

8535. Have you noticed, from your experience, an improvement in the habits of the people generally during the last 10 or 15 years?—As far as Manchester is concerned, if we look at their educational progress and the taste for literature, we had no daily papers in 1831, but we had five weekly papers, with a circulation of 12,000; in 1868 we have three daily papers and two weekly papers, with a circulation of 346,000 a-week, and we have periodicals in conjunction with them, and 200,000 of them come into Manchester every week, besides the London papers. I may mention, in conjunction with the spread and increased circulation of newspapers, that we have public libraries, schools of art, reading rooms, building clubs, provident societies, musical festivals, and public parks, all of which in themselves have greatly tended to facilitate the improvement of the mind, and also the health of the people. Such things as public libraries, schools of art, and reading rooms did not exist all 25 years ago in Manchester.

8536. If a people confessedly improving their moral behaviour, and who have largely improved during the last 10 or 15 years, found themselves suddenly under the imposition of fresh restrictions, is it not possible that a considerable feeling against those restrictions would be created?—Certainly.

8537. And, in fact, is it your opinion that such sh restrictions would be followed by evasion, I might possibly, in the long run, actually check the moral improvement which they are intended to stimulate?—I feel thoroughly satisfied in my own mind that drunkenness would not be diminished through the imposition of fresh restrictions; it would tend to increase the hush-houses and private drinking places, where the vigilance of the police, to a very great extent, would be eluded; it might make the people hypocritical, but it would certainly not otherwise improve them. I can remember the wakes and fairs, where there was a great deal of feasting and a great deal of extravagant drinking, but a great deal of that money now is spent in cheap excursions, and many of the poor working men have gratification of seeing London, or improving their health at the seaside, who at that time devoted the whole of their attention to domestic drinking.

8538. If the taste for private drinking were discouraged by restrictive legislation, is it not possible that that taste, not being so directly under the control of the law, might quietly and gradually spread more and more widely, and so, in the long run, cause a worse state of society for drunkenness, than could be caused if the present law remained unaltered, and the people were left to judge for themselves, and to continue the course of moral improvement in which they have already been advancing?—There is no doubt that that would be the effect of private drinking, and whatever evils may be attendant upon public drinking, the private use of drink is very much worse in its influences.

8539. You would say, I suppose, as an illustration, that the fire which smoulders underneath is very often, in the long run, worse and more dangerous than the open flames which are easily seen and, therefore, more easily checked?—Quite so.

8540. Speaking of Manchester, are you aware that there has been a householders' canvass in Manchester, and that the results of that canvass are reported to be favourable to the Bill?—I am aware that a canvass has taken place from the reports which I saw in the public papers; but I respectfully submit to the Committee that that is a very ex parte mode of representing public opinion; and I think that caution ought to be exercised by the legislature how they proceed to legislate upon the basis of a household canvass. That canvass the papers were originated and issued by the friends of the Bill, and they were collected in by some persons who were known only to the party who issued them; and when the results are totted up and issued to the public, there is no impartial check; it may be right, it may be wrong. But the old constitutional mode of representing public opinion to this House is through the medium of petitions; and remember, just before this Bill was sent to a select Committee, that the number of petitions were greatly in excess on the part of the opponents compared to those who promoted petitions in its favour.

8541. May I say that your opinion is that a canvass instituted by persons who have a desire to obtain a particular expression of opinion, is not a canvass which, in your opinion, can command implicit confidence?—That is so.

8542. I understand that you have communicated with chief constables and others with reference to the state of drunkenness in various parts of England?—I have. I may say that last year, in reference to those statistics, when the Honourable Member's Bill was before the House, I opened a communication with Sir Richard Mayne, the Chief Commissioner of Police in the Metropolis, and he very politely, in reply to my request, sent me the state of drunkenness in Whitehall, Westminster, St. James's, Marylebone, Holborn, Covent Garden, Finsbury, Whitechapel, Stepney, Lambeth, Southwark, Islington, Camberwell, Greenwich, Hampstead, Kensington, Wandsworth, Clapham, Paddington, and Highgate. This embraces a population of 3,785,245, and it does not average more than 36 persons apprehended each Sunday for drunkenness.

8543. Mr. Locke.] What year is that?—This is for last year. It is a return showing the number of cases of drunkenness, &c., which have occurred between 1 o'clock p.m. on Sundays, and 1 o'clock on Mondays, during the year 1866. Also the number of public-houses and beer-shops existing at the end of 1866; of course, this table was procured last year, but it related to the year 1866.

8544. Chairman.] The population of London in that year, according to the table which Sir Richard Mayne has placed before the Committee, amounted to 3,396,664; that is the statement which he made to the Committee?—Permit me to make one remark, that the metropolitan police district extends beyond the boundary of the population of London.

8545. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] Have not the proportion of Sunday offences, and the proportion of offences on Saturday night, both of which are usually brought before the magistrates on Monday morning, been rather confused in the statements and statistics of some witnesses?—They have.

8546. These tables contain the number of offences on Sunday only, for your own object and elucidation, you have made the separation more distinct?—Yes, that is so. I may say that, in conjunction with Sir Richard Mayne's returns, I have had returns, also, from the chief constable of a great many towns in the provinces, including Accrington, Ashton-under-Lyne, Blackburn, Bolton, Bristol, Burnley, Birmingham, Bury, Carlisle, Darlington, Exeter, Glossop Division, Halifax, Huddersfield, Hull, Lancaster, Leeds, Leicester, Macclesfield, Manchester, Newark, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Nottingham, Oldham, Plymouth, Preston, Rochdale, Rochester, Salford, Sheffield, Staleybridge, Stockport, Wakefield, Warrington, Wolverhampton, and York. That embraces a population of upwards of 3,000,000, and there is an average of about 35 per cent. apprehended in the course of Sunday during the year 1866.

8547. Mr. Horsfall.] Do you think that the watch committee of Manchester were influenced by the agitation in favour of this Bill?—I am afraid that they have been.

8548. When did that agitation take place?—Last year and the year previous; in fact, these last two or three years.

8549. I presume that agitation was with reference not to this Bill, but to the principle of this Bill?—No, originally it was not to this Bill.

8550. Presuming that the watch committee were influenced by the agitation in favour of this Bill last year, how do you account for the gradual increase in the number of cases of drunkenness from 1862 to 1866?—There has been a very great increase in the population.

8551. Do you think that the population has increased in proportion to the increase of cases?—Yes, I think so; perhaps the Committee will permit me to draw their attention to an extract from a letter by the Rev. John Garrett, who has taken a very active interest in promoting this Bill.

8552. Mr. Locke.] Was he examined before this Committee?—Yes, he has been examined before this Committee; I merely call the attention of the Committee to this extract from his letter, a copy of which has been sent to every Member of the House of Commons; this is addressed to the public, and is copied from the "Manchester Courier," and in this letter he says, "We have indeed felt it to be inevitable that this vast work must be effected by at least two Acts of Parliament following upon each other, according as the country will bear them, and according as Parliament will pass them, and we have hailed with thankfulness the prospect of speedily obtaining a first Bill, reserving the right and power to advocate any other Bill to complete the work, in case the friends of the cause should request us to do so, and should continue the requisite confidence and support." My object in calling the attention of the Committee to this extract is this, that this Bill would not settle the question; that it is merely an instalment, and here is evidence from a great promoter of the Bill, and who, no doubt, has supplied the honourable Member for Chichester with a great deal of information in support of this measure; it is plain we must be kept, as a trade, in constant boiling-water according to this.

8553. Mr. Berkeley.] You and I are old friends. I think I saw you in the year 1854?—You did.

8554. You were anxious that Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill should not pass?—Yes.

8555. In 1855 you are aware, are you not, of the evidence which was taken as regards the increase, or the probable increase of drunkenness which would take place, and which had been checked by Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill?—Yes, I am.

8556. Were you aware at that time of the petitions that had been got up, particularly by the Manchester League and that set of gentlemen who agree with them?—Yes.

8557. Do you conceive that those petitions throughout the country are bonâ fide petitions of adults and persons who had a right to give an opinion, from their own knowledge?—I know this, that as regards the petitions which have been recorded and received by the House lately, the report of the Select Committee upon Public Petitions, makes very unfavourable remarks as regards the character of those petitions.

8558. But of your own knowledge you are not aware whether they are bonâ fide or not?—Of my own knowledge I am not aware.

8559. As regards the agitation which has been got up, are you aware of the funds which the Manchester League and those gentlemen possess, and which are all addressed to agitation; have you heard the amount of them?—The amount of funds is very considerable. The last report I saw of the funds subscribed was some thousands of pounds; and I have many times thought that so long as there are so many people about the country who appear to have more money than intelligence, the agitation will always be kept alive.

8560. You consider, then, that the paid agents of those persons who go about the country, the well paid agents from the Manchester League are likely to act in a self-interested way, and keep the agitation up?—There is no doubt that it is a question of self-interest to a very great extent. There are some honourable exceptions, but I believe that their views are very much mistaken.

8561. Have you ever turned your attention to the regular trade that there is in getting up petitions?—Yes, there is no doubt that the executive staff connected with the promotion of this Bill have the most perfect machinery for getting up petitions, and can pour them in like water from a pump, in a never ending stream.

8562. Of course, acting upon the minds of weak people, old ladies and so forth, they draw such a picture that they make a great many proselites?—There is no doubt that their appeals are very sympathetic, and they live a life of repentance over the sins of others, and forget themselves very often.

8563. Are you aware how easy it is, upon any subject whatever, to get up petitions with money, and that there is a regular trade in petitions?—To a very great extent it is so.

8564. Are you aware that from 5 l. up to 50 you may have petitions on any given subject with a number of signatures co-extensive with the expense?—Yes.

8565. You have seen statements touching the feeling of Bristol as regards this Bill; you know the City of Bristol well?—Yes.

8566. Are you aware which way the feeling tends in that city?—Very much against legislation of this description; that I am certain of. Perhaps you will permit me to say that I think that the promoters of this Bill, in their style of advocacy, are not so discreet as they ought to be; I sometimes think if their object is temperance they are not very temperate in the style of advocacy.

8567. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] There have been many misrepresentations made, have there not, as to the course which the licensed victuallers have taken in agitating upon this subject?—Yes.

8568. One of the allegations that was made was that they were instrumental in presenting testimonial, which was presented to a certain member of the Legislature for his exertion against these restrictive measures?—Yes.

8569. Is it, or is it not, the fact that such an allegation is totally without foundation?—It is so.

8570. Will you explain what that testimonial was?—I remember copying the inscription which was given upon the casket containing the testimonial, and, with the permission of the Committee, I will read the inscription itself. I merely wish to remove the reproach and the scandal which was heaped upon my friends: "This casket, enriched with gems obtained from St. Vincent's Rocks, Bristol Hotwells, was made from an oak beam taken from the north porch of the church of St. Mary (Redcliffe, Bristol), which parish was formerly the town of Redcliffe, feudal possession of the lords of Berkeley, was on the 24th day of September, 1856, together with a silver salver, and purse of sovereigns, presented to the Honourable Francis Henry Fitzding Berkeley, M.P., as a testimonial, amounting in value to 1,012 £., by 14,000 Englishmen of classes, in recognition of his manly advocacy the peoples' rights in the Commons House of Parliament." I may say that the Honourable Member was obliged, at the time, to seek the sanction of the law. The Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, who was then attorney-general, prosecuted them. A verdict was obtained; but nominal damages were accepted, and an abject apology given in court.

8571. Chairman.] What for?—For misrepresenting Mr. Berkeley, and, to a very great extent, turning the scandal upon Mr. Berkeley of having received the testimonial not from the general public, but from the licensed victuallers, and that he really was bribed in taking the course that he did to procure the repeal of Mr. Wilson Crockett's Act.

8572. Mr. Evans.] You read a letter, I think, from some gentleman with regard to the state of the public-house in France?—With reference to the social state of the people in France.

8573. What is the profession of that gentleman?—He is a licensed victualler and an Englishman. It is a great house where the English people assemble in Calais called "The Dover Castle."

8574. Mr. Roebuck.] When you say that he is a licensed victualler, you do not mean that he is a licensed victualler in England, but that he keeps an hotel at Calais?—Yes.

8575. I understood you to say that, supposing persons were permitted to take out a six days' license, and were charged the same price for it as they now are for seven days, and that the price for the seven days' license was increased, the trade would very naturally object to that?—Yes.

8576. Would the trade also object if the price for the seven days' license were kept as it is, but at the same time it was permitted to those who thought fit to take out a license for six days at a lower price?—I am not aware what their opinions are upon that point; I have not ascertained.

8577. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Will you take that return in your hand, and look at it, and tell me which column refers to the number of cases of drunkenness (handing the same to the Witness)?—The first column in Sir Richard Mayne's table.

8578. Why not the second?—Because the first column is the number of cases of drunkenness only, and the second column is cases of drunkenness connected with crime or disorder.

8579. Are not they the most important?—Of course that ought to be taken into consideration in conjunction with the first column, certainly.

8580. Why did you leave that out in your statement to the committee?—I am not aware that I did; if I did it was not purposely done.

8581. I understood you, in your statement to the committee, to refer only to the first column, and you made a division of the cases with which, as I understood it, that first column agreed?—It was no intention of mine to omit the second column, if that was the honourable Member's understanding.

8582. I am not to understand you that that was purposely done?—No, it was not.

8583. What statement did you make; I do not wish to misrepresent you?—No; I hope not. I admit, and I think that ought to be sufficient, 0.69.

that the first and second columns ought to be taken into consideration.

8584. And if your previous evidence does not state that, it is inaccurate?—In that particular respect, not inaccurate, but certainly not stated.

8585. Does not the second column contain nearly twice as many as the first?—Yes; very nearly it does.

8586. It is the most important column of the two, is it not?—It ought to be taken into consideration in conjunction with the first.

8587. It is the most important column of the two, is it not?—There is no doubt it is an important column, and ought to be taken into consideration.

8588. Mr. Baines.] What is the total number of those two columns added together?—One thousand nine hundred and fourteen.

8589. The number of cases that you gave was 606?—Yes; for drunkenness only.

8590. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Will you have the goodness to explain to me why, in reference to the estimate of drunkenness, you leave out prostitutes and carters?—If we are to consider drunkenness only, of course we have the cases of drunkenness distinguished from those that are coupled with other offences; and if we must speak of drunkenness, we must speak of drunkenness only; but if we are to take into consideration crime and disorder, we are then considering not so much the question of drunkenness as we are considering the question of other offences.

8591. Do I understand you that you do not acknowledge or see the importance of drunkenness leading to crime?—I have very often seen that crime is sheltered by drunkenness; for instance, in cases of prostitution and thievery, and when all personal self-respect and character is lost, then they take to drink as a cloak for their vicious propensities.

8592. What you mean is that crime induces drunkenness, and not drunkenness increases crime?—I believe that, to a very great extent, crime is the cause of drink.

8593. Are you aware how much that opinion is in contradiction of what one might term the highest authorities in the kingdom—medical men, legal men, judges, and social reformers, who all seem to agree upon the fact that drunkenness induces crime?—I know that that has been said.

8594. But you do not think it is founded on fact?—I think to a very great extent it is correct; but I also think, on the other hand, that there is a very large percentage of society who indulge in drunkenness who have lost all character and personal respect, and take to drinking afterwards.

8595. May I again go back to the question, that I may understand you; you leave out prostitutes and carters, because you think that their tendencies lead them to drunkenness, and that it is not drunkenness which induces them to follow their courses?—To a very great extent.

8596. Why do you confine your observations to those two particular classes?—Because they are mentioned in the tables; both in the table of Captain Palin, and also in the table of Sir Richard Mayne.

8597. And you think those ought to be taken out?—No, I do not think they ought to be taken out, because there are cases where drunkenness creates disorder, and there are cases of simple drunkenness only.

8598. I think

Mr.
G. Candelet.

1868.

Mr. 8598. I think you stated, if I understood you
G. Candelel. a right, that there was a great difference in the 25 June returns in reference to the strictness of the mun-1868.icipal authorities in any particular place?—
 Yes.

8599. And that in Manchester the Watch Committee was favourable to a change of the law, and further restrictions on drinking, and therefore you thought that the strictness of the police might be relaxed?—I have been disposed to think often that the temper of the Watch Committee, and of course the exercise of the police authority, has been influenced by the state of public opinion at the time, because, in my long experience as a citizen of Manchester, and particularly as an officer connected with the trade, I have found that at some times the police have not taken much interest in drunken cases; but at other times they have been disposed to be very severe, and I have always noticed that the severity has been prompted apparently through the state of agitation in reference to Bills of this description.

8600. Then you think that public opinion is in favour of further restriction at Manchester?—No,
 I do not.

8601. How do you put the two things together?—I know that we have had a townsmeeting there, and that towns-meeting, presided over by the mayor, decided in favour of the Bill;
 but I also know that that public meeting consisted mainly of a mixture of over-zealous, religious people, and of teetotallers, and that a very large proportion of society, concerned in friendly societies, and who require and believe in the usefulness of the accommodation of public-houses, did not attend the meeting, and therefore that that meeting, to a very great extent, did not represent the state of public opinion in Manchester.

8602. I only ask you the question because you stated before that you thought public opinion influenced the Watch Committee?—Yes, that part of public opinion which is in favour of this measure.

8603. And that is not the majority?—That is not the majority.

8604. Do not you think that in a very large number of towns there may be also another cause at work in the other direction, namely, a negligence in the police to take up drunken people?—I am not aware of it.

8605. You think that there is a universal strictness?—I believe this, that it is very unwise, and a misapplication of the police power, to put them down exclusively upon publicans, and people who may at times be a little gay, and to withdraw their powers from the protection of life and property; I think that is the main object of the police force, and not to persecute and to punish a particular section of tradesmen, or to look after people when they reel along the street or are incapable of walking straight.

8606. You think that the duty of the police is not so much to look after drunken people as it is to protect person and property?—Yes, life and property.

8607. You do not think that there is negligence in reference to that at the present time, do you?—Yes; I think wherever the police are more stringently put down on the state of drunkenness and the conduct of public-houses, their usefulness is injured as regards the general protection of society.

8608. You stated that if this Bill passed into law, there would be a loss of 8,000 £. a year to the 5,430 people who compose your association?—
 Yes.

8609. What do you mean by that?—I mean that that represents one-seventh of the trade done through the week.

8610. Is that 8,000 £. the weekly loss or the annual loss?—It is the annual loss.

8611. Do you mean to tell me that the whole loss of those 5,430 publicans would be under 30 s. a head in a year?—Yes; I think it would be about that.

8612. Then why do you attach so much importance to it?—I am mistaken; this would be the weekly loss, not the annual one; so that I am obliged to the honourable Member for correcting me.

8613. Thirty shillings a week is not a very heavy loss, is it?—I think it is too much to sacrifice, considering that there has been no proportionate reduction in the rent charges and license duties.

8614. With regard to the past restrictions what do you think about them?—I think the past restrictions have operated very satisfactorily both to the trade and to the public; but I think, at the same time, that there must be a limit to those restrictions; at all events, it seems to be in advance of public opinion to impose restrictions at the present time.

8615. You think public opinion does not second the movement?—No, I think not.

8616. You said a good deal about the petitions in favour of the Bill, and you attribute the number of signatures to the expenditure of the Alliance?—Yes.

8617. Do you know that the Alliance have ever spent one shilling in reference to petitions?
 —I did not mention the Alliance; I mentioned the promoters. I beg your pardon; I did not say the Alliance.

8618. But you said some society?—Yes; the society for the promotion of this Bill.

8619. Where is that society; I understood you to mean the Alliance?—I did not mention the Alliance.

8620. I understood you to say that there were large funds expended by some society, and I thought you meant the Alliance; whom did you mean?—The Central Association for the Promotion of Sunday Closing.

8621. Do you know as a fact that they have ever spent a shilling upon it?—They must have done.

8622. But do you know it; is there any statement in their accounts about it?—I take it for granted that they have spent a large sum of money. I have seen announced, in the public papers subscriptions which have been received for the purpose of promoting the agitation.

8623. I should like to know what society it is, for I do not know it myself?—The London Association for Stopping the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday, 14, Salisbury-square, E.C., London, July 10th.

8624. Then it is those who you think have spent money?—The association for stopping the sale of liquors on Sunday.

8625. Do you know what funds they have received?—No; I do not know anything at all about their finances; and if I knew less about their opinions, I should, perhaps, be no worse for it.

8626. May I ask you, with reference to your acquaintance with Mr. Berkeley, and your statement that it is a slander to attribute the memorial to him to the publicans; you say that not true?—I do say so.

8627-8. Was there a meeting in February 1856, at which you yourself made this statement, Mr. Candelet proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Henry Berkeley, M.P., for his exertions during the late Session of Parliament, and pledging this association to promote the testimonial to be offered to that Honourable Gentlemen. Mr. Atkinson seconded the motion, and it was carried unanimously. Mr. Harris added that he had used every exertion to promote that object, and he hoped not without success. He had taken the Surrey Theatre for the 19th February, and hoped to clear at least 50 l. or 100 l., all of which he should hand over to the committee, to increase the amount:—is that an accurate statement?—That is an accurate statement, but I do not see that that statement goes to prove the inaccuracy of the statement which I have made. The inscription upon the testimonial, which has been read to this Committee, goes to prove that it was presented by 14,000 Englishmen of all classes; that is the inscription.

8629. I do not dispute that, but I am only asking you as to that which appears to me inconsistent, that you here call upon the publicans to do this, and then you deny that they have had anything to do with it?—No; I do not deny that. The publicans, as part of the general public, might have contributed towards it, but that that testimonial was exclusively and entirely promoted by the publicans is not true.

8630. What was the memorial?—The memorial consisted of 1,012 l.

8631. In what form was it; was it all in money?—A silver salver and a roll of parchment, upon which was inscribed the name and address of every subscriber.

8632. What was the amount of the subscription?—£ 1,012.

8633. And part of that was employed in the purchase of a salver, was it?—No, in addition to the 1,012 l. in money, there was a silver salver.

8634. I have before me a newspaper of September 1861, in which you are represented to have said that the licensed victuallers must have their interest and property represented in the House of Commons "independent of politics, for they knew no politics in the matter, that their bread and cheese was at stake;" is that the motive and object which you have now in the evidence which you give?—I am not aware that the object of this Committee is to inquire into political sentiments.

8635. Did you say that this was for you a bread and cheese matter?—Yes; and I think if the speech is rightly reported, if you read on, you will find that I assign as a reason that we are obliged to assume this in consequence of the promoters of this Bill, and of the Permissive Bill, declaring that they will sink politics, and we are obliged to adopt counter action; I do not know what paper you are reading from; perhaps it is an ex parte statement, that has no sympathy with me or my friends.

8636. I do not know what the comments are, because I have not looked at them, but I am taking an extract from a speech of yours?—Is that in the "Alliance" newspaper? If so, I don't recognise the report of any speech of mine in the columns of that paper.

8637. Yes; but is it the fact that you look at those things without reference to anything else than its being a bread-and-cheese question for the publicans?—We have been obliged to do so through the action which has been taken by our opponents.

8638. Do not you think that that affects your opinion with reference to the social and moral effects of such a Bill as is now before the Committee?—I do not think it does.

8639. May I ask you whether you have seen any of the witnesses who have been called against this Bill before the Committee before they were examined?—I am not aware that I have.

8640. Or after?—Of course I have after.

8641. Have any of them been paid by you?—Certainly not.

8642. Or by your association?—Certainly not.

8643. Have you never heard that?—No.

8644. Have not you heard anybody state that?—Certainly not.

8645. With regard to petitions, you do not, yourself, know anything implying dishonesty or unfairness in the getting up of the petitions, in favour of the Bill?—I do not know that I could make any statement disparaging the character of the petitions beyond what I have seen in the Report of the Public Petition Committee, that the signatures were not in the handwriting of many of those who seemed to have signed them.

8646. With regard to friendly societies, do you think that the convenience of the officers of friendly societies is an adequate motive against legislation with reference to drinking and drunkenness?—It is one of the reasons which ought to be brought under the notice of this Committee, that what I conceive to be very useful institutions as a relief to the parish, should not be damaged by any such legislation as this.

8647. Have there not been in many cases rooms taken for those institutions?—Yes.

8648. Do not you pay the publican?—No.

8649. How does he get his profit out of it?—He gets his profit from the profit on the liquor sold, not on that particular day, but that it is a part of the connection connected with his establishment.

8650. I am not fortunate enough yet to catch your meaning. There is a certain amount of trouble, and those people use his house, and his room for a particular purpose, and he must find his interest in it somehow or other?—He is not paid directly; he may be paid through his business transactions.

8651. But do you think that he is paid by the consumption of beer?—Of course, he must be paid through the general consumption of the article which he sells.

8652. Is not that in direct opposition to the principle and spirit of friendly societies?—I cannot understand it in that form. Friendly societies have prospered and grown to an immense magnitude in this country: they originated in public-houses, and have been nursed in public-houses; certainly it is one thing to remove them from public-houses; but I think care ought to be exercised that no legislation such as this is permitted to damage them.

8653. Do you really believe that a Bill restricting drinking in public-houses on Sunday would would injure friendly societies?—Yes; thousands of them. There are a perfect network in Lancashire; they may be unknown to gentlemen representing southern constituencies, but they are well known to many gentlemen on this Committee, and in this House, to form a perfect network; and the constitution and the objects of those societies, and how they would be affected, are perfectly well understood to a large number of gentlemen who represent constituencies in various parts of Lancashire, and therefore it is one of the reasons, I conceive, which ought to be brought under the notice of this Committee, why this Bill should not pass.

8654. And you think that Mr. Tidd Pratt's advice against meeting in public-houses implies ignorance on his part of the conditions and circumstances connected with these societies?—I do.

8655. Do not you consider that the bonâ fide traveller question is settled?—No; there has been no case before any of the superior courts where a decision has been given that has yet been uniformly acted upon by the local authorities.

8656. When did you last know any case with regard to the bonâ fide traveller?—I believe it was the Worcester case, before Lord Chief Justice Erle.

8657. How long ago was that?—Perhaps two years ago.

8658. Is not that considered to have settled the question?—No.

8659. But is it not so considered?—No; we have the question up frequently. That case is cited very often; but it does not guide the magistrates.

8660. Has there been any case before the magistrates upon the bonâ fide traveller clause since that?—There has; but I could not give you the case from memory.

8661. They do not consider that as guiding their decision?—They take it into consideration; but in some districts, now as at all times, in my experience, the local authorities will not be guided by any particular decision which has been given by the judge; they take their own view of it; and the trade is still in an unsettled state with reference to that particular point.

8662. You cannot give me any instance where there has been a decision in the face of that case?—I cannot, from memory.

8663. You stated a very satisfactory fact, as regards the increase of newspapers and periodical publications in Manchester since the year 1831; can you give us the increase of public-houses and beer-shops in that time?—I can give you the relative number of licensed victuallers and beer-houses from 1843 down to 1868. In 1843 we had 502 licensed victuallers and 781 beer-sellers. In 1844 we had 490 licensed victuallers and 850 beer-houses. In 1845 we had 482 licensed victuallers and 1,006 beer-houses. In 1846 we had 487 licensed victuallers and 1,089 beer-houses. In 1847 we had 482 licensed victuallers and 1,000 beer-houses. In 1868 we had 485 licensed victuallers and 2,017 beer-houses. We had, in 1863, 17 licensed victuallers less, although the population has doubled itself, than we had in 1843; that is 25 years ago.

8664. You have got 2,000 beer-houses?—Yes, the present population is 380,000. I should think, since 1843 up to 1868, we have doubled ourselves; but the licensed victuallers are 17 less in number than they were 25 years ago.

8665. Mr. Baines.] You are not speaking from authority, are you, as to the population doubling in that time?—Not as regards the population.

8666. Mr. John Abel Smith.] But there has been a very large increase in the number of beer-houses?—Yes; in 1843 there were 781, and now there are 2,017.

8667. Then there has been a still greater increase in the number of drinking houses than in the means of the education of the people?—No, I do not think there has; if you fairly compare the state of matters as regards the state of general education, I think that we are in a far better position as regards the state of the public mind and their health and their habits, compared with what we were 25 years ago.

8668. I do not dispute that; I will quite admit it, if you like; but then you have also a great increase in the means and temptations to drinking?—We have, as far as beer-houses are concerned.

8669. Are they not temptations?—I should not like to enter into the question of beer-houses at all; I simply give you the figures.

8670. Beer-houses, you think, do much more mischief than public-houses?—I do not know anything at all about beer-houses; I am connected with the licensed victuallers.

8671. You will not tell me what you think about the effect of beer-houses?—My official connection is with the licensed victuallers; I simply know the figures: perhaps I may be allowed to hand those figures in (giving in the same.)

8672. Do you know how many offences against the law were committed in Manchester by beer-houses and licensed victuallers last year, 1867?—I have not looked at the local records.

8673. Is your time given up to the performance of your duties as secretary for those 5,340 publicans?—Yes, exclusively in conjunction with the local society, the Manchester and Salford Association.

8674. Have you never turned your attention to the connection between crime and drinking?—No.

8675. Mr. Baines.] You stated, did you not, that the number of petitions against the Bill was greater than the number in favour of the Bill?—In the last Report that I saw from the Public Petitions Committee it was so.

8676. Will you have the goodness just to attend to the figures which I will read from the last Report of all that has been issued, the 27th Report, bearing date the 15th and 16th of June; and first I will read to you the number of petitions in favour of the total prohibition of the sale of liquors on Sunday, and then the number in favour of this Bill, which is not for total prohibition of the sale of liquors on Sunday?—Might I say that my statement is based upon the petitions which were presented to Parliament in favour of the Honourable Member's Bill.

8677. Now take my statement; you may put down the number of petitions for total prohibition of the sale of liquor on Sunday as 820, and the signatures 156,183; and for this Bill upon which we are now engaged, the number of petitions is 3,653, and the number of signatures 330,554, if you add those together, you will find the total to be 4,473 petitions, and 486,737 signatures; then the number of petitions against the Sunday Liquor Bill

3, and the signatures 476,942. You have before for the comparison as to the number of petitions, a total of 4,473 petitions either in favour of the Sunday Liquor Bill, or for proving the sale altogether on the Sunday, and have only 583 petitions against the Sunday Liquor Bill; are there not nearly eight times as many petitions for prohibition, either total or partial as there are against the Bill?—Yes; there is no doubt of it.

678. I want to know whether 486,737 is not at least 10,000 more signatures than those against the Sunday Liquor Bill?—It is so, if you couple the two classes of petitions.

679. Is it not a mistake to suppose that the number of petitions against the measure is anything approaching to the number of petitions in favour of the measure?—That is so.

680. Is it not also a mistake to suppose that the number of signatures against the Bill is equal to number of signatures in favour, either of the Bill or of prohibition?—Yes; that is so.

681. Is not the Bill a less measure of restriction than total prohibition would be?—Virtually, it amounts to the same.

682. If it allows the public-houses to be open to the sale of liquor for four hours in the day, is it not a less restriction than the total prohibition of all sale; that makes a material difference, does it not?—There are very few licensed victuallers who would keep their houses open.

683. It is a much less measure of restriction than total prohibition, is it not?—Yes.

684. I want to know also, whether the very great diffusion over all the counties of England and Wales of those 4,473 petitions would not naturally imply a more extensive feeling than the 583 petitions which have been got up against the Bill?—Yes.

685. Are not the petitions that have been got up against the Bill got up by parties who have a direct pecuniary interest and strong feeling against the Bill, whilst the petitions which have been got up in favour of the Bill by persons who can have no motive but public benevolence, and a desire for public virtue?—No; my answer is that with regard to the licensed victuallers, who have petitioned against this Bill, although engaged in a particular trade, whose interests are presumed to be affected by it, that is the sole motive.

686. What is the other motive?—They themselves form a portion of the public, and not very frequently they themselves require some accommodation on the Sunday, when away from home, as the public who use their own establishments do; but I do not see that the licensed victuallers should be deterred from taking action against a measure of this description for fear of being charge of being actuated by self-interested motives.

687. Nor do I; and I did not mean to imply that; and knowing that there are so many licensed victuallers of most respectable character, I should be very sorry to imply any such thing; the question I asked you was, whether there was not in the one case a strong pecuniary interest, whereas in the other case there was no pecuniary interest at all?—I admit that there is no pecuniary interest, but there is a justification for it.

688. With regard to friendly societies, if the wages are paid on Saturday or Friday, or some other day of the week, why cannot the funds be distributed on one of those days, instead of being reserved to be distributed on Sunday?—I should say, in reply to that, that any gentleman who has any knowledge of the state of confinement connected with factory labour, must know that those societies, both as regards the managers and as regards the members, are confined all day long, from Monday morning till Saturday at noon, in workshops. If you take a large town, like Stockport, or Manchester, or Ashton, or Staleybridge, or Preston, or any of those large towns, those societies are divided into districts, and they are obliged to limit those districts; and although the money is collected on the Sunday, they start from home at nine in the morning to collect the halfpence and pence for provident purposes; it takes them the whole day till six or seven at night; and they meet in the evening, surrender their cash, and make up their books; but on any other day it seems to me to be very inconvenient, because the collectors in their various districts could not be at each house at one and the same time. The inmates are only to be met with during meals. If some plan could be propounded to carry out the idea of getting the money to be collected on some other day of the week. I do not mean to say that it is not necessary, or that it would not be useful, but what I wish to put forth is this: that at present, in the absence of any such means as this, the present Bill would certainly interfere with their management, and impair their usefulness.

689. At what hours did factories use to close when you were a lad?—Eight at night.

690. At what hour did they close on Saturday?—On Saturday at about four o'clock in the afternoon.

691. At what time do they close now?—At one o'clock.

692. Were they formerly open only till four; do not you recollect when they were open later than four on the afternoon of Saturday?—Yes; six o'clock, I should think.

693. There now is really a substantial and important difference on the Saturday afternoon, and a gain to the working man, which I dare say, you and I both think a very great gain of five hours' valuable time?—No doubt.

694. Do not you think, from your knowledge of the whole of the officers connected with those societies, connected with the fact that the wages are paid on Saturday, that it would be possible and advantageous that you should go immediately and get the money from either the husband or the wife, as soon as the wages are paid, and thus be able to do away with Sunday labour altogether?—My answer to that is this: that the working men and women, and a great deal of female labour is used in cotton mills, begin at six o'clock on Monday morning, and finish at six every evening up to Friday evening, and when they have gone through the monotonous routine and close confinement of five or six days' excessive labour, in a heated atmosphere, amidst the din and noise of machinery, there is very little disposition, on Saturday afternoon, to take part in the working of friendly societies. That afternoon is used for domestic purposes, for market purposes, and availing themselves of cheap excursions 20, 30, or even 50 miles round Manchester; that is the only answer that I can give.

Mr.
G. Candeleet.

8695. Are you not aware that in France, to which you have alluded, and from which you have read a letter, not only are the public-houses open on Sunday, but that all the theatres, and circuses, and exhibitions of the highest kind are open also on Sunday evening, and that that is the main evening for amusements of every description?—Yes; if you will permit me, in conjunction with that, I should like to add that I should not like to see introduced into this county, as regards trade on the Sunday, what I saw in France. I saw the shops open, and I knew that places of amusement were also open; and that is a mode of observing the Sunday which I should certainly not like to see introduced into this country.

8696. I am very glad to hear your reply, and I have no doubt of the perfect accuracy of it; but I want to know if, from your observation, I am not justified in saying that, to a great extent, the Sunday in Paris and France generally is divided between labour in the morning and pleasure in the afternoon?—Yes; there is some of that certainly.

8697. Are not the liquors which are drunk in France of a very much less intoxicating character; generally very light wines, almost of a vinegary character, and very much less likely to intoxicate than the beer and malt liquor generally of England?—I may say, in reply to that, that the prevailing beverage in England is beer; that is the principal article of consumption.

8698. Is not that much more intoxicating than the light wines of France?—There is a tendency to adopt the use of light wines in England.

8699. But it has not come in much, has it?—Yes; but I would rather see the consumption of light liquors encouraged in this country than such restrictions as are contained in this Bill.

8700. Do you think that there is much light wine sold in public-houses and beer-houses in England?—Yes, I do.

8701. Do you think that it is gaining ground?—Yes, I do think so.

8702. Do you think that it bears any considerable proportion to the amount of beer and ale that are drunk here?—I do not think that it does; not at present; still it is gaining ground.

8703. With regard to Manchester, you have stated some most gratifying facts with regard to the vast increase in the number of newspapers, libraries, schools of art, reading-rooms, and so on; do you ascribe to those things all the social and moral improvement which you conceive generally has taken place in Manchester?—Yes.

8704. Do not you think that the temperance societies which have existed there have done a good deal towards it also?—I believe that temperance societies, so long as they confine themselves to moral suasion, do a vast amount of good; there are some very intelligent men amongst them; but resorting to the Legislature displays an amount of impatience which I think at the same time indicates a weakness in the power of their own arguments.

8705. Do not you think that they have had a very considerable influence in diminishing the amount of drunkenness, if it has been diminished, or at least in preventing the increase of drunkenness?—Yes.

8706. But notwithstanding that, the figures that you have given us, I think, prove a very large increase in the number of beer-houses in Manchester; nearly three-fold?—Yes.

8708. That has gone on, notwithstanding the great social and moral improvement, and notwithstanding this temperance movement in Manchester; does not that rather prove a power, was going to say, of temptation in those drinking-houses, which it is rather desirable to have than otherwise?—Yes; but I respectfully submit this: would it not be better to adopt the same principle of granting beer-licenses as that which is resorted to for granting licenses to licensed victuallers?

8709. I entirely agree with you; I think that you are quite correct in that view; but I have one more question to ask you; we have had the number of cases of drunkenness mentioned, but are you not aware that there is a prodigious greater number of cases of drunkenness than those that are brought up to the police courts; that a great number of persons go home who are what is termed “half-sober,” or in a state not very fit for a man to be in, certainly; do not you think that there is really a much greater number of cases of drunkenness than that which appears upon the face of official returns?—With reference to that, perhaps the Committee will remember, that in 1860 there was a supplementary Budget brought forward for an increase in the spirit duties, from 8s. 1d. per gallon on British and Colonial spirits to 10s. 1d. per gallon, in order to meet the expenses consequent upon the Chinese war. If we take the three years in Captain Palin’s statistics prior to that date, and the three years afterwards, although the latter three years were the three years of the cotton famine, there was more drunkenness than there was when the spirit duty was 8s. 1d. per gallon, although the people had less means to buy it with; and if we look at the returns of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, at the same time drunkenness was increasing, as shown in the statistics of Captain Palin, the Commission showed a decrease in the consumption of liquor.

8710. How do you account for that?—I really cannot account for it.

8711. Is it not to be accounted for in this way by supposing there to have been an adulteration of the liquor; I do not say in public-houses, do not speak of licensed victuallers, but in private houses?—If I might assign a reason at all, the best reason which at present I could assign it would be this: that if there was more drunkenness, as shown by the police tables, it arose from the fact that the people were drinking not only paid spirits, but spirits that had escaped the excise man.

8712. Do you think that there is much proof or any proof at all, of illicit distillation going on in England?—We are told by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue that illicit distillation is increasing; but illicit distillation and private drinking are two separate and distinct matters.

8713. Are you aware that the gentleman who stands in the same position to the publicans in Birmingham and the neighbouring towns, as you stand with regard to the publicans of Manchester and the neighbouring towns, has told the Committee that there is a great deal of bribing and corrupting of the police on the Sunday by those who keep either public-houses or beer-houses, and that, therefore, many transgressions of the law are winked at?—Yes, I am aware that that is the statement.

ment was made, but I do not concur in it. I have a higher opinion of the impartiality and the moral character of the police force of this country. I think that they would not, as a rule, give up to a mere paltry bribe for the purpose of encouraging the consumption of drink in prohibited hours.

8714. You would not doubt that that gentleman to whom I have referred, as far as his own experience goes, speaks what he knows to be the truth, because he himself was in the trade for many years?—No; certainly not.

8715. But you do not think that that applies to your part of the country?—I do not think it does.

8716. Mr. Locke.] I see that against the Sale of Liquors on Sunday Bill there are 34 petitions, signed officially or under seal; and, altogether, 3 petitions, and the number of signatures is 6,942; is that so?—Yes.

8717. Then, in favour of the Bill, there are petitions under this head, "signed officially or under seal," and 3,653 is the total number, and there are 330,554 signatures; therefore there is a difference between those two numbers, the number of petitions in favour, and the petitions against the Bill?—Yes.

8718. The Honourable Member for Leeds makes the petitions for prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday; there are 46 officially signed petitions, and the total number of petitions is 820; and then he says there are 56,183, the total number of signatures, as against those petitions; of course, nobody would send in petitions in opposition to a vague set of petitions like these, for prohibiting the sale on Sunday?—No.

8719. Would it be probable that any class of people would petition against that?—No, certainly not.

8720. But when the Bill is actually brought into Parliament, the number of petitions against the Bill is, certainly, greatly more numerous than those in favour of it?—Quite so.

8721. With regard to the petitions for prohibiting the sale on Sunday, and the petitions in favour of the Bill, is there any difficulty, or any impropriety, in the same persons who are in favour of this Bill signing both those petitions?—Not at all; I have no doubt that it is very frequently done.

8722. Mr. Baines.] Have you any information upon that subject?—I have no positive information.

8723. Mr. Locke.] Have we not had it over and over again before this Committee, that the persons who have come forward say that they are in favour of this Bill, and that they take it as an instalment, but that they would prefer a Bill for the total closing?—Yes.

8724. Therefore is there any improbability that such a person would sign both petitions?—Not at all.

8725. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you know anything about it?—I give you my opinion.

8726. I do not want your opinion. I ask you whether you know anything about it?—I do not, not positively; there is no improbability in it.

8727. Mr. Frederick Stanley.] In answer to an early question of mine, as to the loss which would possibly be upon the plant, so to speak of the licensed victuallers, you stated that the annual loss to the 5,430 persons whom you represent would probably be about 8,000 l.; but, as I understand, you have corrected that statement; you meant their weekly loss?—Yes; that would be their weekly loss.

8728. That would amount to 416,000 l. a-year, would it not, at 8,000 l. a-week?—Yes.

8729. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] I think you omitted to observe a little word in one of the questions put by the Honourable Member for Chichester; he asked you whether this was only a bread-and-cheese question with the publicans, and you answered that it was so; but is it not a fact that although the publicans may consider this as a bread-and-cheese question, yet they are also, perhaps, mainly actuated in their opposition to this Bill by the sense, which is daily forced upon them by their customers and others, that it would operate very much in an antagonistic manner to public convenience?—Quite so.

8730. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Do you mean that the Committee should understand that the opposition of the publicans to my Bill is mainly founded upon the convenience of the public?—No, not mainly.

8731. But mainly upon their own interest?—Yes.

8732. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.] Is it not a necessity of the publicans' business that they must consult the convenience of the public, and be a great deal guided by it?—Yes, most decidedly.

8733. With regard to interested motives, may not a person who is actuated by the best moral motives be also induced by the force of those motives upon his mind to over zeal in getting up petitions?—Quite so.

ARTHUR JAMES JOHNES, Esq., called in; and Examined.

8734. Mr. John Abel Smith.] ARE you a Member of the Bar, and have you been for 20 years Judge of the Midland Wales County Courts?—Yes.

8735. Are you the author of several works, especially of a Prize Essay upon the Causes of Dissent in Wales?—Yes.

8736. Are you intimately acquainted with the language, habits, and history of the Welsh people?—Yes.

8737. Have you acted as judge in the counties of Anglesea, Carnarvon, and Merioneth, together with Montgomeryshire, Radnorshire, Brecknockshire, Herefordshire, and Shropshire?—Yes.

8738. Has that given you large opportunities of noticing the effects of drinking and drunkenness in about one-half of the Principality?—More than one-half; I have sat as county judge in nearly every county of Wales, in parts of several counties, and in many entire counties, because my circuit has been changed, and therefore I have acted in different districts at different times.

8739. Are you aware that a very large proportion of the defendants sued for debts before you owe their difficulties to the effects of drinking and drunkenness?—Undoubtedly to drinking in public-houses; in many districts more than half, I should say, those whose debts are undisputed.

8740. Have

A. J. Johnes,
Esq.

A. J. Johns,
Esq.
1868.

8740. Have you any particular knowledge of that fact with reference to the Bangor district?—Yes; the high bailiff of the Bangor district, who is a very experienced man, thinks that the largest portion of undisputed debts which are sued for in that court are owing to drunkenness, drinking in taverns; and he has held the office 15 years.

8742. Is it also true that drinking and drunkenness is the cause of almost all cases of that sort?—I cannot recall a case of assault that did not arise from drinking in a tavern or a public-house. There may have been some that have escaped my recollection, but I do not think so. I think that the cause is this, that in the present day there are few people who would think of committing an assault unless they were drunk. If a man is aggrieved, he will usually bring an action, but if he is drunk he will commit an assault, which sometimes ends in murder, and those are all tavern squabbles.

8743. I think you have published letters addressed to Mr. Ribton Turner, the secretary to the conference of which Lord Shaftesbury was chairman in 1867, in which you strongly advocate the closing of all public-houses, as regards drinking on the premises, either during the week-days or Sunday?—Yes, that is my opinion; that an end should be put altogether to drinking on the premises; that is to say, social drinking, where people are urged on by the landlord to drink more and more for his own interest, whereby and by getting into jovial company, men are drawn on to drunkenness.

8744. Would not putting an end to drinking on the premises be a solution of this difficult question?—Yes, I think that drunkenness would cease altogether if drinking on the premises were put an end to. Of course there might be cases of drunkenness here and there; but that is my opinion. I am certain that it is so, with regard to the inhabitants of those districts with which I am best acquainted. I myself hardly ever knew of a poor man getting tipsy except in a tavern. If you shut the taverns you stop drinking. That has been proved upon Lord Penrhyn's estate, who has put down the taverns, and drunkenness has almost entirely ceased in that district.

8745. Although your opinions go to a much greater length than those who have advocated the Bill before this Committee, you still are in favour of the Preamble, and give your hearty support to the Bill?—I am in favour of any restriction as an advance. I have heard an Honourable Member refer to this as an instalment. Very well, it is an instalment; but I should wish no further restriction, unless the public mind were prepared for it. It would be a useless folly to wish it. But I am merely asked my private opinion, and I give it.

8746. Do you believe that increased restriction would promote the increase of secret drinking?—No, I do not believe that at all. If drinking on the premises were put an end to, there would be no secret drinking. I have known that from the experience of the parishes within a short distance of my home, where, by the energetic exertions of temperance societies, the people have become temperate, and the taverns have been got rid of in that way, by a kind of moral suasion. And, in another instance, a landlord, proprietor, Lord Penrhyn, has put them down himself, by exercising his own rights. In neither of those cases have I ever heard of any secret drinking, and I do not believe that it occurs. The only way in which drinking occurs on the part of the inhabitants of those parishes is, when the people go to fairs and markets where there are taverns, they go into the public-houses, and become excited with drink.

8748. Although you advocate such extensive measures as those which in your opinion would be advantageous, still you would admit such an amendment of the law as is now proposed, and you think that it would probably be useful?—In a free country, I think, a man must be insane if he tries to obtain improvements upon which his own mind is set unless public opinion would go with him. I merely express my own private opinion. There are many gentlemen who are for entire prohibition; and I am not sure but what I may come to the conclusion that entire prohibition is right. But my impression at present is, that it is not necessary; that if you allow people to use wine and spirits at home there would be no drunkenness. Perhaps it may be injurious to the health of the people, but there would be no drunkenness. I do not see that the State can interfere with that; but it should interfere to put down drunkenness, and I think that it would be put down by prohibiting drinking on the premises.

8749. You think that the Legislature ought to encourage the union, instead of the separation of families, which arises from their opening of 160,000 drinking places on Sunday?—My general opinion is, and I have already expressed my general opinion, that the remedy for the evil of suppressing drinking on the premises, which is a less extensive measure than those measures which were adopted by the late Prince Consort, and Lord Palmerston, and Lord Penrhyn, namely, suppressing taverns altogether. To close them for drinking on the premises is a more lenient measure than to suppress them.

8750. Under Lord Westbury's Act of 1861 jurisdiction was given to you as a county court judge in bankruptcy?—Yes.

8751. Have you turned your attention to the effect of drinking upon bankruptcy?—Yes, I have. I am exceedingly sorry that, owing to extreme illness, from which I am not free yet, I have not had time to get together all those statistical details that I could have wished, because I had no anticipation that I should be examined before this Committee. But still I have addressed a circular letter to my registrars and high bailiffs, and, in order that the Committee may understand that letter, I ought to state that I have 16 court towns and a very large district to travel over and in each of those court towns there are officers, called registrars, whose duty it is to enter plaints, to receive money from defendants, and afterwards to pay it over to the plaintiff, and to take the minutes of the court. Those officers must all be solicitors of respectability, and are appointed by the judge, and the appointments are subject to the revision of the Lord Chancellor. After the time that I had an intimation that I was to be examined by this Committee, which, I am sorry to say, has been a great infliction to me, although I feel very strongly my own opinion upon this particular question, I addressed a letter to those gentlemen, most of whom had been appointed by myself, and most of whom are experienced men. The result of their returns is that, in their opinion, about one-fourth of the cases of bankruptcy in the county courts have arisen from drunkenness, and another fourth in part measure, from drunkenness, and tippling, and the remainder from other causes; that is to say, that one-half of the cases of bankruptcy in the county courts have arisen wholly from drinking, or in part from drinking.

752. It has been suggested to me, that I am informing you upon the general effect of drink-houses rather than upon the Sunday drinking, which is the measure referred to this Committee; will you confine your observations to that subject?—I wish to make one remark; I use this observation perhaps may mislead the Committee with regard to my views about bankruptcy being caused by drunkenness. The cases in the county court are cases where the debts do not exceed 300*l*. In cases where the debts are large, I should think that drinking would have less to do with it, and it would then be taken from rash speculation, or something of that description more commonly.

753. You must have ample means of knowing the wishes and wants of the working men themselves in reference to further restriction?—Certainly, in the principality; I cannot speak of any district except that which I know; of course, any opinions I may express may be quite different from those of persons who are acquainted with other districts in the kingdom. But I am certain that there is scarcely a working man throughout North Wales, and as I believe, throughout South Wales, that is not in favour of the Bill, or of entire closing; and I am quite prepared, if I am asked, to give my reasons for that opinion.

754. Will you be so good as to do so?—I have been very much pressed to give evidence upon the Bill by several gentlemen who take a very great interest in the cause of temperance, and my reply was, that it was a subject upon which there were many persons who had had a much longer and longer experience than myself, and I did not see what value this Committee could attach to my opinion, though it might possibly be quite right. That the only way I could aid would be by presenting to them a well authenticated proof of the real opinions of the country, particularly of the working classes, and I pressed an intimation to some of the friends of the day closing in North and South Wales, that I would state the public sentiment to the Committee, if they would give me the means of doing in such a shape that I could really vouch for the expression of opinion. What I required was; I saw that many canvasses had been taken in, and that many of them, perhaps, were untrustworthy, and I required as a condition of my giving evidence before this Committee (and of course I am compelled so to do), that the views of a great number of places should be declared, those of every parish, or of as many parishes as might be reasonably accepted, as a standard of the general sentiment of the country. And, in my own judgment, a few examples from each neighbourhood afford as good a test on the subject as if you had returns from every parish. This condition was complied with. In all the principal towns of North Wales, and, I believe, of South Wales, a canvasser was selected who was either known to myself personally, or who was a man who held some public office, or who was a person of unquestionable respectability, and he was made answerable for the canvass. Under him there were employed by him, according to his own judgment, a certain number of other persons to assist in this canvass. The course pursued was to leave a certain ticket at each house, and those tickets were called for the next day. I have seen many of those returns, which, in my own mind, I have not the slightest doubt were perfectly authentic, and perfectly correct returns of the opinions of the inhabitants. But the summons which I have received to give evidence was so sudden at last, that I could not arrange or compile them, and I could not see them all. But during the few moments that I could spare on the half-day before I left home, I managed to arrange together what I consider a very fair specimen of those opinions, and I am as certain as I can be of anything, depending upon the word and authority of others, that the returns are perfectly correct. I have in my hand a return of that description from 11 towns in North Wales and three towns in South Wales. One of the returns is from the town of Aberystwith, where the number of inhabited houses is 1,545; number of replies "Yes," 1,477; "Noes," 12; then there is a column for those who "did not vote, owing to absence, loss of voting papers, neutrality," &c., amounting to 56; I may say that only householders signed. The chief canvasser in that case was Mr. John Williams, a draper, and secretary to the Life Boat Association. This is a town where I have been county court judge for 21 years, and I know that gentleman to be a man of the greatest respectability; I know also that the persons who assisted him in the canvass were persons whose respectability is beyond all reproach. This canvass was on the subject of closing generally. I do not know exactly what the form of schedule at Aberystwith was, but the schedules were different in different places; some were for Sunday closing generally, and some were for Sunday closing according to Mr. Abel Smith's Bill. But the opinion generally was for closing altogether; and there were very few who would prefer the present Bill to closing altogether on Sunday.

8755. Mr. Locke.] Was it for closing every day in the week?—There was no question as to closing every day in the week; that was merely my own expression of opinion. I may hand in this return as a specimen of the rest, and the Committee will observe that at Llanfyllin, the canvassers were the clergyman of the parish who is also rural dean and a man of the highest character, and Mr. Jones, a draper. I will hand in this as a summary of the whole (handing in the same). I thought that the most important thing was to show the number of houses and the number of persons who said "Yes" out of the inhabitants of those houses, and the results generally show nine-tenths in favour, or, I may say, 14 out of 15, an enormous proportion in every instance.

8756. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Has the question of the unfairness of further restriction been brought before the people of Wales with reference to the gentlemen's clubs, which are kept open on Sunday?—Yes; but that question was never raised by the working man. I am told by all those canvassers that the working men are universally for closing altogether on Sunday.

8757. They do not consider that argument worthy of their attention?—No. The universal belief is that it will save them from great temptation, particularly on the part of men of intemperate habits. I have never heard of working men speaking of the clubs of the higher classes.

8758. Do you think it the duty of the Legislature to attend to, and to encourage the wishes of the people with reference to Sunday closing?—Of course, my own opinion has been in accordance with that. I do think so; I may, of course, be wrong in that opinion.

8759. In Bala, the district registrar testifies that Sunday drinking was almost unknown in that district until eight or 10 years ago; is that true?—Yes, I believe so. I have no authority for it except himself, but he is a very respectable man.

8760. And that Sunday drinking has increased, and is increasing seriously, as shown by the cases of the defendants during last year; do you know what the cause of that was?—It was this. Some time ago, all the publicans in the district signed an agreement that they would not sell liquor at all upon Sunday; some of them have died, or gone away, and their licenses have passed into other hands, and the new comers have opened the public-houses on Sundays which has led to fresh drinking.

8761. Do you not find that the temptations offered by public-houses, neutralise altogether the efforts of those who are making exertions to diminish drunkenness?—I should be very far from saying that they neutralise them altogether. I should say that it is a sort of drawn battle. The country would be in a dreadful state but for the exertions of those who use moral suasion to stop drinking. But if you close the public-houses, as is shown in the instances which I have mentioned, it does more than all the moral suasion in the world; it puts an end to it at once.

8762. Let me ask you to attend to me while I try to give a summary of what I conceive to be the opinion which you wish to express before this Committee: that the study and business of your life has tended to make you intimately acquainted both with the condition and the feelings of the population of North Wales; that you have taken all possible means in your power to learn the present feeling of the population of that district; and that you confidently believe that that feeling amongst the working men is all but unanimous in favour of increased restriction upon Sunday drinking?—My opinions are formed much less upon my own immediate observation than upon those returns. I may say that I did not expect, and I was not prepared for, such unanimity among the working classes upon the subject. But these returns I can implicitly rely upon, for this reason, that if there has been some mistake or some indiscretion on the part of some individual canvasser, it cannot affect the general result, because the individuals who have conducted this canvass are either persons whom I know personally, or they are persons whose character I have the means of sifting and testing through my personal friends; and I know that a great number of canvassers have been employed, and that every pains has been taken to select respectable men.

8763. You believe that the canvassers give a fair picture of the state of opinion in North Wales, and you believe that the same opinion exists in South Wales?—I should say so, from the returns that I received; but I have not the same means of testing them in South Wales as I have in North Wales.

8764. Has there not been a very remarkable instance in the slate quarries of Festiniog of the feeling of the people in favour of Sunday closing?—Yes; I had Festiniog in my mind. Out of 1,270 householders, 1,260 voted for Sunday closing; nearly all persons employed in the quarries, and almost all labouring men.

8765. With regard to the effect of saving the expenditure of wages on Sunday drinking in its results upon the habitations of the poor, have you anything to say?—Yes, I have a very strong statement to make upon that subject; and I have some very important information with respect to the district of Festiniog. There were articles in "The Times" not long since as to the fever that raged there, and it was ascribed, and I believe justly, to the want of cottage accommodation. Of late a great number of very commodious houses have been built, a large portion of which have been built by the sober portion of the very quarrymen who have signed in favour of this Bill, and many of those houses have become the property of the individuals who have built them, and have become their freeholds.

8766. Mr. Locke.] Were they built by building societies?—Some were by building societies and some they have themselves built out of their own savings. And the same remark applies to the neighbourhood of Bangor, and also to South Wales; but the sober men very commonly possess the most commodious houses, which they either inhabit themselves or let to somebody else, whilst the drunken men spend their money in drink. I do not say [that that arises entirely from Sunday drinking, but from drinking generally one day as much as the other.

8767. Mr. John Abel Smith.] Have you read the Bill which is before this Committee?—Yes.

8768. Do you consider it on the whole, a reasonable and moderate measure?—Yes, I think so.

8769. Do you see any difficulty in carrying it into effect?—I should say not; of course I speak of my own district, I cannot speak of any other. I would not give evidence as regards the metropolis or manufacturing towns; I only give the views of those districts whose views I have tested. I think there could be no difficulty in carrying out this measure, which is less restrictive than those which the people themselves ask for. As regards the inhabitants of the metropolis I cannot give evidence, but I do not see what they can have to complain of in such a Bill.

8770. Looking to your experience, your opinion is valuable as to the working out of the details; would there be any difficulty in it, do you think?—There is one point which I will refer to: I heard the witness who was examined before me say that the question as to what was meant by a "traveller" had never been settled.

regards excursionists, it was settled by the opinion of Chief Justice Erle and the Court of Common Pleas that an excursionist might have exemption under the existing law during the performance of Divine service, as the Court considered a person who went out for a day, thirty miles and came back again to be a traveller; unless intent for the express purpose of drinking. This was the decision of the Court of Common Law, and it seems to me to be a very liberal interpretation, and a very clear interpretation.

71. Do you think that there would be any fault about a bonâ fide meal?—Not as a legal rule; very often there would be a difficulty, no doubt, as to the evidence, but there is great harm if a Bill of this sort does not catch a person who breaks the law, because the Bill itself is merely a means of preventing a great evil.

The breach of an Act of this kind is not like the breach of the law of theft. If a thief escapes it is a great evil, but if a man drinks a little beer now and then without eating with it, it is only what the law calls malum prohibitum; it is not malum in se. This bill would form a sufficient obstacle to ordinary tavern drinking in practice.

72. Then, having made this statement, you would also to express your ardent desire that the Bill of Commons may pass, either in whole or in part, the Bill now referred to this Committee?—Sincerely.

73. And you believe that its rejection would be a great disappointment to a very large number of people?—Of course it would give rise to dissatisfaction to all those who have so strongly expressed their opinion in its favour. There is one fact which I ought to mention, that in the towns in the list I have handed in the publicans generally express themselves in favour of it. In some towns they have declared themselves in favour of it almost to a man, and in every town there is a large proportion in favour of it. I believe all those of the highest standing and repute are in favour of it, and in many there is scarcely a dissentient voice. In Aberystwith it was so, and in Festiniog it was so. As a general rule, the publicans signed in favour of the Bill, they wished to have a day of rest, in fact they were in favour of entire closing on Sunday.

74. Has Lord Penrhyn closed all public-houses on his property?—He has gradually closed them off. I understand that there is a district of about 15 miles on his property, where there is not a public-house to be seen.

75. And that has worked usefully?—No doubt; in that neighbourhood it is considered the greatest blessing possible by the working people themselves.

76. Mr. Locke.] Lord Penrhyn has not closed all the public-houses at Bangor, has he?—Not, I believe, all.

77. The "Penrhyn Arms" is still open, is it?—Yes, the "Penrhyn Arms" is open, that is for the accommodation of travellers; he has closed every house.

78. Do you mean to say that nobody ever goes to the "Penrhyn Arms," unless they are travellers?—I do not know about that.

79. Are there any public dinners at the "Penrhyn Arms"?—Yes, no doubt.

80. Then, according to your proposition to do away entirely with the social drinking, they would no longer have any public dinners at the "Penrhyn Arms"?—Perhaps you will allow me to say.

to explain what I mean; I did not say that Lord Penrhyn had put an end to all public-houses, altogether, on his estate; what I said was, that he was gradually weeding them out, and I was informed that there was a district of about 15 miles, where there were no public-houses at all, and of course most of the people in that district were so far from a public-house, that they had no opportunity of habitual drinking.

81. However it was not his intention to put them all down?—I cannot tell you what his intention was.

82. Is it his intention to put down the "Penrhyn Arms"?—I should think not.

83. I think there is a large hotel at the top of the town, is there not?—I do not know anything about that hotel.

84. He would have some difficulty in putting that down, as, I believe, it does not belong to him?—That is his difficulty, I believe, as regards other taverns, that do not belong to him.

85. That hotel, at the top of the town, is now a very large hotel indeed, is it not?—I have not been at Bangor for some time, I am not aware.

86. Then you yourself have not seen the great changes there?—I have not had an opportunity.

87. You take it upon hearsay?—I take it upon hearsay.

88. In fact, most of the evidence which you have given is upon hearsay?—History is hearsay and nothing else.

89. Do you say that, in Wales, the people never get drunk at home?—No, I did not say any such thing. It was a slip of the tongue; but I corrected myself. I said I hardly ever knew a case of the kind. I was speaking of working people.

90. You would not be very likely to know what people did in their own homes, would you?—That again is hearsay; but certainly a man who lives in the country must learn something.

91. Men who drink at home would not come and tell you, I presume?—No.

92. Therefore what the people do in their homes you cannot tell?—I have the same means of knowing their habits, as you have of knowing the habits of the people among whom you live.

93. But the Welsh people are not a sober people, are they?—They are sober where the taverns are put down.

94. They are sober when they cannot get anything to drink?—Yes; and so would every man be; that is my proposition.

95. You would be in favour of putting an end to all drinking?—Yes.

96. Are you a teetotalter?—No; I mean all drinking in taverns, where people excite each other to drunkenness, and where the landlord does so.

97. But supposing there is a public dinner there?—That is a great evil.

98. Do you ever go to any?—Yes, not often, never when I can help it.

99. But you cannot help it sometimes?—No.

800. Then you commit a great evil?—I consider it a great evil; I do not commit the evil.

801. But you compound for it by stopping all those poor people?—It is a composition for which they

A. J. Johns, Esq., they do not ask any equivalent, it is their own request.

25 June 1868. 8802. You go to those places, and those public dinners, and there you drink your wine?—I hardly ever go to a public dinner at all; never, if I can help it.

8803. What forces you to go?—I do not know that anything has forced me for the last 10 years; I do not know that I have been at a public dinner for the last ten years.

8804. You have been, I suppose, at a tavern during the last 10 years?—Yes, on my circuit I have.

8805. And there you take your wine, I suppose?—Yes.

8806. And whatever you like?—Yes.

8807. That is not consistent, is it, with your principle?—I do not maintain the principle regards a traveller.

8808. You think that a traveller has a right to get drunk?—Excuse me, I did not say so.

8809. The traveller is to do as he likes?—Of course, it is his own home; I say it is the custom of society that drives people to drunkenness.

8810. It does not always do so, does it?—It has that tendency.

8811. It sometimes makes him comfortable, does it not?—No, I do not think it makes him comfortable. In public houses the society they meet with is very degrading, and can do man any good.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

C. of ST. JAMES'S DIVISION SPECIAL REPORT.

Station House, 28 April 1868.

I HAVE to report, for the information of the Commissioner, that the Public-house Closing Act of 1864 has acted beneficially in a very marked manner in this Division; but I observe that on Saturday and Sunday nights, when the houses of licensed victuallers are closed at 12 and 11 o'clock respectively, that many persons resort to different refreshment houses until 1 a.m. on those nights, and I have reason to believe that wine, spirits, and beer are sold in most of those places without a license, and of which the Excise authorities do not take any active steps.

I beg most respectfully to suggest that, in the event of any alteration of the law, that no refreshment-house should be allowed to remain open for sale or consumption of any article whatsoever when the houses of licensed victuallers are compelled by law to be closed.

S. Hannant, Superintendent.Richard Mayne.

EMPLOYERS OF LABOUR.

MEMORIAL FOR SUNDAY CLOSING.

WE, the undersigned Employers of Labour, and Managers of Works and Manufactories, desire to express our conviction that the Sunday Sale of Intoxicating Liquors is productive of great injury to our workpeople, as well as to others, and very much tends to their drunkenness and demoralization.

In addition to this, we find that the influence of the public-houses and beershops on Sunday unfits working men for their duties on Monday, and seriously interferes with the arrangements of the workshop, causing great inconvenience and loss to employers and employed.

LETTER handed in by the Chairman.

App. No. 8.

Heath House, Stapleton, Bristol,
20 May 1868.

Sir,

I HAVE been invited by the promoters of the Bill for Restricting the Sale of Intoxicating Drinks, to give my testimony in favour of the measure before the Committee of which you are Chairman. But although I am very desirous to be of service in so good a cause, I am unfortunately in a state of health which, in the opinion of my physician, utterly precludes me from undertaking a journey to London. I have, however, received an intimation that an indulgence which has more than once been accorded to me by committees and commissions, may perhaps be granted on the present occasion, namely, that of stating my views by letter.

It was not until after many years of observation and thought on the subject, that my mind was brought to the belief that any good could be effected by the interposition of the law, to which I have ever felt great reluctance to resort, without the pressure of overwhelming necessity. But having spent much time, for more than 40 years of my life, in criminal courts, partly as counsel and partly as a judicial officer, sad experience has forced upon me the conviction that drinking habits are by far the most fertile cause of crime; and that when the best law that can be framed has done its utmost, much will remain to be effected by moral influences. Yet I have arrived at a very decided opinion that the arm of the law will be found much more efficient than I had in my earlier years believed possible. I am under the deep impression that restriction has done good service, and that it has not yet been carried to the limit at which its action ceases to be beneficial to the community.

I have sedulously watched the progress of public opinion on this momentous subject, both abroad and at home, and I am persuaded that an amount of restriction which would have incited some years ago an opposition so strong as to paralyse the operation of any statute in which it was incorporated, would now be received as a boon by the majority of the nation.

The Bill referred to your Committee applies, it is true, to Sunday drinking only; but it is a great step to protect one day in the week from the fearful temptations which now pervade the whole year. And the one day chosen, it will scarcely be denied, is that best entitled to the choice. On that day the duties of each member of a family to the others are most disastrously impeded by habits of drinking. The example of the father is more immediately brought under the notice of his children than in any other part of the week. And it is frequently on that day that fatal indulgences are fostered among the young.

As my only hope of pardon for thus intruding on your time and attention must lie in brevity, I restrain my desire to dwell on a topic the importance of which cannot, in my belief, be over-estimated.

I have, &c.
(signed) M. D. Hill.

PAPERS handed in by Mr. Alderman Fisher, 18 June 1868.

App. No. 10.

BOROUGH OF SHEFFIELD.

At a Meeting of the Town Council of the Borough of Sheffield, held 13th October 1852—

It was Resolved,

THAT a committee, consisting of Alderman Thomas Birks, and Councillors William Lawton, Isaac Ironside, Christopher Thompson, Charles Alcock, Thomas Turner, Nicholas Robert Holman, and George Leman Saunders, be, and is hereby, appointed to inquire into the cause of the apparent excess of drunkenness in this borough; also to consider the best means for ensuring its decrease.

At a meeting of the Town Council of the Borough of Sheffield, held 12th January 1853, the committee appointed relative to the apparent excess of drunkenness in the borough of Sheffield, and to consider the best means of ensuring its decrease, presented a report, which was adopted, and from which the following is an extract:—

“Your committee have also paid great attention to the effects arising from keeping public-houses open on the Sunday; their attention being particularly drawn to this point from the fact of the greatest number of drunken persons being brought before the magistrates on the Monday. Mr. Raynor stated it as his opinion, ‘That it would be a great improvement if the public-houses and beerhouses were closed during the whole of Sunday, except for about an hour in the middle of the day.’ It certainly does appear a strange anomaly that places should be open for the sale of intoxicating drinks on the Sunday while shops for the sale of the various useful and necessary articles of life are required to be strictly closed. It is quite necessary that travellers should be able to find refreshment and rest, but it can be neither necessary or wise that public-houses and beerhouses should be open during the Sunday to the extent they are at present, and though your committee are not prepared to recommend that they should be closed during the whole of Sundays, they are of opinion that the sale of intoxicating drinks should not be permitted therein except to travellers; and they feel satisfied, from what they have heard, that most of the respectable publicans would be glad to concur in such a regulation.”

At the request and by the direction of the Select Committee of the House of Commons “On the Sale of Liquors on Sunday Bill,” I hereby certify that the above are correct extracts from the minutes of the proceedings of the Town Council of the Borough of Sheffield.

John Germans, Town Clerk.

13 June 1868.

Town Clerk.

Appendix, No. 11.

App. No. 11.

LETTER from the Rev. D. Burns to Sir J. Fergusson, Bart., M.P.

Sir,

112, Strand, W.C., 15 June 1868.

As the Select Committee on the Sunday Sale of Liquors Bill decided to-day not to take evidence at present to rebut the statements made by Mr. Morrell on the 8th instant, in reference to a canvass of St. Pancras five years ago, I beg to place before you, as chairman, the chief points of Mr. Morrell's evidence, with the answers that I am ready to supply.

Question 6252-3. Mr. Morrell states that a canvass of St. Pancras took place seven or eight years ago; that he was challenged to examine the books at the Alliance Office in the Strand, when he found that two persons in his street had been entered as in favour, and "I think not one opposed."

Question 6344. "That the returns were given of men who were in favour of restriction, but the whole of the other residents, who were in favour of the present system, were treated as neutrals, whereas, in reality, they were every one opposed to further restriction."

Questions 6258 and 6347. "That these statistics were got up by the Alliance party, and were not trustworthy."

1. In reply to these charges and imputations, I assert that the canvass referred to, which occurred in 1863, five (not seven) years ago, was neither "got up" by the Alliance, nor was it in any respect under the control of the Alliance, but was originated by the London Working Men's Sunday Closing League, in connection with the Hull Association for Closing Public-houses on Sunday, and that all the funds expended in its prosecution (about 130*l.*) were provided by friends of the Sunday Closing Movement.

2. That the parish of St. Pancras was selected for canvass, in order to test the statements advanced, that the people of London were hostile to Mr. Soames's Bill, then down for a second reading, the object of this Bill being to prohibit all sale of intoxicating liquors from 11 on Saturday night to six on Monday morning. The parish of St. Pancras was selected because of its large and miscellaneous population of 198,000 souls, including large numbers of the working class.

3. That, in order to make the canvass a means of eliciting the opinions of the non-householding population, each householder was requested to ascertain and state the opinions of all residents in his house of the age of 21 years and upwards.

That the canvass lasted from Monday, 18th of May, to the evening of Tuesday 26th, and canvassers employed were 78, some engaged for the whole period, and others for shorter terms. That the strictest care and impartiality were enjoined on all, and in hiring them no questions were asked concerning their sentiments on the subject, nor was it known what sentiments the greater number entertained upon it.

When the canvass papers were returned, the written replies were carefully copied into books, and it is wholly false that persons making no returns were ever entered as neutrals.

The roads, streets, squares, terraces, and places canvassed numbered 836, and the adult opinions registered were as follows:—

	For.	Against.	Neutral.	Total.	Majority for the Bill.
Ward 1 - - -	3,150	1,872	941	5,96	1,278
" 2 - - -	2,516	1,423	573	4,512	1,093
" 3 - - -	4,281	2,814	1,296	8,391	1,467
" 4 - - -	2,040	1,241	428	3,709	799
" 5 - - -	2,470	2,257	766	5,493	213
" 6 - - -	5,283	4,192	1,670	11,145	1,091
" 7 - - -	2,849	2,479	1,003	6,331	370
" 8 - - -	3,955	2,736	1,089	7,780	1,219
	26,544	19,014	7,766	53,324	7,530

Copies of the returns were sent to the daily and local newspapers, and to the members for the borough, who were requested to test the bonâ fide character of the canvass. A public meeting was also held in Camden-hall (not the Vestry-hall), when it was stated that the papers would lie for a week or more at 335 Strand, for the inspection of any person. That the use of the Alliance Office was granted for the purpose simply to oblige the promoters of the canvass, as the situation was well known, and as some person would always be present to show the documents. Some person, who refused to give his name, did call (Mr. Morrell states it was himself), who requested, in an uncouth manner, to see the papers of one street. These were shown him, and after examining them he retired, but without attempting to prove that persons who had made no returns were entered as "neutrals." To the above facts I can witness, as having taken a deep interest in the canvass during its entire progress, and as having afforded gratuitous assistance to its promoters. No canvass could be made with a more earnest desire and endeavour to ascertain the real opinions of the people; and the imputations of Mr. Morrell are wholly unfounded.

I hope the Select Committee will yet decide to examine me; or, if not, that they will show their wish to do justice to all sides, by allowing this letter to form part of the documentary evidence submitted and printed.

I am, &c.
(signed) Dawson Burns.

PAPER handed in by Mr. Johnes, 25 June 1868.

SUNDAY CLOSING, 1868.

RESULT of a CANVASS conducted by means of Voting Papers left for the Signature of the H holders, and afterwards collected by a Number of respectable Inhabitants of each Place, of whom two were responsible for the Returns. All acted gratuitously.

The following are fair examples of the results of the returns throughout Wales.

They include the towns in Cardiganshire and Montgomeryshire, in which County Courts are held, of which Mr. A. J. Johnes is Judge.

Aberystwith, in Cardiganshire, is the most important district of his circuit. He has held that Court monthly for upwards of 21 years.
been judge of Machynlleth Court for the same period. It is in Montgomeryshire.

Of Llanfyllin, Llanidloes, and Newtown he has been judge for eight years. The three last-named towns are also in the county of Montgo which he is a native, and in which he has resided since his appointment in 1847, as was also the case in his early youth.

For these reasons he has had peculiar means of forming an opinion as to the characters of the canvassers and the truthfulness of their
He is perfectly prepared to vouch for both.

ABERYSTWITH. Almost unanimous feeling of householders in Aberystwith in favour of the total closing of public-houses on Sunday, Johnes 8754, 8773.

Accidents. Peculiar frequency of accidents in factories on Monday on account of the effect of Sunday drinking, Murphy 5463—Increased liability to accidents in mines early in the week owing to indulgence in drink on Sunday, Cockburn 5938, 5940.

Act of 1839. Great improvement produced in London by the closing of public-houses on Sunday morning, by the Act of 1839, Page 2661–2663; Murphy 5410, 5411, 5545.

ACT OF 1854 (MR. WILSON PATTEN'S ACT):

1. Circumstances connected with the passing of the Act.
2. Operation and Effect of the Act with reference to Drunkenness.
3. State of Public Feeling with reference to the Act; its subsequent Repeal.

1. Circumstances connected with the passing of the Act:

Witness was a member of Licensed Victuallers Protection Society in 1854 when Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill was introduced, and explains the circumstances under which a compromise was then effected as to the hours of closing on Sunday, Winterbotham 6524–6530—Considerable dissatisfaction of the trade and of the public with the compromise of 1854, ib. 6529, 6541—More stringent character of Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill as introduced than as passed, Wadhams 8000, 8001.

2. Operation and Effect of the Act with reference to Drunkenness:

Probable accuracy of certain returns showing a large decrease of drunkenness in the metropolis as the direct result of the Act of 1854, Sir R. Mayne 234–237—Doubt as to any greater amount of illegal drinking under the Act of 1854 than under Mr. Berkeley's Act of 1855, ib. 238–242—Slight importance attached to certain returns and evidence purporting to show a large decrease of drunkenness through the operation of the Act of 1854, Sir T. Henry 432–437—Concurrence in the opinion of the late Mr. A'Beckett that the Act of 1854, though it diminished drunkenness, was not for the public convenience, Woolrych 748, 749.

Beneficial operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act of 1854 with reference to drunkenness, Garrett 2263, 2264—Material diminution of drunkenness in London after the passing of the Act, Archbishop Manning 2460, 2461—Beneficial operation of the Act of 1854 in Saint Giles, there having been no good reason for the repeal of the Act, McCree 6156–6163.

Belief that the brief operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was productive of no benefit whilst it caused much dissatisfaction, Winterbotham 6610–6612—Impression that under the Act of 1854 drunkenness increased on week days though it decreased on Sunday, ib. 6752–6755—Opposition made to the Bill of 1854 and inconvenience from its operation, further adverted to, ib. 6757–6765.

3. State of Public Feeling with reference to the Act; its subsequent Repeal:

Approval by witness, before the inquiry in 1855, of the removal of some of the restrictions under the Act of 1854, Sir R. Mayne 4–6, 112, 113—Repeal of the Act because of the numerous complaints made, ib. 109–111, 180–187, 259, 260—Belief as to the riots in Hyde Park in 1854–55 having been connected with the working of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, ib. 180–187, 243–246—Grievance in London by the former closing at ten o'clock, so that the system was altered, Jackson 1536, 1549–1555.

3. State of Public Feeling with reference to the Act, &c.—continued.

Belief that the opposition to the Act of 1854 was not the spontaneous action of the people, Archbishop Manning 2383, 2391, 2466—Opinion that no such opposition would now be experienced as at the time of the Bill of 1854, the popular feeling at that time having had reference moreover to Lord Ebury's Bill rather than Mr. Wilson Patten's measure, Potter 5138, 5139, 5190-5196—Premature closing of the Select Committee on the Act of 1854, only one witness out of London having been examined, Murphy 5413, 5414—Comment upon the agitation in London against the Act of 1854, and upon the improper course pursued on the part of the licensed victuallers in fomenting the riots in Hyde Park, ib. 5415, 5416.

Denial of the accuracy of a statement by the Rev. Mr. Murphy, reflecting on the course pursued by witness as representing the Licensed Victuallers Association at the time of the riots in Hyde Park in 1854, Smith 5648-5650.

Denial that public opinion declared itself against increased restriction at the time of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, the opposition then raised having had reference to the Sunday Trading Bill, Leicester 5893-5908.

Inaccuracy of a statement that the Hyde Park agitation against the Act of 1854 was set on foot by the publicans; strong popular feeling against the Act, Morrell 6260-6262.

Opposition of a large portion of the trade to the Bill of 1854, though they had nothing to do with the meetings or riots in the park which then took place, Winterbotham 6531-6535—Discontent of the public with the Act of 1854 further adverted to; further denial that the licensed victuallers had anything to do with the meetings in Hyde Park at this period, ib. 6617-6621, 6661, 6662, 6681-6683, 6757-6765—Examination upon the question whether witness did not join in a movement against the Bill of 1854, shortly after it was agreed to accept it as a compromise, ib. 6645-6661, 6679-6681.

Agitation consequent upon the operation of the Act, adverted to by the Committee as an argument against the passing of the present more restrictive measure, Rep. iv.

Act of 1855 (Mr. Berkeley's Act.) Conclusion as to the favourable operation in the metropolis of the Act 18 & 19 Vict., Sir R. Mayne 9-14, 18-23, 38.

Act of 1864 (Sir George Grey's Act.) Salutory working of the Public-House Closing Act of 1864 in the metropolis, with reference to the amount of drunkenness and disorderly conduct, Sir R. Mayne 14-23—Principal object of witness in recommending the closing clause in the Act of 1864, to lessen the disorder arising from houses in the Haymarket, ib. 188, 305-308—Statement of the number of drunken cases in the metropolitan district, in the two years before and the two years after Sir George Grey's Act of 1864, ib. 297-301.

Great importance attached to the Act of 1864 as imposing restrictions circulated to meet the case of professional drunkards, Sir T. Henry 351-354, 389-396—Doubt as to the improved morality in the Southwark police district being at all connected with the operation of the Act of 1864, Burcham 495-501, 555, 591, 603—Effect of Sir George Grey's Act in leading to a decrease of drunken cases in the Lambeth district, Woolrych 637, 638—Marked improvement in the metropolis, consequent upon the restrictions imposed by the Act of 1864, Murphy 5417, 5545-5547.

Adulteration. Statement relative to the adulteration of beer and spirits by publicans, Murphy 5555-5567—Probable reason for the severe restrictions applied to public houses; application also to other trades of restrictions and penalties as to the quality of the articles sold, Winterbotham 6749-6751, 6766-6773—Doubt as to adulteration being much practised in the beer shops or licensed houses at Birmingham, Wadhams 8136-8141.

Agitation. See Act of 1854. Public Opinion. Publicans, 1. Working Classes.

Aitken, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a schoolmaster at Ashton-under-Lyne; has had long and varied opportunities for becoming conversant with the habits and opinions of the working classes, 8163-8169—Great progress and improvement of the working classes during the last thirty years, 8170—Grounds for the conclusion that the Bill before the Committee would be a serious inconvenience to the working classes and to the public at large, 8171-8176—Objection to the distinction made by the Bill between the metropolis and the provinces, 8176—Very limited amount of Sunday drunkenness in Ashton-under-Lyne, 8177.

Way in which the Bill would prove a serious inconvenience to numerous burial societies 8178-8185—Beneficial effect of restrictive legislation up to the present point, whilst further restriction would unduly encroach on the liberty of the subject, 8186, 8187, 8200—Probability of increased drinking on other days if the public-houses were closed on Sunday, 8189—Expected large evasion of the proposed restrictions in Ashton-under-Lyne

Lyne and the district around, 8190-8194—Satisfaction of the great majority of the working classes with the present law, 8195, 8196—Great dissatisfaction caused in Ashton-under-Lyne by the Act of 1854; 8198-8206.

Explanation of the circumstances which have led to the appearance of witness before the Committee, 8207-8211. 8215-8224—Feeling of large numbers of the people that any further restriction should be the result of moral influence rather than of Parliamentary enactment, 8212-8214—Examination relative to the antecedents of witness, and the part formerly taken by him in support of strikes and of the Chartist movement; he submits that all this is irrelevant to the present question, 8225-8248. 8270-8282.

Large proportion of public-houses and beer-houses at Ashton-under-Lyne, 8249-8253—Partial character of a canvass of the town on the present question, 8254-8260—Well conducted character of the public-houses on Sunday evening, 8261-8263—Circumstance of the Bill having been approved by a large meeting held at the Town Hall, 8264-8269.

Ashton-under-Lyne. Very little Sunday drunkenness in the town, Aitken 8177—Expected large evasion of the proposed restrictions in Ashton and the district around, ib. 8190-8194—Great dissatisfaction caused in Ashton by the Act of 1854, ib. 8198-8206—Large proportion of public-houses and beer-houses in the town, ib. 8249-8253—Partial character of a canvass of the town on the present question, ib. 8254-8260—Well conducted character of the public-houses on Sunday evening, ib. 8261-8263—Approval of the Bill by a large meeting held at the Town Hall, there having been no meeting against the Bill, ib. 8264-8269.

Assaults. Origination of the great mass of assaults in public-house drinking, Johnes 8741, 8742.

Avery, Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Mayor of Birmingham, 1817, 1818—Large number of the inhabitants of Birmingham who are favourable to increased restrictions upon the sale of liquor on Sunday, 1822-1827—Feeling of many of the working classes in favour of a Permissive Bill, 1824. 1845. 1891—Opinion of witness that the present Bill should be passed as a permissive measure experimentally, and that though inconvenience would doubtless result from the prohibition of consumption on the premises, the benefits would much preponderate, 1828-1833. 1841.

Considerable agitation and complaint in Birmingham consequent upon Mr. Wilson Patten's Act of 1854; conclusion as to there being much change of public opinion on the subject in the meantime, 1834-1845. 1875-1896. 1950-1952—Particulars relative to a large meeting convened by the United Kingdom Alliance, and attended by about 6,000 persons, at which the principle of a Permissive Bill was strongly and unanimously advocated, 1844, 1845. 1881-1896. 1937-1949. 1955-1961.

Statistics of drunkenness in Birmingham, the increase since 1857 being very considerable; apparent inaccuracy hereon of the returns of the chief constable, 1846-1850—Satisfactory result of the enforcement of the general Act for the closing of shops on Sunday, 1851-1855. 1897-1904—Decided effect of restrictions in diminishing drunkenness, 1858-1861. 1952—Data for the calculation that about 1,000,000*l.* is spent annually at the licensed houses, hotels, and beer shops in Birmingham, about nine-tenths coming out of the pockets of the poorer classes, 1862-1874. 1905-1936.

Weight attached to the opinions arrived at by the large meeting called by the United Kingdom Alliance, 1937-1949. 1955-1961—Decided improvement generally in the working classes of Birmingham, though drunkenness does not seem to be on the decrease, 1952-1954.

B.

Bala District (North Wales). Revival of Sunday drinking in the Bala district since the cessation of an arrangement for voluntary closing, Johnes 8759, 8760.

Bankruptcies. Large number of bankruptcy cases which have their origin in drunkenness, Johnes 8750-8752.

Barlow, James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Mayor of Bolton, 4022—The population of the town is 76,000, and there is a large majority in favour of closing public-houses on Sunday, as evidenced by public meetings on the subject (particulars hereon), 4023-4036. 4066, 4067. 4135-4157—Explanation relative to a recent house to house canvass of the householders, the mode in which conducted, and the extent of feeling elicited for and against Sunday closing; conclusion as to the fairness of the canvass, and as to there being a large majority in favour of closing, 4026-4030. 4091-4134. 4280. 4282-4303.

Opportunities of witness for knowing the feelings of the working classes in favour of increased restrictions on Sunday; belief that the Bill would be accepted by them without disturbance disturbance, 4037-4046—Larger number of drunken cases brought before the magistrates for the period from Saturday night to Monday morning than for the rest of the week, 4047-4050. 4202-4216. 4259-4262. 4266-4269—Improved habits of the people, and decrease of drunkenness, owing to restrictions on the sale of drink, and to other causes, 4051-4055. 4217-4223. 4247-4252—Very little inconvenience to Sunday excursionists at Bolton if the Bill be passed, 4056-4062. 4088-4090. 4158-4160.

Effect generally of increased restrictions upon sale in decreasing drunkenness, 4063 4065. 4191-4197. 4274—Strong feeling in Bolton in favour of Mr. Somes' Bill for Sunday closing, 4066, 4067. 4280, 4281—Beneficial operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in Bolton, 4068-4071. 4077-4080—Probable increase of illicit drinking under the present Bill, though not to any great extent, 4072-4074. 4173-4191—Practice of having music in some public-houses on Sunday, 4075, 4076.

Explanation, that though witness advocates the passing of the present Bill he prefers a Permissive Bill and total closing on Sunday, 4081-4087. 4161-4172. 4253-4258. 4277-4279—Question considered, whether in the United States the system of prohibition has not lead to great abuse, and has ended in failure, 4173-4185—Injurious effect of Sunday drinking as regards the workpeople in witness's employment, 4198-4201—Approval of recreation in parks on Sunday, but not of open air music at the same time, 4224-4240.

Belief that all the newspapers in Bolton advocate Sunday closing, 4241-4246—Approval by many drunkards of the principle of restriction, 4252—Comparatively few lodgers in Bolton to be inconvenienced by the Bill, 4263-4265. 4270-4272. 4299-4303—Improvement upon the present practice by closing at ten on Sunday evening, 4273-4276.

Beal, Michael. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a Common Councilman of Sheffield, and is President of the Chamber of Industry, 7708-7716—Considers that legislative restriction on the Sunday sale of liquors has gone quite far enough, and that further restriction would cause great inconvenience, 7717-7722. 7748, 7749, 7767. 7773-7777—Serious inconvenience under the present law as well as under the Act of 1854 in the case of Sunday excursionists; instance of this, 7723. 7767. 7774, 7775. 7787-7789, 7794-7796. 7843—Report made to the town council by a committee in 1852 upon the subject of further restriction; no action was taken on this report, 7723-7726. 7810-7815. 7841, 7842.

Dissatisfaction caused in Sheffield by Mr. Wilson Patten's Act of 1854; 7727, 7728—Large meeting in December 1854, adverse to increased restriction, 7729-7739. 7778-7780. 7816-7818—Partial character of a recent canvass, purporting to be in favour of the Bill, 7740-7747—Hardship in imposing further restriction upon the great mass of temperate men for the sake of a very small number of habitual drunkards, 7748, 7749. 7781, 7782. 7790, 7791.

Belief that the majority of the working men of Sheffield and of the town council, are opposed to the Bill; grounds for this conclusion, 7750-7755. 7770-7772. 7782-7785. 7797-7829—Important diminution of drunkenness in the town, owing partly to increased means of recreation, 7756-7766—Letter from some working men to witness in 1855, representing the hardships suffered by them as excursionists under the Act of 1854; circumstance of one of these men being now a teetotaller, 7767-7769. 7844-7846.

Large petitions from Sheffield and the neighbourhood against the present Bill, 7770-7772—Attention of witness drawn to some meetings in 1863 favourable to the movement for Sunday closing, 7819-7829—Statement as to the character of some of the persons employed in getting up the Sheffield petition against the Bill, 7832-7840.

Bedford. Excessive drinking on Sunday at Bedford as well as on Saturday night, the result being that many men are unfit for work on Monday, Howard 4794-4803—Undue hours for which public-houses are open in Bedford as compared with London, ib. 4805-4808. 4830-4832—Considerable amount of illicit drinking at Bedford on Sunday; doubt as to much increase if there were further restrictions upon sale, ib. 4816-4818. 4833, 4834. 4846-4853—Belief that the Bill would be acceptable to the great bulk of the people of the town, ib. 4820. 4824. 4829—Establishment of a working men's institute at Bedford; refreshments obtainable there on Sunday, ib. 4825-4828. 4868-4871.

Extensive drinking in public-houses at Bedford on Sunday much to the detriment of the families of the working men, Freshwater 4877, 4878. 4892. 4978. 4989-4995—Opportunities of witness for knowing the opinions of working men in the town upon the question of Sunday closing; large majority in favour of the Bill, ib. 4881, 4882. 4884. 4895. 4908-4911. 4960-4964. 4972—Belief that the publicans do not encourage drunkenness, ib. 4887—Particulars relative to the operation of the working men's institute, ib. 4902. 4912. 4919—Feeling of many publicans in favour of Sunday closing, ib. 5004-5006.

Beer-houses. Difficulty in ascertaining the relative amounts of drunkenness originating in beer-houses and in public-houses, Sir R. Mayne 49-54—The total number of beer-houses in the metropolitan district in 1866 was 4,207, ib. 194—Frequent evasion of the law by beer-houses, it being desirable to place these under the same licensing restrictions as public-houses, Woolrych 735-739.

Great evil of the beer-houses in Liverpool, Greig 1000, 1001. 1039. 1076, 1077. 1081, 1082—Concurrence in the view as to the expediency of beer-houses being under the same license as public-houses, Greig 1039. 1076-1082; Wybergh 7699; Wadhams 8110-8112; Candelet 8708—Much larger number of beer-houses than of licensed houses in Birmingham, the facility of obtaining licenses for the former being a great evil, Glossop 1689-1693.

Peculiarly objectionable operation of beer-houses, McCree 6148, 6149—Evasion of the law in beer-houses rather than public-houses, control of the magistrates over the former being much required, Segrave 7349. 7372, 7373. 7423-7425. 7491-7495—Much larger number of offences at Liverpool, on the part of beer sellers, than of publicans, Wybergh 7572.

See also Publicans.

Berkeley, the Hon. F. H. Fitzhardinge (Member of the Committee). (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Explanation as regards a requisition to witness, signed by 1,580 electors of Bristol to vote for the present Bill, that there was a counter-requisition from 4,000 electors asking him to take an independent course in the matter, 6578-6591.

Berkeley, Hon. F. H. F. Unfounded character of a statement that a certain testimonial presented to Mr. Berkeley in 1856 (including 1,012 l. in money) proceeded from the licensed victuallers exclusively, Candelet 8567-8571. 8626-8633.

Bigge, Arthur. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Stipendiary magistrate at Brighton, 1963, 1964—Information as to the number and habits of the excursionists who come to Brighton on Sunday; the present Bill would not affect them, as being travellers, 1966, 1967. 1981-1985. 1989-1994—Comparatively large number of drunken cases brought before witness on Monday, the results of drinking on Saturday and Sunday, 1968-1971. 2043. 2165-2168—Beneficial effects anticipated in Brighton from prohibiting drinking on the premises on Sunday; belief that the inconvenience to the working classes, lodgers, &c., would be very limited, 1972-1980. 2005 et seq.

Salutary effect of restrictions upon the sale of drink in diminishing drunkenness, 1972-1980. 1986, 1987. 1995-1998—Diminution of drunkenness owing partly to the improved habits of the people, 1986. 1997-2002. 2058-2072. 2154, 2155—Expediency of restrictions in the interest of those who cannot avoid the temptation to drink when opportunity offers, 2005 et seq.—Absence of analogy between clubs and public-houses as regards the question of restrictions, 2016-2030. 2050.

Facilities under the Bill for persons at Brighton who go any distance from home to procure drink as travellers; examination hereon as to the legal interpretation of the Act in regard to travellers in the country, 2034-2040. 2073-2107—Local feeling in favour of increased restrictions, 2041-2045—Belief that the Bill would not cause any serious confusion in the town, or any popular discontent, 2052-2055. 2170, 2171.

Very limited inconvenience as regards the meals of the working classes, lodgers, &c. if the hours of opening in the afternoon were limited from half-past twelve to half-past two, 2108-2153—Approval also of the houses being closed at an hour earlier in the evening, such as nine o'clock, 2156-2164.

Birkenhead. Similar feeling in Birkenhead as in Liverpool in favour of further restriction on the Sunday sale of liquor, White 2946-2948.

BIRMINGHAM:

1. Amount of Drinking and of Drunkenness in different Years.
2. Operation of Mr. Wilson's Patten's Act of 1854.
3. Anticipations as to the Operation of the present Bill.
4. Local Feeling on the Question of increased Restriction.
5. Other Details generally.

1. Amount of Drinking and of Drunkenness in different Years:

Statistics of the amount of drunkenness in Birmingham in each year since 1854, the increase being considerable, Glossop 1581-1601.—Relative number of cases on Sunday and on other days; small average number on Sunday, ib. 1592-1594. 1684, 1685—Very little Sunday drunkenness in Birmingham in proportion to the population; restrictions not being called for save for a limited number of habitual drinkers, ib. 1763-1784. 1802-1815.

Reference to certain statistics of drunkenness, as showing a large increase since 1857; apparent inaccuracy hereon of the returns of the chief constable, Avery 1846-1850—Data for the calculation that 1,000,000 l. is spent annually at the licensed houses, hotels, and beer-shops in Birmingham, about nine-tenths coming out of the pockets of the poorer classes, ib. 1862-1874. 1905-1936—Explanation of an apparent discrepancy between the statistics of drunkenness in Birmingham as submitted by witness and by Mr. Avery respectively, Glossop 1962.

Statistics showing that Sunday drunkenness in Birmingham has much decreased with reference to the population, Wadhams 7983-7986. 8038, 8039—Undue amount of illicit drinking on Sunday morning, ib. 7983. 8003-8006. 8009. 8072—Decrease of drunkenness owing to the opening of parks, &c. on Sunday, and to the improved habits of the people, ib. 7986-7995. 8107, 8108—Very large proportion of beer-shops and public-houses in Birmingham, there being doubtless a vast amount of drinking, ib. 8094-8105—Other articles besides beer, upon the sale of which many of the beer-houses depend for a profit, ib. 8113-8135.

2. Operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act of 1854 :

Effect of the Act of 1854 in largely diminishing the amount of drunkenness on Sunday, the restrictions of the Act having, however, led to much complaint, Glossop 1602-1608. 1625-1628. 1686-1688. 1703-1720—Very beneficial effect produced in Birmingham by the Act of 1854, Murphy 5412, 5413. 5545—Considerable dissatisfaction whilst the Act of 1854 was in operation, Wadhams 8001, 8002.

3. Anticipations as to the Operation of the present Bill :

Expectations that the Bill now under consideration would greatly diminish drunkenness in Birmingham on Sunday, but would lead to complaints from a large section of the community, Glossop 1609 et seq.—Probability of much illicit drinking if the Bill became law, ib. 1638-1648. 1782-1784—Hardship as regards the large number of Sunday excursionists if unduly restricted in consuming beer on the premises, ib. 1749-1755. 1764-1775.

Conclusion as to the great inconvenience to be caused by the Bill to the numerous persons who take short excursions out of Birmingham on Sunday, and who frequent the parks and other places, Wadhams 7994-7999. 8037. 8070—Serious inconvenience by the Bill to a very large number of persons who are moving about between the hours of three and five on Sunday, ib. 8069, 8070. 8142-8147.

4. Local Feeling on the Question of increased Restrictions :

Large number of the better class of working men who are favourable to increased restrictions; public meeting held on the subject, Glossop 1721-1728. 1816—Belief that increased restrictions would be complained of only by a small minority of the inhabitants, ib. 1741, 1742. 1807-1815—Considerable number of the inhabitants favourable to increased restrictions upon the sale of liquor on Sunday, Avery 1822-1827—Feeling of many of the working classes in favour of a Permissive Bill, ib. 1824. 1845. 1891.

Considerable agitation and complaint in Birmingham consequent upon Mr. Wilson Patten's Act of 1854; conclusion as to there being much change of public opinion on the subject in the meantime, Avery 1834-1845. 1875-1896. 1950-1952—Particulars relative to a large meeting convened by the United Kingdom Alliance, and attended by about 6,000 persons, at which the principle of a Permissive Bill was unanimously advocated, ib. 1844, 1845. 1881-1896. 1937-1949. 1955-1961—Belief that the present Bill would not lead to the slightest disturbance in the town, ib. 1875—Weight attached to the opinions arrived at by the large meeting called by the United Kingdom Alliance, ib. 1937-1949. 1955-1961.

Grounds for the statement that a certain large meeting at Birmingham, referred to by Mr. Avery, did by no means represent the opinions of the working classes on the question of increased restriction, Wadhams 8076-8087.

5. Other Details generally :

Very beneficial results of enforcing the law against Sunday trading in Birmingham, Glossop 1758, 1759—Both beer-houses and public-houses are, as a rule, well conducted, ib. 1633-1636. 1697, 1698—Total closing on Sunday by twenty-seven publicans and forty-six beer-house keepers, ib. 1700—Feeling of many, if not all, publicans in favour of total closing, provided it were carried out by the whole trade, ib. 1701, 1702. 1756-1758—Satisfactory result of the enforcement of the general Act for the closing of shops on Sunday, Avery 1851-1855. 1897-1904—Decided improvement generally in the working classes in Birmingham, though drunkenness does not seem to be on the decrease, ib. 1952-1954.

Opinion as to the sufficiency of the present law in Birmingham if properly carried out and if drinking during the prohibited hours on Sunday morning were effectually prevented; suggestions hereon for a better system of supervision, Wadhams 7983. 8003-8006. 8009-8013. 8038-8040. 8072—System of free libraries in the town; statement as to these not being open on Sunday, ib. 7987-7993. 8016-8022.

Black Country. (Wolverhampton, &c.) Examination relative to the habits of the people, and the amount of drunkenness in the black country, with reference to the expediency of further restriction in the district, Segrave 7391-7412. 7507-7509.

BOLTON :

The population of Bolton is 76,000, and there is a large majority in favour of closing public-houses on Sunday, as evidenced at public meetings on the subject; particulars hereon, Barlow 4023-4036. 4066, 4067. 4135-4157—Explanation relative to a recent house-to-house canvass of the householders, the mode in which conducted, and the extent of feeling elicited for and against Sunday closing; conclusion as to the fairness of the canvass, and as to there being a large majority in favour of closing, ib. 4026-4030. 4091-4134. 4280. 4282-4303—Opportunities of witness for knowing the feeling of the working classes in favour of increased restrictions on Sunday; belief that the Bill would be accepted by them without disturbance, ib. 4037-4046.

Larger number of drunken cases brought before the magistrates for the period from Saturday night to Monday morning than for the rest of the week, Barlow 4047-4050. 4202-4216. 4259-4262. 4266-4269—Very little inconvenience to Sunday excursionists if the Bill be passed, ib. 4056-4062. 4158-4160. 4088-4090—Strong feeling in favour of Mr. Somes' Bill for Sunday closing, ib. 4066, 4067. 4280, 4281—Beneficial operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, ib. 4068-4071. 4077-4080—Belief that all the newspapers in Bolton advocate Sunday closing, ib. 4241-4246.

Statistics of drunkenness in Bolton on Saturday, on Sunday, and on other days in each of the years 1862-67; large decrease since 1862; Staton 7088, 7089. 7241-7243—Increase in the number of police; the drunken cases being more closely looked after, ib. 7093-7095. 7244. 7245—Belief that the bulk of the population of Bolton and its neighbourhood is decidedly against any further restriction, ib. 7103, 7104. 7149.

Detail in contradiction of certain evidence of the Mayor of Bolton as to the results of a canvass of the householders, and of public meetings on the question of increased restriction. Staton 7107-7110. 7137-7158. 7171-7173. 7184-7190. 7193-7248. 7291-7306. 7315, 7316—Practice as to Sunday excursions at Bolton; great inconvenience to the excursionists if the Bill be passed, ib. 7128-7136—Strong objection by publicans to the Bill, ib. 7151-7154. 7159-7162—Considerable dissatisfaction caused by the Act of 1854, ib. 7155-7158—Inaccuracy of a statement that all the local newspapers are in favour of Sunday closing, 7173, 7174. 7205-7209. 7315, 7316—Statement as to the town council not representing public opinion, ib. 7185-7190. 7291-7295.

See also Music (Public-houses).

Bottled Beer. Facilities for keeping beer in the house in bottle for Sunday use, by obtaining it on Saturday, Lupton 3086. 3156-3159; Mackie 4394-4397; Potter 5097-5099.

Bradford. Large number of persons counted by witness in public-houses and beer-shops in Bradford on Sunday evening; much larger number than on week-day evenings, Jowett 3544-3551. 3700-3710—Belief that further restrictions on Sunday sale of liquor would be approved by a vast majority of the working classes and of the inhabitants generally; data for this conclusion, ib. 3552 et seq.—Strong feeling in favour of total closing, though the present Bill would be accepted as a great boon, ib. 3553-3576—Probable difference of opinion among working men in Bradford as to the extent of restriction desirable, ib. 3646-3655—Statement that on week-day evenings witness found only half the number of people in public-houses that he found on Sunday, ib. 3700-3710.

Returns of the number of persons found in public-houses, in different districts, on Sunday evening, as compared with other evenings; large excess on Sunday, App. 422.

Brighton. Comparatively large number of drunken cases brought before witness (as magistrate) on Monday, the results of drinking on Saturday and Sunday, Bigge 1968-1971. 2043. 2165-2168—Belief that the Bill would not cause any serious confusion in the town, or any popular discontent, ib. 2052-2055. 2170, 2171.

Bristol. Opinion that there is at Bristol more drinking on Sunday than on other days, Matheus 6089, 6090—Details of the results of public meetings, and of a house to house canvass in Bristol, showing a large majority in favour of Sunday closing of public-houses; the canvass, however, was for certain reasons very incomplete, ib. 6091-6103. 6108, 402—I.

6109—A considerable number of the electors, though only a small minority of the whole, have signed an address in favour of the Bill, Matthews 6104-6107—The labouring classes are largely in favour of total closing on Sunday, ib. 6110-6112.

Explanation as regards a requisition to witness, signed by 1,580 electors of Bristol, to vote for the present Bill, that there was a counter-requisition from 4,000 electors, asking him to take an independent course in the matter, The Hon. F. H. F. Berkeley, 6578-6591—Decided feeling in Bristol against further restriction, Candelet 8565, 8566.

Burcham, Thomas Borrow. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is magistrate at the Southwark Police Court, 476, 477—Considerable diminution during the last two years in the number of drunken cases and criminal charges brought before witness on Monday as well as on other days, 478-484. 495. 501. 619—Doubt as to the diminution of drunkenness in witness's district being owing to the increased restrictions under the Act of 1864 upon the sale of drink, more especially on Sunday; belief that it is due rather to the improved education and morality of the people, 485-492. 495-501. 552-568. 603. 619, 620—Opinion that drunkenness does not prevail among the working classes to the extent that is generally supposed, 489. 512-514.

Sufficiency generally of the police regulations for preventing illicit sale on Sunday, 493. 623—Disapproval of any increase of restriction upon the sale of drink on Sunday, as not being called for by the morals or the habits of the people, at least in Southwark, 494-502 et seq.—Doubt as to the improved morality in witness's district being at all connected with the operation of the Act of 1864; 495-501. 555. 591. 603—Information relative to the Sunday trading in the district as regards the necessities of life; conclusion that neither in this respect nor in the case of the sale of liquor is there any need for further restriction, 502-511. 521-545. 622-626.

Absence of excess in the number of drunken cases brought before witness on Monday morning, 506-509—Great boon to those employed in public-houses, if Sunday were more a day of rest for them, 517-520—Doubt as to the frequent occurrence of disorder in the New Cut on Sunday morning and evening, 531-545—Opinion that the men employed on the river side have not become more intemperate in their habits, 546-551.

Question considered whether the returns which may be had from witness's court will confirm his statement as to the improved habits and morals of the people, and the decrease of drunkenness in the district, 568-585—Approval of restrictions upon the sale of liquor if they are not carried too far, the opinion of witness being that the proper limit for such restrictions has already been reached, 586-595.

Consideration of certain returns showing the much greater amount of Sunday drunkenness in Southwark police district before the Acts of 1854 and 1855; probability of the great improvement subsequently having been owing to the much shorter time of opening the public-houses on Sunday, 596-603—Bad moral state of Kent-street and the Mint, though not so infamous as in former years, 604-609—Check by means of the publicans upon excessive drinking in public-houses, 610-614—Prejudicial effect of the Bill if it led to increased drinking in private houses, not under control, 615-618.

Burns, Dawson. See St. Pancras.

Bushell, Christopher. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a magistrate for Cheshire; resides at Neston, near Birkenhead, 4654-4650—Conclusion as to the exceedingly detrimental effect of the opening of public-houses and beer-shops on Sunday, 4657—Very general feeling among the wives of working men in favour of universal restriction, 4659—Statement showing the desire of the publicans and beer-shop keepers in the parish of Neston for further restriction; failure, however, after a time, of a voluntary agreement on their part to carry out the provisions contained in the present Bill, 4661. 4668. 4677. 4679. 4756-4760.

Belief that the people generally would regard the Bill as a blessing, though the habitual drinkers would doubtless be opposed to it, 4663. 4727-4732. 4756-4762—General feeling of the Cheshire magistrates in favour of the Bill, 4664—Excessive amount of drinking in witness's district on Sunday, 4665—Excessive drinking also on Saturday night, so that witness would propose to close the public-houses at ten o'clock in the evening, 4666, 4667.

Very injurious effect of the present system of sale on Sunday in regard to the publicans then selves, both in a religious and a moral sense, 4667, 4668. 4677. 4681. 4719-4726—Approval of the moderate character of the restrictions in the Bill, rather than of a Bill for immediate and total closing on Sunday; good prospect of total closing in course of time, 4669. 4673, 4674, 4675. 4762—Inconsistency in public-houses being permitted to be open whilst shops generally are closed, 4669. 4740-4749.

Considerable

Considerable evasion of existing restrictions in witness's district, 4670, 4671—Expectation that under the Bill publicans would take a better interest in the prevention of illicit drinking, 4672. 4680—Importance attached to the proposed prohibition of consumption on the premises, rather than to a mere limitation of the hours of sale, 4674, 4675—Effect of the present system in country towns and villages in preventing working men taking short excursions with their families, the beer-house being a greater attraction to many, 4675. 4677.

Inadequacy of a system of six days' licences as a means towards Sunday closing, 4676—Necessity of all publicans being under the same compulsion as to closing, 4677—Way in which, in Neston parish, the present system acts very prejudicially upon the families of working men, 4677-4679. 4715-4718—Probable increase of private drinking at home if the Bill be passed, 4680. 4769.

Argument that the public-house should not be looked upon as the poor man's club, and that the richer classes are already subject to many restrictions on the Sunday, 4680. 4682-4714. 4750-4753. 4781, 4782—Sufficient facility under the Bill in the case of persons wishing to drink in their own houses on Sunday, whilst the temptation of public-house drinking would be avoided, 4733-4735. 4769-4772—Justification of restrictive legislation in the interests of religion and morality, rather than the present law, antagonistic to such interests, 4735-4742. 5780-4783.

Interest of the publicans in promoting the sale of drink on Sunday, and thereby encouraging drunkenness, 4763-4768—Decided decrease of drunkenness in the district around Neston, 4773-4775—Instances of high wages leading to an increase of drinking, there being also much drinking in times of depression and bad trade, 4776, 4777.

Difficulty as to means of innocent recreation for the rural classes on Sunday, 4778-4780—Primary importance of removing the temptation to drink, 4780—Great importance attached also to improvement of the dwellings of the lower classes, 4785.

Buxton, Mr. Reference to the former views of Mr. Buxton, the brewer, upon the question of a Permissive Bill, Leicester 5770-5781.

C.

Candelet, George. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is secretary to the Manchester and Salford Licensed Victuallers' Association, and the Provincial Licensed Victuallers' Defence League; constitution and object of each association, 8489-8493—Strong movement in Manchester in 1855 for the repeal of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, 8494, 8495—Reference to the distinction made by the present Bill between the hours of sale of liquors in London and in the provinces, 8496, 8497—Unanimous objection to the Bill by a delegate meeting of licensed victuallers, held at Manchester on 5th February 1868; several resolutions adopted by the meeting, showing the various grounds of objection, 8498, 8499. 8510, 8511.

Exceptions taken to the statistics submitted to the Committee by Capt. Palin upon the subject of drunkenness in Manchester on Sunday and on week days; different results, according to witness's calculations, 8500-8508. 8523-8525—Statement as to the Watch Committee being influenced by the agitation in the town in favour of the Bill, 8503. 8547-8551. 8598-8603—Voluntary closing on Sunday by some few publicans in the town, 8509—Difficulty and litigation under the Bill, not only as to the meaning of the term bonâ fide traveller, but also of the term bonâ fide meal, 8511-8514. 8655-8662.

Objection to the proposal for a system of six days' licences, if the license for the whole week is to be increased beyond the present amount, 8515, 8516. 8575, 8576—Estimate of 90,000,000 l. as the capital in the licensed victuallers' trade and in beer-houses in the United Kingdom, 8517-8519—Effect of the Bill to compel most publicans to close entirely on Sunday, 8520. 8681-8683—Calculation that the Bill would entail a loss of 8,000 l. a week to the 5,430 licensed victuallers comprising the Provincial Defence League, 8520. 8608-8613. 8727, 8728—Loss of week-day business in the case of those who close voluntarily on Sunday, 8521, 8522.

Evidence in support of the statement that the Bill would prove a great inconvenience and injury to friendly societies, 8526-8531. 8646-8654. 8688-8694—Satisfactory working in France of the system of unrestricted sale of liquor on Sunday; letter hereon from a licensed victualler at Calais, 8533, 8534. 8572-8574. 8695-8702—Great improvement in the moral and educational character of the people of Manchester, 8535, 8536—Conviction that increased restrictions would not diminish drunkenness, 8537—Effect of the Bill greatly to increase the evils of illicit and private drinking, 8537-8539.

Objection to the household canvass carried out in Manchester by supporters of the Bill, as being of an ex parte character, 8540, 8541—Excess of petitions against the Bill at one period, as compared with the petitions in its favour, 8540—Statement showing an exceedingly small number of cases of drunkenness in the metropolis between one p.m.

on Sundays and one o'clock on Mondays in 1866; 8542-8546—Very small number of Sunday cases in the more important provincial towns in 1866, according to returns from the chief constables, 8546.

Comment upon a letter from the Rev. J. Garrett, as showing that the advocates of the Bill regard it only as an instalment towards further restriction, 8551, 8552—Exceptional course pursued in getting up agitation and petitions in support of the Bill; belief as to the expenditure of large sums in promoting petitions, 8556-8566. 8616-8625. 8645—Unfounded character of a statement, that a certain testimonial presented to Mr. Berkeley in 1856 (including 1,012 l. in money), proceeded from the licensed victuallers exclusively, 8567-8571. 8626-8633.

Examination as to witness having omitted from his statement of the amount of Sunday drunkenness all those cases in which drunkenness was coupled with other offences, 8577-8597—Frequent instances of drunkenness being the result rather than the cause of crime, 8590-8595—Objection to the functions of the police being too strictly exercised in watching the public-houses and in apprehending drunken persons, 8599-8607—Approval of past restrictions, whereas further restrictions would clash with public opinion, 8614, 8615.

Statement that the licensed victuallers, though possibly actuated primarily by self-interest in their opposition to the Bill, are also influenced in the matter by the convenience of the public, 8634-8638. 8685-8687. 8729-8733—Denial that any of the witnesses before the Committee have received money from the Provincial Victuallers' Association, 8639-8644—Question considered, whether there has not been a larger comparative increase of beer-houses in Manchester than of the means of education, 8663-8674. 8706-8708.

Examination showing that the combined petitions in favour of total closing on Sunday, and of the present Bill, exceed those against the Bill; explanation on this point, 8675-8687. 8716-8726—Probable effect of temperance societies in checking drunkenness at Manchester, 8703-8705—Advantage if beer-sellers were under the same license as licensed victuallers, 8708.

Circumstance of there having been more cases of drunkenness in Manchester after the increase of the spirit duties in 1860 than previously; this may have been owing to the consumption of spirits which evaded duty, 8709-8712—Dissent from a statement that the police largely connive at illicit drinking on Sunday, 8713-8715—Probability of the same persons having to a large extent signed the petitions in favour of the Bill and the petitions in favour of total closing, 8721-8726.

Canvass of Householders. See Public Opinion.

Canvass of Workshops. See Working Classes, 2, 3.

Capital (Licensed Victuallers, &c.) Very large capital employed in the licensed victuallers' trade; serious deterioration of profits and of capital by the proposed restrictions, Wadhams 8023-8025. 8060-8068—Estimate of 90,000,000 l. as the capital in the licensed victuallers' trade and in beer-houses in the United Kingdom, Candelet 8517-8519.

Chichester. Statement of the result of a house-to-house canvass at Chichester upon the question of Sunday closing, Steinthal 3753.

Chief Constables. Varying opinions of chief constables upon the question of Sunday closing, Steinthal 3728.

Class Legislation. Denial that liberty in drinking is liberty for evil; evil rather of any class legislation on the subject, Waygood 7062-7065. 7079-7084. See also Clubs.

Clergy, The. Unanimity of feeling among the clergy of all classes, including the Roman Catholic clergy, in favour of restriction, Garrett 2195. 2212—General feeling at Leeds of the clergy of all denominations favourable to the Bill, Jackson 3270-3273.

Clubs. Absence of analogy between clubs and private houses as regards the question of restrictions, Bigge 2016-2030. 2050—Unfairness of comparison between clubs and public-houses as regards the question of facility for procuring drink on Sunday, Garrett 2349-2351—Repudiation by working men of the notion that the public-house is looked upon by them as a club, Hall 2524-2527. 2609—Dangerous temptation offered to the working classes by public-houses, even though frequented much in the same way as clubs are by the upper classes, McLaren 2793. 2821-2827.

Circumstance of some workmen at Sheffield having voted against total closing on Sunday, on the ground that clubs were not closed, Flather 4591-4596—Argument that the public-house should not be looked upon as the poor man's club, and that the richer classes are already subject to many restrictions on the Sunday, Bushell 4680. 4682-4714. 4750-4753. 4781, 4782—Facility for forming working men's clubs, and for for providing beer, &c. there on Sunday, Howard 4825. 4828; Freshwater 4902, 4903—Objection raised by some working men at Bedford to the closing of public-houses whilst the clubs are open, Freshwater 4902.

Doubt as to abuse arising at Bolton in connection with the holding of clubs in public-houses; there have, however, been complaints on the subject, Staton 7284-7288. 7309-7314.

Cockburn, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is manager of certain mines in Yorkshire and Durham, employing some 2,600 men; has had a long and intimate acquaintance with the habits and feelings of the mining population of the north of England 5924-5931—Statistics showing the much larger proportion of men off work in the mines on the first three days of the week than on the other three days, owing to the effect of Sunday drinking 5932-5936. 6059-6061—Good wages of the miners, their condition being very comfortable, save in the case of those who indulge in drink and neglect their work, 5937-5939. 5954-5962—Increased liability to accidents early in the week, owing to the drinking on Sunday, 5938. 5940.

Decided improvement of late years in the habits of the Yorkshire miners, this being due in part to the increased restriction on Sunday drinking: belief that the restriction may be carried further, as proposed by the Bill, with increased benefit, 5941-5946. 5955, et seq.—Opinion of the majority of the working men in favour of further restriction: expediency of legislating in accordance with such opinion, as being for the general good, even though some individual inconvenience might be produced, 5947, 5948. 5959 et seq.

Satisfactory attendance of the miners at places of religious worship, whilst they have otherwise strict views as to Sabbath observance, 5949. 5973-5978. 5990-5992. 6063-6071—Serious loss to the employers as well as the men, through the latter being frequently off work for some days in the week, 5950-5954. 5969-5971—Very little inconvenience by the Bill to such of the men as are lodgers, 5966-5968—Few excursions in witness's district, the locality itself being very attractive, 5972-6025—Question considered, whether, instead of increased restrictions on Sunday drinking, means of recreation might not be tried, in order to counteract the influence of the public-houses; dissent from this proposition, 5973-5981. 6018-6027. 6062-6076.

Grounds for concluding that the present Bill would not give rise to an increase of home drinking on Sunday in witness's district, 6003-6017. 6036, 6037. 6043-6048—Expediency of legislative restriction as regards the minority in the district who cannot resist the temptation of the public-house on Sunday, 6026, 6027. 6030-6035. 6038-6042. 6065-6078—Opinion as to the sufficiency generally of the facilities to the working classes for procuring beer, &c. for Sunday consumption at home, the inconvenience being but little, 6028, 6029. 6050—Explanation that witness is opposed to the Permissive Bill, though he advocates legislation in accordance with the wishes of the majority of the people in his own locality, 6077-6085.

Compulsory Closing. Preference for a compulsory measure in districts outside large towns, Lupton 3176—Necessity of all publicans being under the same compulsion as to closing, Bushell 4677—Expediency of compulsory regulations, though there are thousands of the working classes who voluntarily keep out of public-houses on Sunday, Potter 5119-5128—Grounds for objecting to compulsory closing, though approving of voluntary closing, Wilson 7958-7961—Much greater effect of total and compulsory closing than of voluntary effort and moral suasion, Johnes 8761.

CONSUMPTION ON PREMISES:

1. Evidence opposed to Prohibition of Consumption on the Premises on Sunday.
2. Evidence favourable to Prohibition.

1. Evidence opposed to Prohibition of Consumption on the Premises on Sunday:

Strong objection to the provision of the Bill, that all liquor sold on Sunday must not be drunk on the premises; great evasion thereby, Sir R. Mayne 277-289—Grounds for strongly objecting to any prohibition of drinking on the premises on Sunday, as leading to much evasion, and to drinking in the streets and at home, Sir T. Henry 426-430—Objectionable result of the Bill as leading to the working classes indulging in drink in their own houses, instead of in comfortable public-houses under the landlord's supervision, Sir T. Henry 452; Woolrych 665-667. 683, 684. 723-726—Disapproval of the working classes and their families being compelled to drink in their uncomfortable houses on Sunday, or to their being prohibited from drinking in public-houses, Woolrych 767-777. 802-809.

1. Evidence opposed to Prohibition, &c.—continued.

Probability of drinking in the streets being the result of prohibiting consumption on the premises; interference of the police if this led to any obstruction or disorder, Greig 917, 918. 938-945—Expected opposition at Liverpool to the prohibition of consumption on the premises, but for which witness would approve of such prohibition, ib. 1121-1134—Admission that the prohibition of drinking on the premises would involve hardship, ib. 1175. 1194—Doubt whether a prohibition of consumption on the premises would lead to a decrease of drunkenness at Manchester, Palin 1310.

More restrictive character of present Bill than of the Bill of last Session, on account of the proposed prohibition of consumption on the premises, Wadhams 7970-7975. 8062—Effect of the Bill to compel most publicans to close entirely on Sunday, Candelet 8520. 8681-8683.

2. Evidence favourable to Prohibition :

Opinion of witness that the present Bill should be passed as a permissive measure experimentally, and that though inconvenience would doubtless result from the prohibition of consumption on the premises, the benefits would much preponderate, Avery 1828-1838. 1841. 1856, 1857—Beneficial effects anticipated in Brighton from prohibiting drinking on the premises on Sunday; belief that the inconvenience to the working classes, lodgers, &c., would be very limited, Bigge 1972-1980. 2005 et seq.—Improbability of any systematic drinking at the doors of public-houses in the New Cut, &c., if drinking on the premises be prohibited, Garrett 2271, 2272.

Importance of prohibiting consumption on the premises as a means of keeping the working classes more at home with their families, Archbishop Manning 2373—Approval of total prohibition of consumption on the premises on Sunday, rather than of further restriction of the hours of sale, Hall 2559-2566—Examination to the effect that witness does not propose to deprive working men of opportunities to obtain drink on Sunday for consumption at home, whilst if the houses were entirely closed on that day it might be obtained in bottle on the previous evening, Lupton 3083-3102. 3156-3159.

Excellent effects anticipated from an entire prohibition of consumption on the premises on Sunday; grounds for this conclusion, Jackson 3240 et seq.—Absence of any real hardship to the working classes in Manchester, if prevented from consuming liquor in the public-houses, or if required to purchase their Sunday beer on Saturday night, Mackie 4388-4397—Approval of the principle of closing for consumption on the premises, Enright 4465-4468.

Importance attached to the proposed prohibition of consumption on the premises, rather than to a mere limitation of the hours of sale, Bushell 4674, 4675—Sufficient facility under the Bill in the case of persons wishing to drink in their own houses on Sunday, whilst the temptation of public-house drinking would be avoided, ib. 4733-4735. 4769-4772—Great boon if drink were not allowed to be consumed on the premises, this being far preferable to a mere limitation of the hours of sale, Freshwater 4877. 4883, 4884. 4968-4971—Little if any inconvenience to be caused by prohibiting consumption on the premises, whereas the benefits would be great, both socially and morally, ib. 4888 et seq.

Great advantage without any real inconvenience by prohibiting consumption on the premises, Potter 5068-5070—Very little inconvenience by prohibiting consumption on the premises on Sunday, compared with the good to be effected, Newall 5229-5233. 5242-5247. 5292-5295—Decided approval of prohibiting consumption on the premises rather than of merely limiting the hours of sale, Murphy 5518.

Great importance attached to the prohibition of consumption on the premises, Leicester 5682, 5683—Valuable check to intemperance by requiring the drink to be consumed off the premises, there being but little drunkenness in the houses of the people, Mc Cree 6211—Approval of entirely prohibiting drinking on the premises as a preventive to drunkenness, Johnes 8743, 8744. 8749.

DRUNKENNESS :

1. Amount of Drunkenness in the Metropolis in different Years, and Proportion due to Sunday.
2. Provincial Towns.
3. Female Drunkenness.
4. Excess of Drunkenness beyond the Amount shown by the Police Returns.
5. Effect of Employment and the Rate of Wages.
6. Effect of Restrictions upon the Sale of Liquor.
7. Conclusions of the Committee.

1. Amount of Drunkenness in the Metropolis in different Years, and Proportion due to Sunday :

Statistics of the amount of drunkenness in the metropolis since the year 1831 ; conclusion as to the favourable operation of the Acts 18 & 19 Vict. and 27 & 28 Vict., Sir R. Mayne 9-14. 18-23. 38—Information relative to the number of cases of drunkenness on Sunday as compared with other days, the result being that the Sunday cases are only half the number of those on other days, ib. 28-34—Occurrence of the greater number of drunken cases in the after part of the day, ib. 66-68.

Witness considers that the cases of drunkenness in the metropolis have decreased in number, owing to the improved tastes and habits of the people, Sir T. Henry 341-352. 364. 372-374. 380-382—More drunken cases on Tuesday morning than on Monday morning, ib. 358. 437. 469, 470—Very little excess in the public-houses on Sunday evening under the present regulations, ib. 466-468—Opinion that drunkenness does not prevail among the working classes to the extent that is generally supposed, Burcham 489. 512-514—Impression that as many cases of drunkenness arise on Sunday as on Saturday or any other day in the week, Ellison 819-829.

Calculation that out of about 4,000,000 people in the metropolitan district not more than 2,000 have been charged in one year with drunkenness and crimes arising out of drunkenness, Winterbotham 6565—Very small per-centage of drunkenness which takes place on Sunday, ib. 6632—Further statement as regards drunkenness in London, that the population is probably far short of 4,000,000, and that the 2,000 drunken cases before referred to occurred on Sundays exclusively, ib. 6723-6731—Denial that any serious amount of evil arises in the metropolis from Sunday drinking, ib. 6744.

Statement showing an exceedingly small number of cases of drunkenness in the metropolis between one p.m. on Sunday and one o'clock on Mondays in 1866, Candelet 8542-8546—Examination as to witness having omitted from his statement of the amount of Sunday drunkenness all those cases in which drunkenness was coupled with other offences, ib. 8577-8597.

Return showing the number of persons charged by the metropolitan police with being drunk during each of the years 1831-40, App. 413—Also the number charged during the years 1858-67, ib.

Returns of the number of persons apprehended by the metropolitan police for being drunk, and drunk and disorderly, in 1866 and in 1867, distinguishing the number on Sunday, App. 414.

Number of charges of drunkenness at the several metropolitan police stations on Sundays during 1867 ; total of 704 charges, App. 421.

2. Provincial Towns :

Issue of circulars by the Central Sunday Closing Association to the chief constables of various towns, the replies showing that there is an unduly large proportion of drunkenness on Sunday as compared with week days, Steinthal 3727. 3728. 3762.

Very small number of Sunday cases in the more important provincial towns in 1866, according to returns from the chief constables, Candelet 8546.

Returns from the chief constables of various towns for 1866 and 1867, showing the amount of drunkenness on Sunday and on the six days of the week ; undue proportion on Sunday, App. 427.

3. Female Drunkenness :

Increasing amount of drunkenness among females in the metropolis, Sir R. Mayne 26, 27—Frequency of drunkenness among women through their buying gin in bottles, and bringing it home, Sir T. Henry 383-385—Large proportion of drunkenness among women, Ellison 869, 870—Belief that drunkenness among women is on the increase, Ellison 870 ; White 2970 ; McCree 6129.

Opinion that at Liverpool drunkenness is increasing among women, and that there are probably as many female cases as male cases, Greig 996-998. 1000—Statement of the the proportion of drunkenness among women at Manchester, Palin 1342-1344 — Increase of drunkenness among women at Sheffield, Jackson 1485-1487 — Small number of women charged with drunkenness in Birmingham, Glossop 1694-1696.

Spread of drinking habits among men and women and children, Archbishop Manning 2374, 2394, 2432-2434 — Doubt as to drunkenness being on the increase among women, Hall 2518, 2519 — Understanding as to its being the rule of the women in London to drink gin, whilst the men, as a rule, drink beer, M'Laren 2796 — Practice of the women in Liverpool to drink gin rather than beer, White 2969, 2970 — Prevalence of drinking among women at Wolverhampton, Segrave 7373, 7364, 7490, 7491.

Return showing the number of females charged by the metropolitan police with being drunk in each of the years 1831-40, App. 413 — Also the number charged during the years 1858-67, ib.

4. Excess of Drunkenness beyond the Amount shown by the Police Returns :

Belief that the evil of drunkenness has been steadily increasing, and that the police returns on the subject are far from representing the real extent of the evil, Archbishop Manning 2364-2367, 2401-2405 — Inadequacy of the police statistics as a means of indicating the real amount of drunkenness in any place, Steinthal 3729, 3765 — Necessity of visiting the homes of the people in order to ascertain the extent to which drinking is carried, ib. 3729, 3766-3769.

Statement showing that there were, a few years ago, 301 public-houses and beer-shops in a district south of the Thames, not a mile square, and that they lead to an immense amount of drinking and of drunkenness on Sunday evening, Murphy 5436-5439, 5476-5482, 5524-5537 — Opinion that drunkenness is quite as prevalent in London as it ever was, Leicester 5879-5881 — Fallacy of the police returns of drunkenness, M'Cree 6143-6145.

5. Effect of Employment and the Rate of Wages :

Diminution of drunkenness in periods of distress, Sir R. Mayne 211-213 — Decrease of drunkenness in times of distress; frequent instances, however, of women resorting to drink when in distress, Sir T. Henry 369, 370 — Increased indulgence in drink, according as wages are higher, Lupton 3214-3216; Leicester 5663, 5664, 5812-5814, 5887; Segrave 7450, 7451 — Opinion that high wages do not lead to an increase of intemperance, Flather 4587-4590 — Instances of high wages leading to an increase of drinking, there being also much drinking in times of depression and bad trade, Bushell 4776, 4777.

6. Effect of Restrictions upon the Sale of Liquor :

Consideration of the changes in the metropolis at various periods since 1831, in the hours of opening on Sunday in connection with the number of drunken cases at such periods; conclusion that the increase of restriction has doubtless led to decrease of drunkenness, Sir R. Mayne 9-14, 18-23, 38, 140-159, 165-172, 188, 189, 202, 218 — Probability of closing at ten in the evening, having the effect of further reducing the number of drunken cases, ib. 119, 129, 130.

Opinion that the amount of drunkenness is not much regulated by the limitation of the hours, Sir T. Henry 347-352, 375-382 — Probability of the Bill increasing rather than diminishing drunkenness, ib. 359-361 — Doubt as to any great increase of sobriety on Sunday being owing to the restrictions hitherto on the hours of opening of the public-houses, ib. 375-382 — Reasons for not relying on returns as a satisfactory test of the increase or decrease of drunkenness in connection with restrictions on the sale of drink, ib. 387, 388, 397, 398, 435.

Decreased number of cases if the public-houses were closed an earlier hour at night, Jackson 1478-1480, 1533-1535 — Decided effect of restrictions in diminishing drunkenness, Avery 1858-1861, 1952 — Concurrence in the view as to the salutary effect of restrictions upon the sale of drink in diminishing drunkenness, Bigge 1972-1980, 1986, 1987, 1995; Eldridge 3849-3853, 3881 et seq.; Murphy 5420, 5421, 5544, 5545, 5609-5613 — Large diminution expected in the excessive consumption of beer on Sunday, if proper restrictions be applied, Archbishop Manning 2380-2382 — Decided effect of restrictions in diminishing drunkenness, though there may be some increase of evasions, ib. 2424, 2429, 2430.

Conclusion that further restrictions will surely lead to a decrease of drunkenness, Hall 2545 — Decided effect of increased restriction upon sale in further diminishing drunkenness, M'Laren 2717, 2718 — Effect generally of increased restrictions upon sale in decreasing drunkenness, Barlow 4063-4065, 4191-4197, 4274 — Question whether there may not be more drunkenness on the part of witness's customers on week days, through his closing on Sunday, Mackie 4365-4370.

Effect of existing restrictions in diminishing drunkenness, Flather 4586—Conclusion that the greater the facilities for drinking, the greater the drunkenness, Leicester 5681—Decrease of drunkenness as restriction is increased, M'Cree 6164-6166. 6188.

Admission that closing up to one o'clock on Sunday has aided in diminishing drunkenness, witness believing, however, that further restriction would not produce further diminution, Morrell 6443-6447—Very little, if any, decrease of drunkenness on Sunday by the proposed restrictions, Winterbotham 6678, 6679. 6702—Statement that restriction does not prevent drunkenness, Wayford 7035-7040. 7047-7049; Wybergh 7549, et seq. 7692—Probability of increased drinking on other days, if the public-houses were closed on Sunday, Aitken, 8189—Conviction that increased restrictions would not diminish drunkenness, Candelet 8537.

7. Conclusions of the Committee:

Small per-centage who drink to excess, out of the whole number who make use of public-houses on Sunday, Rep. iii—Satisfactory working of the present law, a great diminution of drunkenness having taken place under its operation, ib. iv—Several other causes besides restrictive legislation to which the improved habits of the people and the decrease of intemperance are owing, ib. iv, v.

Grounds for hoping that the vice of drunkenness will gradually disappear from the working classes, without the necessity of further legislative restrictions, Rep. iv, v—Far more temperate habits of the upper and middle classes than in former years, ib. v—Expected similar improvement, in course of time, as regards the working classes, ib.

Dundee. Great extent to which illicit drinking is carried in Dundee on Sunday, Waygood 7040. 7043.

Dwellings of the Lower Classes. Great importance attached to improved dwellings for the lower classes in London and other large places as a means of counteracting the attractions of the public-houses, Archbishop Manning 2386. 2426. 2454. 2478-2489. 2502—Decided improvement in the homes of the working classes under the proposed restrictions, Lupton 3103, 3104. 3199-3201; Jackson 3242; Walker 3397-3401. 3404, 3405.

Frequent instances of the miserable homes of the working classes being owing to the public-houses, Archbishop Manning 2385. 2435-2437. 2501—Dissent from the view that in the present miserable state of the dwellings of the lower classes it is a grievance to working men to shut them out of the public-houses, ib. 2455. 2478-2489. 2504—Effect of drinking habits in rendering still more wretched the wretched homes of the labouring classes, Hall 2537, 2538.

Great importance attached to improvement of the dwellings of the lower classes, Bushell 4785—Important benefit of restriction in leading to improved homes, Murphy 5521, 5522—Importance of improved dwellings for the lower classes as a counter attraction to the public-houses; steps being taken in Liverpool towards this end, Wybergh 7682. 7684-7687—Improved dwellings in parts of Wales consequent on increased temperance, many of the working classes living in houses of their own, Johnes 8765, 8766.

Edinburgh. Information relative to the movement set on foot in Edinburgh in 1852, and the measures adopted by the magistrates for closing the public-houses on Sunday, M'Laren 2666—Great prevalence of drunkenness on Sunday before the public-houses were (for the most part) closed, as compared with the state of things subsequently, ib. 2666, 2667.

Statistics showing the great decrease of drunkenness in Edinburgh on week days and on Sunday since the operation of Forbes Mackenzie's Act in 1854, M'Laren 2679-2685—Great diminution of drunken cases on Saturday and Monday by closing the public-houses on the intervening day, ib. 2685—Very few beer-houses in Edinburgh, ib. 2838.

With regard to the small per-centage of drunkenness in Edinburgh, on the part of those who used to frequent public-houses on Sunday, it does not follow that Sunday closing is non-beneficial or objectionable to the large majority who do not indulge to excess, M'Laren 2849-2853.

Education. Importance of improved education as a check upon intemperance, Morrell 6312; Wybergh 7682; Beal 7761.

Eldridge, John Smith. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been clerk to the magistrates at Southampton for twenty-five years, 3838—Statement relative to the satisfactory operation in the town of a local Act in 1844 and of the general Act of 1848 upon the subject of restrictions on the sale of drink and other articles on Sunday, 3839-3848—

Adoption by the town council in 1865 of Sir George Grey's Act of 1864, the result being a continued improvement in the state of the town as regards drunkenness, 3846. 3854-3857—Approval of the restrictive policy hitherto as regards Sunday drinking and Sunday trading, and approval also of the further restrictions under the present Bill as tending to a further diminution of drunkenness, 3849-3853. 3881 et seq.

Feeling of a portion of the working classes of Southampton in favour of Sunday closing, 3858. 3859. 3875. 3914-3919—Willingness of some of the publicans to close on Sunday, 3860—Belief that a majority of the borough magistrates are favourable to further restrictions, 3861-3867. 3950-3954—Opinion that there is more drunkenness on Sunday than on other days, 3868-3874—Infringement of the present restrictive law, further restrictions leading probably to increased infringements, 3876-3880. 3904-3906. 3978-3984.

Probable inconvenience to lodgers, and to the large floating population attached to shipping, by applying the proposed Bill to Southampton, 3888-3897. 3936-3946. 4013-4021—Opinion as to the sufficiency of the hours named in the Bill for the sale of beer to be consumed at home by the working classes with their meals, 3898-3913—Further statement that though drunkenness is on the decrease in the town, and though some inconvenience might arise from further restrictions on the Sunday, witness is, on the whole, favourable to an increase of restrictive policy, 3920 et seq.

Elliott, Samuel. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Timber merchant at Plymouth; is well conversant with the habits of the working classes of the town, 5305-5310—Considers that Sunday drinking is a source of great evil, and is in favour of total closing on that day, 5311-5313—Feeling of the great majority of the working classes of Plymouth and of the public generally in favour of further restriction, so that the present Bill would not be likely to provoke any disturbance, 5314-5326. 5334-5337. 5360, 5361—Considerable improvement in the habits of the people, 5327, 5328—More rapid improvement if the Bill be passed, 5329, 5330—Strong feeling in Cornwall in favour of restriction, 5331-5333.

Great advantage of Sunday closing, as compared with the small amount of inconvenience, 5338-5341. 5349-5351—Belief that the publicans at Plymouth are, generally, opposed to the Bill, though it would be a great comfort to them and their families to have a day's rest on Sunday, 5342-5349—Origination of much poverty and crime through drunkenness, 5349-5351—Injurious effect of the public-houses on Sunday schools, 5352-5354—Feeling of the clergy of Plymouth in favour of total or partial closing, 5358-5360.

Probable inconvenience to the large seafaring population of the port, if the Bill be adopted, 5362-5375. 5394-5400—Argument that the minority should give way to the majority on the question of Sunday closing, and of legislation generally, 5376-5388—Improvement by limiting the hours of sale, as named in the Bill, even though consumption on the premises be not prohibited, 5389-5393. 5401, 5402.

Ellison, Cuthbert Edmond. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is magistrate of the Worship-street Police Court, the district of which comprises a very large and poor population, 813-816—Large proportion of the charges before witness which are connected with drunkenness, 817, 818—Impression that as many cases of drunkenness arise on Sunday as on Saturday or any other day in the week, 819-829—Probability of persons laying in drink at home before the hours of closing, if there are increased restrictions on the sale of liquor on Sunday, 830, 831.

Inconvenience to the middle classes and to large numbers of people who do not drink to excess, if they were unable to procure beer for their Sunday meals, save as allowed under the Bill, 833-844—Approval of the restrictions hitherto applied to the sale of drink on Sunday, witness considering however that we have gone far enough, and that further restriction would cause great inconvenience and dissatisfaction, 839-854—Belief as to a large number of the working classes being in favour of further restriction, 855-861. 868.

Large proportion of drunkenness amongst women, 869, 870—Apprehension that female drunkenness is increasing, 870—Serious inconvenience, under the Bill, in the case of excursionists, 871-874. 878—Objection to any alteration of the hour of closing on Sunday evening, eleven being a very fair hour, 877-881.

Employers of Labour. Concurrence of opinion of employers in Leeds in favour of the present Bill, Lupton 3061. 3080-3082; Jackson 3274-3276—Very general opinion of employers of labours in support of Sunday closing, Steinthal 3754; Leicester 5684-5686; M'Cree 6167, 6168—Immense loss to employers through the absence of their men on Monday, M'Cree 6168—Improvement of the people at Wolverhampton, &c., owing to the exertions of the employers, Segrave 7477-7481.

Memorial of numerous large employers of labour in the manufacturing and mining districts relative to the great injury to employers and employed through the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday, App. 425, 426.

Employés in Public-Houses. Great boon to those employed in public-houses if Sunday were more a day of rest for them, Burcham 517-520 — Advantage of increased restrictions as limiting the hours of employment on Sunday, Woolrych 677 — Importance of a day of rest on Sunday for publicans and their employés, Gladstone 2979, 3012, 3013; Murphy 5483-5492 — Improved class of servants in public-houses if closed on Sunday, Mackie 4317, 4407-4418.

Exception taken to the view that those employed in public-houses are very generally in favour of Sunday closing, Winterbotham 6708 — Employment on Sunday of a large number of persons in the public-houses at Wolverhampton, Segrave 7432-7434 — Advantage if publicans were to close voluntarily so that they and their families and employés should have a day of rest on Sunday, Wilson 7955-7958 — Absence of objections by the employés in public-houses to the present system, Wadham 8064-8066.

Employment (Regularity of Work). Effect of Sunday drinking in unfitting men for work on Monday, Jackson 3274-3276; Walker 3394-3398, 3422 — Mischief of Sunday drinking in interfering with regularity of work, Jowett 3535, 3536, 3582 — Serious loss to the employers as well as the men in the mining districts, through the latter being frequently off work for some days in the week, Cockburn 5950-5954, 5959-5971.

Enright, John Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was for many years superintendent of police at Southampton, 4431-4433 — Decided improvement at Southampton by different Acts imposing restrictions on the sale of drink on Sunday and week days, 4434-4443, 4476-4479 — Belief that the present Bill would not create any disturbance in the town, and would further diminish drunkenness on Sunday, 4444, 4449-4451, 4462-4468, 4476-4482 — Suggestion that the public-houses be closed till a quarter to one or one, instead of being opened at half-past twelve, just as the people are coming out of church and chapel, 4444, 4445, 4485-4493.

Belief that the Bill would not lead to much illicit drinking, 4446-4448 — Probable inconvenience to excursionists if the houses were closed at ten o'clock, 4454-4460 — Approval of the principle of closing for consumption on the premises, 4465-4468 — Doubt as to much inconvenience in the case of lodgers, &c., at Southampton if the public-houses could not supply meals and drink to them on Sunday, 4469-4475, 4494-4503.

Erle, Chief Justice. Concurrence generally in the opinion of Chief Justice Erle adverse to the principle of severe restrictions upon the sale of refreshments, Sir R. Mayne 321-324.

EVASION (ILLICIT DRINKING):

1. Amount of Evasion of existing Restrictions on the Sunday Sale of Liquor; degree of Difficulty in enforcing the Restrictions.
2. Question as to the Effect of increased Restrictions upon the Amount of Evasion.

1. Amount of Evasion of existing Restrictions on the Sunday Sale of Liquor, &c.:

Strict enforcement generally of the regulations as to closing on Sunday in the metropolis, there being however some evasion of the law, Sir R. Mayne 55-57, 69, 120-122, 136 — Much less evil involved in the evasions of the law than, if there were no restriction, in the increased drunkenness that would result, ib. 202, 203 — Opinion as to the unreasonable proof required by some magistrates from the police in regard to the sale of drink at prohibited hours; difficulty on this subject, ib. 267-271 — Great difficulty in proving evasion of the law in regard to drink sold and consumed on the premises on Sunday, ib. 325.

Limited difficulty experienced by the magistrates in carrying out the present restrictions through any want of proper proof of sale after the prohibited hours, Sir T. Henry 448-451 — Sufficiency generally of the police regulations for preventing illicit sale on Sunday, Burcham 493, 623.

Extensive evasion of the existing restrictions in the metropolis, Archbishop Manning 2369-2371, 2410 — Considerable evasion of existing restrictions in witness's district in Cheshire, Bushell 4670, 4671 — Considerable amount of illegal drinking on Sunday at Bedford, Freshwater 4885, 4886, 4979-4981 — Large amount of Sunday drunkenness at Bolton due to illicit drinking before one o'clock, Staton 7090, 7091, 7096, 7166-7170, 7278.

2. Question

2. Question as to the Effect of increased Restrictions upon the Amount of Evasion :

Various and objectionable modes of evasion likely to result from the more restrictive regulations proposed for the metropolis, Sir R. Mayne 120-122. 125-134—Great evasion expected in regard to the prohibition of consumption on the premises, ib. 280-287—Tendency of the proposed restrictions to lead to the evasion of the law, and to a system of private drinking, Woolrych 640. 647-650. 667—Efficiency of the excise penalties for preventing, in Liverpool, any large increase of illicit trade, if there were further restrictions on Sunday, Greig 914-916—Probable effect of total closing in Manchester in leading to evasion, and to drinking in private houses, though not to a very serious extent, Palin 1399-1420.

Decided approval of the provisions of the Bill, even though it may lead to some increase of evasion, Archbishop Manning 2372, 2373—Doubt as to the Bill leading to much evasion or to illicit and secret drinking, as is said to be the result in Scotland, Hall 2590-2596—Question whether the Bill before the Committee would operate beneficially in witness's district, as it would probably lead to much evasion and to secret or private drinking, Page 2648-2659—Belief that many would obtain drink on Sunday somehow or other, even if the houses were closed, Gladstone 2981, 2982. 2995, 2996.

Belief that the Bill would not lead to much illicit drinking, Steinthal 3759, 3760—Infringement at Southampton of the present restrictive law, further restrictions leading probably to increased infringement, Eldridge 3876-3880. 3904-3906. 3978-3984—Probable increase of illicit drinking in Bolton under the present Bill, though not to any great extent, Barlow 4072-4074. 4173-4191—Belief that the Bill would not lead to much illicit drinking at Southampton, Enright 4446-4448.

Expectation that under the Bill publicans would take a better interest in prevention of illicit drinking, Bushell 4672. 4680—Opinion that there would be less illicit drinking than at present, Freshwater 4933-4936—Belief that further restrictions would diminish rather than increase illicit drinking and home drinking, Leicester 5796-5802. 5851-5858. 5920-5923.

Belief that further restriction would lead to evasion, and would defeat the object in view, Morrell 6293, 6294—Conclusion as to the impracticability of strictly carrying out the Bill, extensive evasion being sure to result, Winterbotham 6566, 6567—Expected increase of evasion as a result of further restrictions, ib. 6633, 6634—Further evasion if there be further restriction, Staton 7092. 7097-7099. 7194. 7163, 7164.

Belief that the proposed restriction could not be effectually enforced, and would lead to a great increase of evasion, Wadhams 8003. 8014, 8015. 8026-8028. 8108, 8109—Concurrence in the view that the evasion which now takes place on Sunday would be greatly increased by the Bill, Henshall 8420-8423—Effect of the Bill greatly to increase the evils of illicit and private drinking, Candelet 8537-8539.

Conclusion of the Committee that the restrictions proposed by the Bill would lead to various methods of evading the law, Rep. iii., iv—Conclusion also as to the great difficulty of enforcing the restrictions proposed in the Bill, Rep. iv.

EXCURSIONISTS :

1. Extent and Operation of the System of Sunday Excursions out of London.
2. Effect of the proposed Increase of Restrictions.
3. Concession suggested for the Convenience of Excursionists.

1. Extent and Operation of the System of Sunday Excursions out of London :

Belief as to the practice of excursions out of London on Sunday having tended to diminish drunkenness, Sir R. Mayne 42-48—Absence of increase of drunkenness in the suburban districts frequented by excursionists, ib. 44-48.

Exhausting effect of Sunday excursions out of London, it being, in witness's opinion, far better for the working classes to spend their Sunday more as a day of rest, Potter 5054, 5055. 5072-5087—Excursionists at present frequently return home in a state of intoxication, Mc Cree 6173.

Denial of certain statements as to excursionists frequently returning home in a drunken state, Morrell 6250. 6376-6379. 6416, 6417. 6459-6462—Total of about a quarter of a million of excursionists from London every Sunday; grounds for this statement, ib. 6285—Exceedingly salutary operation of the system of Sunday excursions, Winterbotham 6555. 6564.

Great inconvenience to excursionists on Sunday if the public-houses were closed at ten, and if refreshments could not be obtainable at the railway stations, Woolrych 778-788—Serious inconvenience under the Bill in the case of London excursionists, Ellison 871-874. 878.

Information relative to the number and habits of the excursionists who come to Brighton on Sunday; the present Bill would not affect them as being travellers, Bigge 1966, 1967. 1981-1985. 1989-1994—Little if any inconvenience to excursionists by the proposed Bill, Archbishop Manning, 2425-2431. 2438-2440. 2467—Absence of any real hardship to excursionists if the public-houses in London were closed at ten o'clock, Archbishop Manning 2438, 2439; Hall 2546-2548.

Statement that the facility under the Bill for obtaining drink on Sunday evening from eight till ten o'clock for consumption at home, would prevent serious inconvenience in the case of excursionists and others, Lupton 3167-3175. 3202-3204. 3208. 3212, 3213—Ample facilities for excursionists to obtain beer for consumption at home, under the proposed Bill, Walker 3417, 3418—Probable inconvenience to excursionists if the houses were closed at ten o'clock, Enright 4454-4460.

Decided advantage if returning excursionists went to their homes for refreshments instead of to the public-house, Potter 5052-5054—Grounds for concluding that Sunday excursions out of London are now very limited, and that the Bill would not largely affect this class, Murphy 5468-5472—More beneficial character of excursions out of London if the Bill be passed, M^cCree 6171-6173.

Difficulties and hardship in the case of London excursionists if the public-houses be closed as proposed by the Bill, Morrell 6245-6247. 6249, 6250—Hardship of increased restrictions in the case of Sunday excursionists from London to the suburbs further adverted to; difficulty also in the case of travellers, ib. 6285-6290—Serious inconvenience to excursionists and others if the hour for closing on Sunday be fixed at ten instead of eleven, ib. 6406-6415—Statement showing the very great inconvenience and hardship to excursionists under the restrictions in the Bill, Winterbotham 6539-6544. 6556-6564.

3. Concession suggested for the Convenience of Excursionists:

Suggestion that much opposition to the Bill may be disarmed by extending the time of opening on Sunday evening till eleven o'clock, for the convenience of excursionists, Potter 5048, 5049. 5051, 5052. 5071.

Expenditure in Drink. Increased expenditure in intoxicating liquors when wages are high, Lupton 3214-3216; Leicester 5663, 5664. 5812-5814. 5887; Segrave 7450, 7451—Large portion of their wages spent by some working men in drink, Walker 3392.

Immense expenditure of the people of this country in intoxicating drinks, which if expended on food, clothing, &c., would add enormously to the comforts of the people; statistics on this subject, Leicester 5712. 5826, 5827. 5879-5888. 5909-5919—Estimated expenditure of 3,000,000*l.* a year in 11,000 public-houses in London, ib. 5712. 5826, 5827—Expenditure in 1867 of 88,000,000*l.* in intoxicating drinks in the United Kingdom, ib. 5880. 5882-5888. 5909-5919.

F.

Factory Operatives. Large majority of factory operatives in favour of the Bill, Archbishop Manning 2383, 2384—Way in which the public-houses on Sunday evening operate very disastrously as regards the morals of factory girls, Jackson 3246, 3247. 3251-3256.

Families of Working Men. Great bane of drunkenness, not only to the men, but to their wives and children, Sir R. Mayne 160, 161—The Bill would be a great boon to the families of working men, Greig 1241—Desolate condition of the homes of the working classes, owing to the want of legislative restrictions upon the sale of drink, Archbishop Manning 2385. 2435-2437. 2501—Statement showing the antagonism of the public-houses on Sunday to the interests of religion and morality amongst the families of the working classes, Hall 2549. 2552-2558.

Witness cannot conceive any advantage in Sunday drinking, whilst the men and their families would be all the happier if it were suppressed, Lupton 3062, 3063—Expected improvement in the homes of the people if beer could not be consumed in the public-houses on Sunday, Lupton 3103, 3104; Jackson 3242—Happier state of the men as well as of their families if the former spent less of their time in the public-houses and more of it with their families not only on Sunday but on Saturday night, Lupton 3104. 3115-3128—Great improvement in the homes of working men and the physical condition of their families if the money spent in public-houses on Sunday were available for food and clothing, Lupton 3199-3201; Murphy 5521, 5522.

Great blessing to the working men and their families if the former could drink only at home on Sunday; very little drinking in such case, Walker 3397. 3399-3401. 3404, 3405—Social and physical improvement of the families of the labouring classes if the Bill be passed, Jowett 3582—Way in which, in witness's district, the present system acts very prejudicially upon the families of working men, Bushell 4677-4679. 4715-4718—Concurrence in the view as to the injurious effect of Sunday drinking as regards the families of working men, Howard 4814, 4815.

Belief that every restriction upon the facilities for Sunday drinking is beneficial, and enables the working classes to devote a larger portion of their wages to the wants of their families, Murphy 5420, 5421. 5544, 5545. 5609-5613—Evidence as to the extremely disastrous effect of Sunday drinking in the districts south of the Thames, as regards the wives and children of the drunkards, ib. 5436-5443. 5493-5498—Misery entailed not only on drunkards themselves, but on their wives and families, Cockburn 6075—Great boon to working men and to their wives and families if the Legislature were to remove the temptation of Sunday drinking, McCree 6169, 6170—Distressed state of some of the lower class of workmen in Sheffield, owing to intemperance, Wilson 7880. 7962.

Festiniog. Almost unanimous feeling of the householders at Festiniog in favour of Sunday closing, Johnes 8764. 8773.

Findlater, Mackie & Co. Explanation as to witness having retail licenses in connection with most of his establishments, with a view chiefly to selling beer by the single bottle, Mackie 4309. 4334-4336. 4353-4364—Practice of witness to close all his houses on Sunday; grounds for the conclusion that he is a considerable gainer thereby, in doing a more respectable business, ib. 4310. 4316, 4317. 4334-4339. 4365. 4398-4400. 4407-4413—Further statement relative to the retail business of witness in the sale of beer or gin at the counter, and the mode in which conducted; refusal to serve drunken people or profligate women, &c., ib. 4371-4382. 4419-4430.

Fines (Drunkenness). Opinion that increase of punishment would not deter from drunkenness, Sir R. Mayne 303, 304—The London magistrates might sometimes apply heavier punishments; they discharge a great number of cases, ib. 304—Improvement if magistrates could inflict a greater punishment than a fine of 5s. for habitual drunkenness, Sir T. Henry 398-402.

Fisher, Aldermen William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—As a magistrate and alderman of Sheffield, has had a long and intimate experience of the habits and condition of the people, 6776-6780. 6793-6797. 6803, 6804—Great reduction in the charges for drunkenness in Sheffield within the last twenty years, and since the repeal of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act of 1854; 6781, 6782. 6785-6787. 6793-6800—Impression that at an open air meeting, called to consider the Act of 1854, a majority of those present declared against the measure, 6782, 6783.

Belief that the present Bill would cause great dissatisfaction in Sheffield, and would be opposed by a majority of the working classes, 6784-6792—Serious inconvenience to be caused by the proposed restrictions, whilst they are not called for by the state of the town on Sunday, 6785. 6788-6791—Examination upon the question whether witness, as a member of the town council in 1852 and 1853, did not concur in a report from a committee of the council in favour of restrictions; doubt as to this report having been formally adopted, 6801-6824. 6883-6900.

Statement that witness has no connection with the brewing trade nor with publicans; he has acted as chairman of Mr. Roebuck's election committee, the publicans being favourable to Mr. Roebuck, 6825-6833. 6875-6878—Examination showing that during the operation of the Act of 1854 there was a considerable diminution of drunkenness on Sunday; the cases are, however, very rare at present, 6835-6856.

Objection to interference with the reasonable wants of the great majority of the people, even though resulting in an abatement of drunkenness, 6857-6860—Recent canvass of the workshops in Sheffield adverted to, 6861-6867—Belief that the numbers frequenting the public-houses on Sunday are not excessive, and that but little abuse occurs, 6870-6874.

Flather, The Rev. John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Clergyman at Sheffield; is secretary to the Town Mission, and has an intimate acquaintance with the habits and feelings of the lower classes on the subject of temperance, 4504-4509—Opinion that, at Sheffield, drinking on Sunday is in excess of other days, 4510—Great diminution of Sunday drunkenness during the operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act of 1854; general satisfaction given by the Act, 4511-4519. 4604-4606—Movement on the part of the town council, in 1852 and 1853, in favour of restrictions on Sunday drinking, 4520-4523. 4548. 4561, 4562—Large majority of householders who declared, in 1863, in favour of total closing on Sunday, 4524-4530.

Decided approval of the Bill before the Committee, 4531, 4532—Belief that the working men of Sheffield would generally approve of the Bill; details hereon, relative to a recent canvass of 130 workshops on the question of total closing, 4533-4551. 4566-4572. 4591-4603. 4612-4616—Conclusion that the Bill, if applied to Sheffield, would excite no disturbance, 4553. 4566. 4653—Feeling of professional men, manufacturers, &c. in favour of further restriction, 4553. 4566.

Information relative to a public meeting in December 1867, attended by about 100 people, in support of the Bill, 4553-4560. 4617-4626—Satisfaction given in Guernsey by the law for Sunday closing, 4563-4565. 4651—Expected opposition, in Sheffield, to total closing, but not to further restriction, 4566-4568. 4599-4603. 4627, 4628—Comment upon the mode in which signatures were obtained to a large petition, from Sheffield, against the Bill, 4572-4577—Earnest support of further restriction by Dr. Sale, vicar of Sheffield, 4578.

Improved habits of the people of Sheffield, drunkenness having diminished, 4579, 4580. 4637—Increase of the feeling in favour of restriction, 4581—Slight inconvenience to be caused by the Bill to Sunday excursionists, 4582-4585. 4642-4644—Effect of existing restrictions in diminishing drunkenness, 4586—Opinion that high wages do not lead to an increase of intemperance, 4587-4590.

Circumstance of some workmen having voted against total closing on the ground that clubs were not closed, 4571-4596—Impression that many of the licensed victuallers are favourable to further restrictions, 4607-4611—Evil effect of the system of psalm-singing in public-houses on Sunday evening, 4630-4636—Little, if any, inconvenience to be caused by the Bill to lodgers, 4638-4641. 4645-4650—Dissent from the views of the chief constable of Sheffield as to the state of feeling in the town on the subject of the Bill, 4652, 4653.

Working Men's Institute at Bedford, 4902. 4912-4919—Sufficient opportunity of working men to obtain beer for consumption at home on Sunday, 4904. 4953, 4954. 4967.

Doubt as to excessive private drinking if the Bill be passed, 4925-4927—Very few lodgers in Bedford, to whom moreover the Bill would not prove any inconvenience, 4928-4932. 4973, 4974—Opinion that there would be less illicit drinking than at present, 4933-4936—Absence of any real hardship to lodgers in London if the Bill become law; they would soon accommodate themselves to it, 4947-4959—Justification of restrictive legislation for a great public good, even though individuals may be put to some inconvenience, 4966, 4967. 4975-4978. 4996-5003.

Approval by witness of entire closing on Sunday, though he would gladly accept the present Bill as an instalment, 4982-4984—Circumstance of witness, when a publican, having opened on Sunday because his neighbours did so, 4985-4988—Feeling of many publicans at Bedford in favour of Sunday closing, 5004-5006—Probable objection to the Bill on the part of working men in London, 5009.

Friendly Societies. Way in which the Bill would prove a serious inconvenience to numerous burial societies, as at Ashton-under-Lyne, Aitken 8178-8185—The subscriptions are collected on Sunday, and are at once paid over to publicans as the treasurers, Aitken 8180-8183; Rea 8289-8311. 8332-8344—Statement relative to the great inconvenience to be caused by the Bill to sick and burial societies at Stockport, &c., Rea 8288-8311. 8332-8344—Evidence in support of the statement that the Bill would prove a great inconvenience and injury to friendly societies, Candelet 8526-8531. 8646-8654. 8688-8691.

Garrett, The Rev. John, D.D. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is rector of Christchurch, Moss-side, Manchester; has had a very extensive experience of the working classes in different parts of England, 2172-2185. 2303-2307—Statement as to the very demoralising results of the opening of public-houses in rural districts on Sunday, 2187-2189—Very injurious effect of indulgence in drink on the part of the working classes as regards the physical condition of themselves and of their children, 2190—Details relative to the strong and wide spread public feeling in favour of further restrictions on the sale of drink on Sunday, 2192 et seq.

Very large and influential public meetings in London and in Manchester, in favour either of entirely closing public-houses on Sunday or of a Permissive Bill, 2193-2211—Unanimity of feeling among the clergy of all classes, including the Roman Catholic clergy, in favour of restriction, 2195. 2212—Numerous petitions in favour of entire closing, or of the present Bill, 2208-2211—Numerous mayors and magistrates who have signed a petition in support of the present Bill, 2213-2215.

Belief that a very large majority of the working classes are in favour of total closing on Sunday, 2216. 2220-2228—Calculation that more than a million and a half sterling is spent annually in the London public-houses and beer-houses on Sunday, 2217, 2218—Circumstance of 438 licensed victuallers in London having signed a petition for total closing, 2219—Denial that any popular disturbance need be apprehended if the Bill be passed, 2228, 2229.

Demoralising effect of the collection of young people at public-houses in London on Sunday, as in the New Cut, Lambeth, 2230-2233. 2266-2270—Illustration of the baneful effects of drunkenness in leading to crime and pauperism, 2234—Particulars relative to public-houses in Manchester where they have music, partly sacred, on Sunday evening; expediency of some check to this system, 2235-2260—Improvement if public-houses were closed at nine on Sunday evening, 2259-2265—Beneficial operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in 1854; 2263, 2264.

Improbability of any systematic drinking at the doors of public-houses in the New Cut, &c., if drinking on the premises be prohibited, 2271, 2272—Obstacles to the practical application of a Permissive Bill in different localities, 2273—Advantage if instead of the present Bill a restriction were applied generally, limiting the hours of sale to an hour and a half in the afternoon, and an hour and a half in the evening, 2274.

Reference to the part taken by the United Kingdom Alliance in support of a Permissive Bill, and of total closing on Sunday, 2275-2281. 2326-2328—Approval by witness of the principles of action of the United Kingdom Alliance, 2282-2287—Explanation relative to a dispute between witness and some of the executive members of an association which he originated in Manchester, and which had for its object the stopping of the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday, 2290-2302. 2359-2361.

Statement as to the expediency of frequent Parliamentary discussion of the subject under consideration, 2308-2323—Disapproval of total closing on Sunday in the present sent state of public opinion on the subject; conclusion as to the Bill before the Committee having the support of public opinion, 2308-2334. 2353, 2354—Approval by Lord Derby and Mr. Walpole of the principle of action of the present Bill, 2332-2337—Extent to which Mr. Gathorne Hardy has expressed himself favourable to the Bill, 2338-2348.

Unfairness of comparison between clubs and public-houses as regards the question of facility for procuring drink on Sunday, 2349-2351—Object of the present movement to impose restrictions believed to be beneficial to the whole country, 2352—Approval of the proviso in the Bill giving persons in London power to consume a meal as well as drink on the premises, 2355-2358.

Gateshead. Statement of the population of the town, and the amount of drunkenness; belief that a great many cases arise from Sunday drinking, Newall 5203-5206. 5257-5265. 5298-5304—Feeling of the magistrates and of the better class of workmen in favour of further restrictions on the sale of drink on Sunday; expected acceptance of the present Bill by the town without resistance or disturbance, ib. 5207-5209. 5214-5216. 5224-5227—Beneficial effect of existing restrictions on Sunday drinking in Gateshead, witness anticipating further benefits from the Bill, and preferring it for the present to total closing, ib. 5210-5221. 5228 et seq.—Belief that the Bill would decidedly reduce Sunday drunkenness in Gateshead, even though some men might drink more at home, or might endeavour to evade the law, ib. 5245-5252. 5266-5270. 5282-5297—Strict check upon Sunday trading in the town, ib. 5253-5256—Feeling of several publicans in favour of total closing on Sunday, ib. 5298, 5299.

Gladstone, Robertson. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Approval, as regards Liverpool, of the restrictions proposed by the Bill upon the sale of drink on Sunday, there being much drunkenness on Sunday evening, which it is very desirable to check, 2973-2982. 2997, 2998—Expediency of total closing on Sunday in order to give rest and liberty to the publicans themselves, and to their families and servants, 2979. 3012, 3013—Advantage of the relief to be given to the police in Liverpool by total closing on Sunday, 2979. 2985, 2986.

Belief that many would obtain drink on Sunday, somehow or other, even though the houses were closed, 2981, 2982. 2995, 2996—Great advantage if ultimately the public-houses in Liverpool were entirely closed on Sunday, it being desirable in the meantime to pass the present Bill as an instalment of the full measure, 2982-2984. 2989-2991. 3001-3006—Opinion that the Bill would be carried out in Liverpool without any serious opposition being experienced, there being a general feeling in favour of restriction, 2983, 2984, 2989-2991. 3003-3005.

Small amount of drinking on Sunday as compared with week days; growing practice of excursions adverted to hereon, 2990-2992. 3000. 3009-3011—Considerable amount of drunkenness among the seafaring population 2999—Very close connection between drunkenness and crime, 3006—Weight attached to the statistics submitted to the Committee by Dr. White, 3007, 3008.

Glasgow. Immense amount of Sunday drinking in Glasgow, notwithstanding Forbes Mackenzie's Act, Waygood, 7040-7045—Witness has seen from 200 to 300 men drunk on Glasgow-green on a Sunday morning, and believes that a much greater number of drunkards may sometimes be seen there on Sunday, ib.

Glasnevin Guardians (Dublin). Beneficial effect of the opening of Glasnevin Gardens Dublin, on Sunday, Morrell 6494-6499.

Glass Makers. Immense evil caused by Sunday drinking in the glass trade, so that all the respectable operatives would hail restrictions as a great boon, Leicester 5657-5668. 5675. 5706-5711. 5803-5823. 5851-5858—Large wages made in the trade, and constantly wasted in drink, ib. 5662-5665. 5710. 5812, 5813. 5851-5858—Abuse in the glass makers trade under the former custom of footing payments; reduction of intemperance in the trade since the abolition of the custom, ib. 5669-5674. 5782-5793. 5814—Good health of witness and other total abstainers in the trade, ib. 5692-5705. 5715-5737. 5824, 5825—Considerable amount of drinking by glass blowers, when at work, the occupation being very severe, ib. 5715-5740—Statement as to the necessity of legislative restriction for the men in witness's trade, a mere law or rule of the trade not being an effectual check, ib. 5782-5795. 5828-5831.

Glossop, George. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is chief constable of Birmingham, 1575-1577—Statistics of the amount of drunkenness in Birmingham in each year since 1854, the increase being considerable, 1581-1601—Relative number of cases on Sunday and on other days; small average number on Sunday, 1592-1594. 1684, 1685—Effect of the Act of 1854 in largely diminishing the amount of drunkenness on Sunday, the restrictions of the Act having, however, led to much complaint, 1602-1608. 1625-1628. 1686-1688. 1703-1720.

Expectation that the Bill now under consideration would greatly diminish drunkenness in Birmingham on Sunday, but would lead to complaints from a large section of the community, 1609 et seq.—Improvement if the public-houses closed at ten on Sunday, 1623, 1624—Advantage of increased restrictions in the case of persons who cannot resist the temptation to drink, 1631–1637—Probability of much illicit drinking in Birmingham if the Bill became law, 1638–1648. 1782–1784.

Question considered whether the inconvenience to be caused by the Bill would not outweigh the advantages; opinion that the Bill does in fact go too far, 1649 et seq.—Improved habits of the people in the absence of restrictive measures, 1671–1678—Much larger number of beer-houses than of licensed houses in Birmingham, the facility of obtaining licenses for the former being a great evil, 1689–1693—Small number of women charged with drunkenness in Birmingham, 1694–1696.

Total closing on Sunday by twenty-seven publicans and forty-six beer-house keepers, 1700—Feeling of many, if not all, publicans in favour of total closing, provided it were carried out by the whole trade, 1701, 1702. 1756–1758—Sufficient facilities to the working classes if the houses were open from one to half-past two, and from six to ten, 1710–1720. 1785–1801—Large number of the better class of working men who are favourable to increased restrictions; public meeting held on the subject, 1721–1728. 1816—Decided advantage of restrictions upon drinking with reference to the physical well-being and the moral habits of the working classes, 1729–1762.

Belief that increased restrictions would be complained of only by a small minority of the inhabitants, 1741, 1742. 1807–1815—Hardship as regards the large number of Sunday excursionists in Birmingham if unduly restricted in consuming beer on the premises, 1749–1755. 1764–1775—Very beneficial result of enforcing the law against Sunday trading in Birmingham, 1758, 1759—Very little Sunday drunkenness in Birmingham in proportion to the population, restrictions not being called for save for a limited number of habitual drinkers, 1763–1784. 1802–1815.

[Second Examination.] Explanation of an apparent discrepancy between the statistics of drunkenness in Birmingham, as submitted by witness and by Mr. Avery respectively, 1962.

Good Friday. Objection to the restriction under the Bill as regards Good Friday, Wilson 7909, 7910.

Gorton (Lancashire). Statement of the population of Gorton, and the number of public-houses and beer-shops; very little drunkenness, especially on Sunday, Henshall 8404–8413. 8449. 8467, 8468—Beneficial effect of certain means of recreation at Gorton on Sunday, ib. 8406–8413—Attempted canvass of the town by advocates of the Bill; its failure, ib. 8436–8448.—Extent to which witness represents the local feeling on the question of further restriction; probability of a majority of his co-religionists (Unitarians) being in favour of the Bill, ib. 8449–8466. 8471–8488.

Greig, Major John James, C.B. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is chief constable of the borough of Liverpool; has considered the working of the present laws affecting public-houses, 882–885—Diminution of drunkenness in Liverpool on Sunday by the partial closing of public-houses on that day, 887—Statement relative to the material decrease in the number of drunken cases in Liverpool on Sunday during the operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act of 1854; further information and statistics promised as to the drunkenness since that year, 888–913. 958–961. 963–965. 1064–1070.

Efficiency of the Excise penalties for preventing any large increase of illicit trade, if there were further restrictions on Sunday, 914–916—Probability of drinking in the streets being the result of prohibiting consumption on the premises; interference of the police if this led to any obstruction or disorder, 917, 918. 938–945—Further diminution of drunkenness on Sunday if there were further restriction upon the sale of liquor, 919–921. 931–935. 962.

Very general satisfaction to be given in Liverpool, if public-houses were only open on Sunday for an hour and a-half in the middle of the day, and an hour and a-half in the evening, 921–923. 937. 981–986. 1014, 1015. 1124–1126. 1135–1137—Temporary character of complaints by the lower classes and the publicans if the restrictions of the Bill were carried out, and if consumption on the premises were not allowed, 924–930—Large number of public-houses voluntarily closed on Sunday, 926. 962. 972. 1016, 1017. 1099.

With regard to exceptional cases of hardship or inconvenience, these should give way to the general good, 946–933. 973, 1019–1023. 1064—Very little inconvenience as regards excursionists from Liverpool, by a restriction of the hours of sale on Sunday, 954–957. 999. 1030—Careful steps taken a few years since in order to ascertain the feeling in the town on the subject of Sunday closing, 966–669. 981–983. 1018—

—Approval of entire closing by a large number of publicans, over and above those who have actually closed, 970-972—Statement of the number of drunken cases in Liverpool in each year since 1828; apparent decrease in the last few years, for which it is difficult to account, the population having increased, 974-980. 991-995. 1003-1013. 1216.

Large proportion of the householders of Liverpool in favour of entire closing of public-houses on Sunday, there being however a very large section of the community opposed to total closing, 981-986—Great advantage of closing at ten instead of eleven, even if no further restriction were adopted, 987, 988—Small number of people at Liverpool who take their meals at public-houses on Sunday, 989, 990. 1032-1034—Opinion that drunkenness is increasing among women, and that there are probably as many female cases as male cases, 996-998. 1000.

Great evil of the beer-houses in Liverpool, 1000, 1001. 1039. 1076, 1077. 1081, 1082—Opinion that drinking in private houses would not increase if the Bill were carried out, 1002—Belief that the respectable portion of the working classes would be quite satisfied if the houses were open on Sunday, for two periods of an hour and a-half each, 1014-1017—Large amount of crime resulting from drunkenness, 1020-1023. 1206-1210—Peculiar excess of drinking on Saturday night from ten to twelve; 1021. 1201.—Approval of restriction being carried as far as possible, but not so far as to become intolerable, 1024-1029. 1150-1153.

Further evidence relative to the views and the practice of the publicans of Liverpool upon the question of curtailing the hours of sale on Sunday; probable satisfaction if there were one restrictive rule applicable to all, 1035-1038. 1087. 1154-1162. 1224-1233. 1242-1245—Advantage of an increased control over the beer-houses by means of license, 1039. 1076-1082—Beneficial effect of the proposed restrictions in the case of women, 1040-1042—Great boon to the families of working men if wages were not so largely spent in the public-houses, 1043, 1044. 1241.

Statement relative to the large number of deaths of children in Liverpool, through their being overlaid or suffocated in bed by their parents in consequence of drunkenness; less proportion of these deaths due to Sunday drinking than to drinking on Saturday night, 1045-1062. 1071, 1072. 1195-1200—Facility generally in proving cases of illegal sale, 1080. 1083—Opinion in favour of curtailing the present hours of sale on Sunday, rather than of prohibiting drinking on the premises, 1088-1096. 1118-1129—Belief that there was no great opposition in Liverpool to the working of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, 1097. 1100-1104.

Improbability of much inconvenience to steam-boat excursionists at Liverpool, if the public-houses were closed at half-past nine, 1105-1114—Expected opposition to the prohibition of consumption on the premises, but for which witness would approve of prohibition in this respect, 1121-1134—Doubt as to any extensive inconvenience if the houses were open for only one hour and a-half twice in the day, through persons wanting beer for their meals, 1138-1149.

Question considered whether the proposed restrictions would not be very inconvenient to sailors and the large floating population at Liverpool who have no homes; numerous refreshment houses available to this class, 1163-1193—Admission that the prohibition of drinking on the premises would involve hardship, 1175. 1194—Circumstance of the Bill not touching the evil of excessive drinking on Saturday night, 1201-1205.

Statement of the number of public-houses and beer-shops, and the amount of vice in Liverpool and Manchester respectively, 1217-1223—Conclusion that discontent at Liverpool with the Bill would be limited to the class of habitual drinkers, and that the middle classes and respectable working classes would be pleased with the proposed restrictions, 1234-1240—Belief that the wives and daughters of the working classes would strongly approve of the Bill; it would in fact be a great boon to them, 1241.

Guernsey. Satisfaction given in Guernsey by the law for Sunday closing, Flather 4563-4565. 4651—Very satisfactory working in Guernsey of the practice of total closing on Sunday, Murphy 5547-5554. 5644-5646.

H.

Habitual Drinkers. Necessity of restraint in the case of a large class of persons who habitually indulge in drink at very late hours on week days, the closing of the public-houses at twelve o'clock being a very salutary restriction in such cases, Sir T. Henry 389-396. 407-411—Advantage of increased restrictions in the case of persons who cannot resist the temptation to drink, Glossop 1631-1637; Bigge 2005 et seq.

Desire of many Sunday drinkers to be protected from temptation on that day, Jowett 3569. 3588, 3596-3616—The regular frequenters of public-houses on Sunday are often among the advocates of total closing, Steinthal 3804-3806—Approval by many drunkards drunkards of the principle of restriction, Barlow 4252—Inexpediency of staying the Bill because of opposition on the part of habitual drinkers in public-houses on Sunday, Murphy 5519, 5520, 5569, 5570.

Belief that short of absolute prohibition, habitual drinkers will not be prevented from indulging to excess, Wybergh 7563, 7591, 7665-7668—Hardship in imposing further restrictions upon the great mass of temperate men, in order to check the very few habitual drunkards, Beal 7748, 7749, 7781, 7782, 7790, 7791.

Hall, The Rev. Newman. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Testifies to the strong and general feeling among the working classes in Lambeth and Southwark in favour of increased restrictions on the sale of beer and spirits on Sunday; very large meeting lately held at the Lambeth Baths on the subject, 2505-2516, 2524-2528—Facility and probability of agitation and opposition on the part of the publicans, 2510, 2516, 2564, 2565—Unanimity of the women in favour of restrictions, 2517—Doubt as to drunkenness being on the increase among women, 2518, 2519—Grounds for concluding that throughout the country as in London, the great majority of the people approve of increased restrictions, 2520-2523, 2531-2534, 2567, 2568.

Expediency of the Legislature giving full attention to the feeling of the working classes on the subject of restriction, 2523—Repudiation by working men of the notion that the public-house is looked upon by them as a club, 2524-2527, 2609—Earnest hope of witness that the present Bill may become law, the benefits under it far outweighing the inconvenience, 2535, 2536—Effect of drinking habits in rendering still more wretched the wretched homes of the labouring classes, 2537, 2538.

Demoralising effect of the opening of the public-houses till a late hour on Sunday evening; illustration of this in Lambeth, 2539-2541—Large proportion of crime due to drunkenness, 2541—Witness has never heard any complaint of existing restrictions on Sunday opening of public-houses, 2542-2544—Conclusion that further restrictions will surely lead to a decrease of drunkenness, 2545—Absence of any real hardship to excursionists or working men by closing the houses at ten on Sunday, 2546-2548.

Statement showing the antagonism of the public-houses on Sunday to the interests of religion and morality amongst the families of the working classes, 2549, 2552-2558—Much greater reason for legislative interference with the sale of liquor on Sunday than with the sale of other articles; that is, in the interests of the social well-being of the people, 2550-2553—Consideration of the question of opening places of recreation on Sunday in order to counteract the baneful operation of the public-houses; grounds for concluding that such opening would not be for the public good, 2550, 2551, 2615-2632.

Approval of total prohibition of consumption on the premises on Sunday, rather than of a further restriction of the hours of sale, 2559-2566—Further statement as to the widespread feeling among the working classes in favour of being relieved from the temptation of spending their money in drink on Sunday, 2563, 2564—Admission that some inconvenience must be experienced by lodgers and others if the Bill be passed, such inconvenience however being trifling in comparison with the great benefit to the community at large, 2577-2595—Doubt as to the Bill leading to much evasion or to illicit and secret drinking, as is said to be the result in Scotland, 2590-2596.

Further statement that though publicans might organise an opposition to the Bill, they would not be supported by the working classes at large, the feeling in favour of restriction having much grown since the Act of 1854; 2597-2613—Improvement by further restricting the hours of sale, if consumption on the premises be still allowed, 2614, 2635, 2639—Very few if any people who take their meals at public-houses in Lambeth, &c., 2633, 2634—Beneficial results in New York of the system of separating the sale of intoxicating drinks from dancing and singing rooms, 2639-2644.

Hardy, Right Honourable Gathorne. Extent to which Mr. Gathorne Hardy has expressed himself favourable to the Bill, Garrett 2338-2348.

Health. Very injurious effect of indulgence in drink on the part of working classes as regards the physical condition of themselves and of their children, Garrett 2190—Excellent health of witness, who is a total abstainer from intoxicating drinks; good health generally of the total abstainers in the glass trade as compared with the drinking men, Leicester 5692-5705, 5715-5737, 5824, 5825.

Henry, Sir Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is chief magistrate of the metropolitan police courts; has had considerable experience in connection with the question of the sale of drink in the metropolis, 338-342—Considers that the cases of drunkenness in the metropolis have decreased in number, owing to the improved tastes and habits of the people, 341-352, 364, 372-374, 380-382—Belief that the publicans generally obey the prohibition as to the hours for the sale of drink, and that they do not encourage drunkenness, 345, 359, 452.

Opinion that the amount of drunkenness is not much regulated by the limitation of the hours, 347-352, 375-382—Great importance attached to the Act of 1864, as imposing restrictions calculated to meet the case of professional drunkards, 351-354, 389-396—

Inexpediency of passing the present Bill; great inconvenience and discontent to be caused thereby, 355 et seq.—More drunken cases on Tuesday morning than on Monday morning, 358. 437. 469, 470—Probability of the Bill increasing, rather than diminishing drunkenness, 359–361.

Decrease of drunkenness in times of distress; frequent instances, however, of women resorting to drink when in distress, 369, 370—Doubt as to any great increase of sobriety on Sunday being owing to the restrictions hitherto on the hours of opening of the public-houses, 375–382—Frequency of drunkenness among women through their buying gin in bottles and drinking it at home, 383–385—Belief that crime is not planned in public houses, 386. 415.

Reasons for not relying on returns as a satisfactory test of the increase or decrease of drunkenness in connection with restrictions on the sale of drink, 387, 388. 397, 398. 435—Necessity of restraint in the case of a large class of persons who habitually indulge in drink at very late hours on week days, the closing of the public-houses at twelve o'clock being a very salutary restriction, 389–396. 407–411—Improvement if magistrates could inflict a greater punishment than a fine of 5 s. for habitual drunkenness, 398–402.

Concurrence in the view that if the community generally were in favour of further restriction on Sunday, the present Bill might be desirable; belief however that the great mass of the people would be much inconvenienced, 403–406—Conclusion as to crime as well as drunkenness having decreased, owing to the improved habits of the people, 412–415—Belief that the great majority of the people in London and other large towns are opposed to further restrictions upon the sale of liquor on Sunday, 416–423—Inconvenience to the lower classes by any restriction of the present hours of opening in the afternoon, 423–425.

Grounds for strongly objecting to any prohibition of drinking on the premises on Sunday, as leading to much evasion and to drinking in the streets and at home, 426–430—Slight importance attached to certain returns and evidence purporting to show a large decrease of drunkenness through the operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act of 1854; 432–437—Objection to its resting with the local authorities in any town, as under the Act of 1864, to apply restrictions upon the sale of liquor on Sunday, 438–442.

Large numbers of the working classes whom closing at nine or ten on Sunday evening would greatly inconvenience, 444–447—Limited difficulty experienced by the magistrates in carrying out the present restrictions, through want of proper proof of sale after the prohibited hours, 448–451—Check upon excessive drinking on the premises, whilst there is no such check upon excess at home, 452—Question whether the first clause of the Bill as at present drawn would not interfere with bonâ fide travellers in the country, 453–457.

Main ground for witness's objection to further restrictions that the many would be inconvenienced for the sake of the few, 458–465—Serious inconvenience if the public-houses were closed from half past two on Sunday afternoon till eight, 461–464—Very little excess in the public-houses on Sunday evening under the present regulations, 466–468—Approval of the opening of places of innocent recreation on Sunday, where no drinking is allowed, 471–475.

Henshall Joseph. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is an estate agent at Gorton, near Manchester; is also a Sunday school teacher, 8402, 8403—Statement of the population at Gorton, and the number of public-houses and beer shops; very little drunkenness, especially on Sunday, 8404–8413, 8449. 8467, 8468—Beneficial effect of certain means of recreation at Gorton on Sunday, 8406–8413—Several grounds upon which working men strongly object to the present Bill, 8414–8419—Belief that the evasion which now takes place on Sunday would be greatly increased by the Bill, 8420–8423.

Improvement of the people under the present system, further restriction not being required, and being a great hardship to many, 8424–8433. 8451–8456. 8467–8470—Conclusion that the Bill would be no benefit as regards Sunday schools, 8433–8435—Attempted canvass of Gorton by advocates of the Bill; its failure, 8436–8448—Extent to which witness represents the local feeling on the question of further restriction; probability of a majority of his co-religionists (Unitarians) being in favour of the Bill, 8449–8466. 8471–8488.

Hill, M. D. Grounds for dissenting from the views of Mr. Hill, recorder of Birmingham, in favour of total closing on Sunday, Wadhams 8051–8053.

Letter from Mr. Hill to the Chairman of the Committee, dated 20 May, 1868, in earnest support of increased restrictions on Sunday drinking, App. 428.

Holidays (Working Classes). Expediency of national holidays for the working classes on week days so that they may take excursions, without using Sunday for the purpose, Potter 5081–5087. 5144–5148. 5180–5184.

Report, 1868—continued.

HOURS OF SALE:

1. As to the present Hours of Sale on Sunday.
2. Evidence adverse to the Limitation proposed by the Bill.
3. Evidence favourable to a Limitation of the Hours.
4. Question between Limitation of Hours of Sale, and Prohibition of Consumption on the Premises.

1. As to the present Hours of Sale on Sunday:

Total of eight hours for which public-houses are open in the metropolis on Sunday as compared with an average of twenty-one hours on other days, Sir R. Mayne 61-65. 247-250—Evidence relative to various Acts fixing the hours of opening in London and in the country, the present hours in London being from one to three in the afternoon, and from five to eleven in the evening, ib. 87-107—Part taken by witness in urging the earlier closing of week days, as carried out by the Act of 1864, ib. 188. 305-308—Great advantage by closing till half-past twelve on Sunday in the provinces, Walker 3420, 3421—Approval of the present hours of closing in London on Sunday, though some inconvenience arises through the houses not being open before one o'clock, Morrell 6265, 6266. 6273-6280.

2. Evidence adverse to the Limitation proposed by the Bill:

Conclusions as to the greater disadvantage than advantage by closing at ten instead of eleven, as regards the public generally, Sir R. Mayne 112-134—Comparatively large number of persons to whom, as well as to regular excursionists, the closing of public-houses from ten to eleven on Sunday night would be an inconvenience and a hardship, ib. 204-210.

Inconvenience to the lower classes by any restriction of the present hours of opening in the afternoon, Sir T. Henry 423-425—Large numbers of the working classes whom closing at nine or ten on Sunday evening would greatly inconvenience, ib. 444-447—Serious inconvenience if the public-houses were closed from half-past two on Sunday afternoon till eight, ib. 461-464—Objection to any alteration of the hour of closing on Sunday evening, eleven being a very fair hour, Ellison 879-881—Impression that three hours opening on Sunday would not be sufficient, and would not give satisfaction, Jackson 1499-1507.

Objection to the proposal of Mr. Villiers' Committee of 1854 for Sunday closing, except from six to nine in the evening, Morrell 6313-6317—Numerous class of persons, including not only excursionists, but cabmen, omnibus drivers, &c., to whom closing at ten instead of eleven on Sunday evening would be a great inconvenience and hardship, Winterbotham 6612-6614. 6630, 6631. 6686-6690. 6701, 6702.

3. Evidence favourable to a Limitation of the Hours:

Great advantage of closing at ten instead of eleven, even if no further restriction were adopted, Greig 987, 988—Belief that the respectable portion of the working classes in Liverpool would be quite satisfied if the houses were open on Sunday for two periods, of an hour and a half each, ib. 1014-1017—Advantage if the public-houses at Manchester closed an hour earlier on Sunday evening; little inconvenience thereby, Palin 1328-1340.

Concurrence in the view as to the decided improvement by closing at ten instead of eleven on Sunday night, Glossop 1623, 1624; Archbishop Manning 2412-2416; Jowett 3583, 3584; Barlow 4273-4276—Sufficient facilities to the working class if the houses were open from one to half-past two, and from six to ten, Glossop 1710-1720. 1785-1801—Approval of the houses being closed at an earlier hour in the evening, such as nine o'clock, Bigge 2156-2164—Improvement if public-houses were closed at nine on Sunday evening, Garrett 2259-2265.

Improvement by limiting the hours of sale from one to half-past two, and from eight to ten, White 2923, 2924—Decided improvement upon the present state of things if there were only four hours for sale on Sunday, Jowett 3656-3658. 3668-3671—Suggestion that in provincial towns the public-houses be closed till a quarter to one, or one, instead of being opened at half-past twelve, just as the people are coming out of church and chapel, Enright 4444, 4445. 4485-4493—Improvement by limiting the hours of sale as named in the Bill, even if consumption on the premises be not prohibited, Potter 5141-5143. 5197-5201—Advantage, short of the Bill, by limiting the hours of opening in the evening, M'Cree 6186-6190.

4. Question between Limitation of Hours of Sale, and Prohibition of Consumption on the Premises:

Opinion in favour of curtailing the present hours of sale on Sunday, rather than of prohibiting drinking on the premises, Greig 1088-1096. 1118-1129—Advantage if instead of the present Bill a restriction were applied generally, limiting the hours of sale to an hour and a half in the afternoon and a hour and a half in the evening, Garrett 2274.

Less beneficial effect of a further restriction upon the hours of sale than of prohibition of consumption on the premises, Hall 2559-2566; Bushell 4674, 4675; Freshwater 4877. 4883, 4884. 4968. 4971; Murphy 5518.

Improvement by further restricting the hours of sale, even if consumption on the premises be still allowed, Hall 2614. 2635. 2639—Witness considers that a further slight restriction upon the hours of sale on Sunday is the preferable plan, Page 2658.

Statement that a reduction of the hours of sale on Sunday would be a great benefit, though not so satisfactory unless connected with a prohibition of consumption on the premises, Potter 5141-5143. 5197-5201—Improvement by limiting the hours of sale, as named in the Bill, even though consumption on the premises be not prohibited, Elliott 5389-5393. 5401, 5402.

See also Act of 1854. Drunkenness, 6. Evasion. Excursionists. Meals (Lower Classes). Restrictions upon Sale.

Householders, Canvass of. See Public Opinion.

Howard, James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Manufacturer of agricultural implements at Bedford; employs a very large number of men, 4786-4789—Approval of the provisions of the present Bill, 4790-4793—Excessive drinking on Sunday at Bedford, as well as on Saturday night, the result being that many men are unfit for work on Monday, 4794-4803—Great improvement if the public-houses were closed at ten on Saturday evening, 4799—Expediency of increased restriction in the country, the effect of restriction being a diminution of drunkenness, 4804, 4805. 4809-4811.

Undue hours for which public-houses are open in Bedford as compared with London, 4805-4808. 4830-4832—Almost unanimous feeling of witness's workmen in favour of the principle of the Bill, 4812. 4838-4842—Strong feeling of the women in favour of Sunday closing, 4813, 4814—Injurious effect of Sunday drinking as regards the families of working men, 4814, 4815—Considerable amount of illicit drinking at Bedford on Sunday; doubts as to much increase if there were further restrictions upon sale, 4816-4818. 4833. 4834. 4846-4853.

Improbability of any systematic excess of drinking by working men in their own houses, 4818. 4854-4862—Belief that the Bill would be acceptable to the great bulk of the people of Bedford, 4820. 4824. 4829—Instances of the demoralising effect of public-houses, 4821—Power of the working men to establish a club and to have beer there on Sunday, 4825. 4828—Establishment of a working men's institute at Bedford; refreshments obtainable there on Sunday, 4825-4828. 4868-4871.

Great improvement of the working classes as regards drinking habits, it being desirable to expedite such improvement by legislation, 4836. 4872, 4873—Doubt as to their being any dissatisfaction on the part of farm labourers if the Bill be passed, 4838-4845—Decided objection to a Permissive Bill, as compared with the present measure, 4863, 4864—Expediency of applying legislative restrictions to Sunday rather than Saturday, 4865-4867.

Hull. Opinion of the chief constable of Hull that the only way to prevent drunkenness on Sunday is to close the public-houses, Steinthal 3728.

I.

Illicit Drinking. See Evasion.

Improvement (Working Classes). See Working Classes, 4, 5.

Ireland. Statement showing the exceedingly satisfactory operation of the system of voluntary closing on Sunday in several Roman Catholic dioceses in Ireland, by the spontaneous action of the people, Archbishop Manning 2389. 2397. 2400. 2441. 2468-2471.

Irish Population (England). Readiness of the Irish population in England to conform to a restrictive law, Archbishop Manning 2442-2444. 2468-2471—Large majority of the Irish population of the town of Liverpool in favour of total closing, White 2928-2932—Habits of the Irish in Leeds as to drinking; restraint exercised over them by their clergy, Lupton 3218-3221.

J.

Jackson, Rev. Edward. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Incumbent of St. James', Leeds: has had many years' experience of the social habit of the lower classes of the town, and of the effects of Sunday drinking, 3225-3234—Exceedingly baneful effect of the opening opening of public-houses on Sunday, as regards not only the intemperate but the temperate members of the lower classes, 3235-3238—Beneficial result of the closing till half-past twelve on Sunday, 3239—Excellent effects anticipated from an entire prohibition of consumption on the premises on Sunday: grounds for this conclusion, 3240 et seq.

Very little drinking or sitting at home if the public-houses were closed, 3241. 3352, 3353—Decided improvement in the houses of the working classes under the proposed restrictions, 3242—Experience of witness as to the great prevalence of drunkenness, profanity, and immorality on Sunday evening in Leeds, owing to the present system, 3243-3256—Way in which the public-houses on Sunday evening operate very disastrously as regards the morals of factory girls, 3246, 3247. 3251-3256—Great evil of the antagonism of the public-houses to the Sunday schools, 3248-3250.

Evidence as to the great injury to the health of publicans through not having a day of rest on Sunday: illustration on this point, 3257-3259. 3262. 3298-3301—Desire of very many publicans for a compulsory law on the subject of Sunday closing, 3258. 3260, 3261. 3302-3304—Grounds for the statement that a very large majority of the working men of Leeds are in favour of entire closing on Sunday, 3263, 3264. 3278-3287. 3291-3297—Immense public meeting at the time of Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill, when a large majority declared in its favour, 3263. 3305-3314. 3354-3361.

Very demoralizing effect of licensed gardens and concert rooms on Sunday in Leeds, 3265. 3321, 3322—Ample facilities under the present Bill in the case of travellers and excursionists, 3266. 3268, 3269—Unanimous feeling of women in favour of restriction, 3266, 3267—General feeling of the clergy of all denominations favourable to the Bill, 3270-3273—Similar feeling of employers, 3274-3276—Almost unanimous support of the Bill by the borough magistrates, 3277—Small section of the community by which total closing might be resisted, 3280-3287.

Great improvement in the habits of the great mass of the working classes in Leeds, though there is still a considerable portion requiring to be kept out of the temptation of Sunday drinking, 3288-3290. 3342-3344—Greater reason for closing on Sunday than on any other day in the week; 3315-3319. 3345, 3346—Grounds for objecting to museums and art galleries being open on Sunday, though there is not the same objection to the opening of unlicensed gardens and reading rooms, 3320-3337.

Further approval of the Bill on the ground that the working classes would have sufficient facilities for procuring beer, either in draught or in bottle, for consumption with their meals at home, 3338-3341. 3347-3351. 3363-3378.

Jackson, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Chief constable of Sheffield; has had considerable experience of the working of the laws relative to the sale of liquor, 1444-1447—Statement of the amount of drunkenness in Sheffield in each of the last ten years, distinguishing between Sunday and the rest of the week, 1450-1454—Considerable decrease of drunkenness with reference to the population since 1848; causes to which owing, 1455-1459. 1571-1573—Evidence to the effect that a prohibition of drinking in public-houses on Sunday would cause great inconvenience to large numbers of people, and would lead to great complaint, 1460 et seq.

Diminution of drunkenness in Oldham by the restrictions under the Act of 1854; 1468-1473. 1520-1522. 1536, 1537—Approval by many of the working classes at Sheffield of some further restrictions, 1474-1477. 1496-1507. 1523-1524—Opinion in favour of the Act of 1854, and of its application to Sheffield, 1477. 1498. 1507-1509. 1515-1522. 1531. 1539-1541. 1570—Decreased number of cases if the public-houses were closed an hour earlier at night, 1478-1480. 1533-1535.

Extent to which excursionists and travellers at Sheffield might be affected by the restrictions proposed in the Bill; doubt as to any serious inconvenience if they could obtain beer, &c. up to ten o'clock, 1481-1484. 1488-1495. 1512-1514. 1544-1555—Increase of drunkenness among women at Sheffield, 1485-1487—Impression that three hours' opening on Sunday would not be sufficient, and would not give satisfaction, 1499-1507—Very few persons who take their meals at public-houses, 1510, 1511.

Objection by the publicans at Sheffield to total closing; out of 548 houses, fourteen are closed voluntarily, 1525-1530. 1542, 1543—Grievance in London by the former closing at ten o'clock, so that the system was altered, 1536. 1549-1555—Further statement as to a large class at Sheffield being favourable to further restriction, though opposed to total closing, 1556-1565—Opinion that the Bill is not practicable, as the country would not submit to it, 1566. 1569—Explanation of the mode in which the cases of drunkenness are recorded at Sheffield, 1568—Large number of beershops in addition to public-houses, 1574.

Johnes, Arthur James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—As County Judge in Wales, has had varied and extensive experience of the habits of the working classes, and the effects of drunkenness throughout the Principality, 8734-8738—Very large proportion of the debts in county courts in Wales which are the effects of drunkenness, 8739, 8740—

Origination of the great mass of assaults in public-house drinking, 8741, 8742—Great importance of entirely prohibiting drinking on the premises as a preventive to drunkenness, 8743, 8744, 8749—Evil of social drinking in public-houses, the same being moreover often encouraged by the landlords, 8743, 8809-8811.

Very little drinking in Wales, save in taverns, 8744, 8789-8794—Sobriety of districts where taverns have been suppressed, as on part of the property of Lord Penrhyn, 8744-8749, 8744-8796—Uselessness of attempting to enact prohibitory measures unless demanded by public opinion; expediency, however, of the present Bill as an instalment, 8745, 8748, 8749, 8767-8769, 8772, 8773—Belief that secret drinking would not result from prohibiting consumption on the premises, 8746—Large number of bankruptcy cases which have their origin in drunkenness, 8750-8752.

Immense majority of the working classes in North Wales and, probably, in South Wales, also in favour of the present Bill, and still more so of total closing on Sunday; details hereon relative to an exceedingly careful canvass carried out in various towns, showing an almost unanimous support of further restriction, 8753-8757, 8762-8764, 8773—Opinion as to its being the duty of the legislature to give force to the wishes of the people in the matter, 8758-8773—Revival of Sunday drinking in the Bala district since the cessation of an arrangement for voluntary closing, 8759, 8760.

Much greater effect of total and compulsory closing than of voluntary effort and moral suasion, 8761—Improved dwellings in parts of Wales consequent on increased temperance, many of the working classes living in houses of their own, 8765, 8766—Conclusion that the Bill may be carried out without any serious difficulty, 8767-8769—Legal settlement already of the traveller question, 8770—Very little difficulty likely to arise upon the question as to what constitutes a bonâ fide meal, 8771—Contemplated right of travellers to use houses and taverns, in addition to these places being used also on such occasions as public dinners, &c., 8795-8809.

Jowett, Samuel Greenwood. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Superintendent of the Town Mission at Bradford; was for many years a working man, and is well conversant with the habits and opinions of the working classes in the matter of drinking, 3527-3531, 3537-3539—Decided approval of further restrictions on the sale of drink on Sunday, in the interests of working men and their families, 3532-3534—Immoral effects of Sunday drinking in public-houses in Bradford, 3534, 3542-3551—Mischiefs of Sunday drinking, in interfering with regularity of work, 3535, 3536, 3582.

Large number of persons counted by witness in public-houses and beershops in Bradford on Sunday evening; much larger number than on week day evenings, 3544-3557, 3700-3710—Belief that further restrictions on Sunday sale of liquor would be approved by a vast majority of the working classes and of the inhabitants generally; data for this conclusion, 3552 et seq.—Strong feeling in favour of total closing, though the present Bill would be accepted as a great boon, 3553-3576—Feeling also of the working classes in Manchester in favour of Sunday closing, 3563.

Desire of many Sunday drinkers to be protected from temptation on that day, 3569-3588, 3596-3616—Explanation that some working men approve of the Sunday Closing Bill, but object to the Permissive Bill, 3569, 3637-3645—Decided approval of the present Bill by the wives of labouring men, 3581—Social and physical improvement of the families of the labouring classes if the Bill be passed, 3582—Improvement by closing at ten instead of eleven, 3583, 3584.

Question considered as to the way in which those debarred from the public-house on Sunday night more profitably spend their time: objection to open air music being provided for them, 3617-3636—Probable difference of opinion among working men in Bradford as to the extent of restriction desirable, 3646-3655—Decided improvement upon the present state of things if there were only four hours for sale on Sunday, 3656-3658, 3668-3671—Statement showing that on week day evenings witness only found half the number of people in public-houses that he found on Sunday, 3700-3710.

Juvenile Intemperance. Increase of juvenile intemperance, M^r Cree 6128—Evil results of sending children to fetch beer from the public-houses, as in St. Giles', ib. 6129-6133, 6176-6183, 6213-6215—Encouragement of juvenile drinking by publicans, in evasion of the law, ib. 6212.

K.

Kent-street (Borough). Bad moral state of Kent-street and the Mint, though not so infamous as in former years, Burcham 604-609.

Knatchbull-Hugessen, Mr. (Member of the Committee). Draft Report proposed by him, and adopted by the Committee, subject to some amendments, Rep. xxiii-xxvi.

L.

Lambeth. Witness considers that there has been some diminution of late in the number of drunken cases in the Lambeth district, both on Sundays and on week days, Woolrych 633-636. 672-674. 691-699—Limited extent to which the lower classes in the Lambeth district indulge to excess in public-houses on Saturday night or on Sunday; perceptible improvement of late, ib. 685-700. See also New Cut.

Lancashire. Very strong feeling throughout Lancashire in favour of the total closing of public-houses on Sunday, Garrett 2227—Belief that total closing would be acceptable to the large towns generally in Lancashire, White 2935.

LEEDS:

Great improvement in Leeds by the Act which required public-houses to be shut on Sunday till half-past twelve, Lupton 3019-3021. 3045, 3046—Statement of the population of Leeds, and the number of public-houses and beer-shops, ib. 3022-3024—Information relative to the constitution of the Leeds Working Men's Institute, and the very general feeling of the members in favour of the present Bill, ib. 3025-3040. 3141-3147—Very prosperous business of some of the largest publicans who have closed voluntarily for many years, ib. 3047, 3048. 3149-3151—Desire of numerous publicans for total closing on Sunday, but for the abstraction of their week-day custom by those remaining open, ib. 3049. 3177, 3178—Feeling of employers in favour of further restriction, Lupton 3061. 3080-3082; Jackson 3274-3276.

Statistics of the actual number of drunken cases in Leeds on Sunday, the number being larger than on any other day save Saturday; explanation as to the basis of this calculation, Lupton 3064-3076. 3160-3163. 3194, 3195—Statement showing the large number of men and women found drinking between nine and eleven on Sunday evening in the public-houses and beer-shops in certain districts of the town, ib. 3077-3079. 3105-3114. 3164-3166—Strong approval of the Bill by two of the largest employers in the town, ib. 3080-3082.

Very small number of persons in Leeds to be inconvenienced by the present Bill, as compared with the general good to be effected, Lupton 3182-3187—Satisfactory operation of the Working Men's Institute conducted by witness, and opened on Sunday, ib. 3196. 3222, 3223—Excellent effect of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, ib. 3205-3207—Belief that the Bill before the Committee would work well in Leeds, and would not encounter any violent resistance, ib. 3208. 3217.

Experience of witness as to the great prevalence of drunkenness, profanity, and immorality on Sunday evening in Leeds owing to the present system, Jackson 3243-3256—Grounds for the statement that a very large majority of the working men of the town are in favour of entire closing on Sunday, ib. 3263, 3264. 3278-3287. 3291-3297—Immense public meeting at the time of Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill, when a large majority declared in its favour, ib. 3263. 3305-3314. 3354-3361—Very demoralising effect of licensed gardens and concert rooms on Sunday, ib. 3265. 3321, 3322—Small section of the community by which total closing might be resisted, ib. 3280-3287.

Great improvement in the habits of the great mass of the working classes in Leeds, though there is still a considerable portion requiring to be kept out of the temptation of Sunday drinking, Jackson, 3288-3290. 3342-3344.

Various ways in which the working classes in Leeds pass their time on Sunday, the temptation of the public-house being irresistible with many, especially in the evening, Walker 3406-3410—Denial that the Bill would impose any real hardship upon working men in Leeds, or would prevent the home consumption of beer, ib. 3418, 3419. 3465-3475—Particulars relative to the operation of the Working Men's Institute, and the practice as to the supply of refreshments, beer not being allowed, ib. 3426-3431. 3476-3487—Grounds for the conclusion that restriction would be satisfactory to a large majority of the people, ib. 3432-3439. 3517-3520. 3526—Belief that in a very short time the present Bill would be accepted in Leeds without any resistance whatever, ib. 3526.

See also Music (Public-houses).

Legislation. Concurrence in the view as to its being the duty of the Legislature to give force to the wishes of the people in favour of increased restriction, Archbishop Manning 2417-2423. 2442-2445; Cockburn 5947, 5948. 5959 et seq.; Johnes 8758. 8773—Expediency of the Legislature giving full attention to the feeling of the working classes on the subject of restriction, Hall 2523—Much greater reason for legislative interference with the sale of liquor on Sunday than with the sale of other articles, that is, in the interests of the social well-being of the people, ib. 2550-2553.

Expediency, before legislation, of studying the feelings of those to be affected thereby; means of ascertaining public opinion on the subject, McLaren 2828. 2845-2848—

Legislation—continued.

Argument that the minority should give way to the majority on the question of Sunday closing, and of legislation generally, Walker 3488-3501. 3514-3516; Elliott 5376-5388—Evidence in support of legislative restrictions for the public good, even though an inconvenience to some extent, Freshwater 4966, 4967. 4975-4978. 4996-5003; Leicester 5833-5844. 5859-5871. 5888-5892.

Statement that witness would rather wait for further restrictions for a few years or two, and for a new Parliament, if he had any fear that the Bill would cause any popular movement, Potter 5138-5140—Defence of the proposition that the Bill should be put in force for the benefit of the community, even though objected to by a large minority of the people, ib. 5165-5176.

Great inconvenience and dissatisfaction in the licensed victuallers' trade through the constant attempts to impose legislative restrictions upon it, Winterbotham 6623-6629; Wadhams 8061; Rep. iv.

Leicester Joseph. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a glass-blower and is Secretary to the Glass Makers' Friendly Society; has a very intimate acquaintance with the working classes in London and with operative glass-blowers throughout the Kingdom, 5651-5654. 5676. 5803-5810—Belief that the working classes generally are strongly in favour of increased restrictions on Sunday drinking, if not of total closing, 5655, 5656. 5675-5679—Immense evil caused by Sunday drinking in the glass trade, so that all the respectable operatives would hail restriction as a great boon, 5657-5668. 5675. 5706-5711. 5803-5823. 5851-5858—Large wages made in the trade, and constantly wasted in drink, 5662-5665. 5710. 5812, 5813. 5851-5858.

Abuse in the glass makers' trade under the former custom of footing payments; reduction of intemperance in the trade since the abolition of the custom, 5669-5674. 5782-5793. 5814—Peculiar absence of opposition to the present Bill, notwithstanding the agitation of the publicans, 5675-5678—Numerous meetings of working men addressed by witness and others in the New Cut and elsewhere in London on the question of temperance and of Sunday closing, the result showing a very general and growing feeling in support of restrictive measures, 5677-5680. 5761-5776.

Conclusion that the greater the facilities for drinking, the greater the drunkenness, 5681—Great importance attached to the prohibition of consumption on the premises, 5682, 5683—Strong feeling of employers of labour in favour of Sunday closing, 5684-5686—Circumstance of witness having gone through all the grades of his trade, from the lowest to the highest, 5687-5690—He believes that the greatest possible blessing to the nation would be the total closing of public houses, 5691. 5708, 5709. 5742-5745.

Excellent health of witness, who is a total abstainer from intoxicating drinks; good health generally of the total abstainers in the trade, as compared with the drinking men, 5692-5705. 5715-5737. 5824, 5825—Statement as to Sunday drinking being a prolific source of Monday tippling, 5706. 5739-5811—Advantage if the public-houses were entirely closed on Saturday as well as Sunday, 5707—Immense expenditure of the people of this country in intoxicating drinks, which if expended on food, clothing, &c., would add enormously to the comforts of the people; statistics on this subject, 5712. 5826, 5827. 5879-5888. 5909-5919—Estimated expenditure of 3,000,000 l. a year in the 11,000 public houses in London, 5712. 5826, 5827—Desire of many thousands of working men to be protected from the temptation of Sunday drinking, 5713, 5714—Considerable amount of drinking by glass-blowers when at work, the occupation being very severe, 5715-5740.

Expediency of legislative restriction on the ground that it would be a reflex of public opinion, and is called for by the great majority of the people, 5744. 5794-5802. 5847. 5859. 5867. 5871. 5878—Evidence in support of the statement that a vast amount of the crime of this country is caused by intemperance, 5745-5760—Reference to the views of Mr. Buxton, the brewer, upon the question of a Permissive Bill, 5776-5781.

Statement as to the necessity of legislative restriction for the men in witness's trade, a mere law or rule of the trade not being an effectual check, 5782-5795. 5828-5831—Belief that further restriction would diminish rather than increase illicit drinking and home drinking, 5796-5802. 5851-5858. 5920-5923—Further comment upon the opposition raised or sought to be raised by the publicans, 5815-5820. 5832—Argument in further support of legislative restrictions for the public good, even though an inconvenience to some extent, 5833-5844. 5859-5871. 5888-5892.

Explanation that witness is an advocate of the Permissive Bill, and that he approves only of the present measure as an instalment towards the entire closing of public-houses, 5845-5850—Belief that the men in witness's trade would not drink much at home on Sunday if the Bill be passed, 5851-5858—Baneful results in Liverpool of the system of free trade in drink, 5864. 5872-5874—Evil in encouraging such places as Cremorne Gardens,

Gardens, Highbury Barn, &c., on Sunday, so long as public-houses are open at the same time, 5875, 5876—Vicious effect of the system of recreation in Paris on Sunday, 5877.

Opinion that drunkenness is quite as prevalent in London as it ever was, 5879-5881—Expenditure in 1867 of 88,000,000 l. in intoxicating drinks in the United Kingdom, 5880. 5882-5888. 5909-5919—Denial that public opinion declared itself against increased restriction at the time of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, the opposition then raised having had reference to the Sunday Trading Bill, 5893-5908.

Licensed Victuallers. See Publicans.

Licenses. Doubt as to the expediency of a system of six days' licenses, Sir R. Mayne 264-266. 324-330—Great evil of the facilities of the licensing system, Archbishop Manning 2384. 2445. 2495-2500—Large accumulation of public-houses in close proximity to each other in London, there being no legitimate need for so many, ib. 2374—Expediency of the legislature retracing its steps in the matter of licenses, &c., ib. 2445. 2495-2500.

Great advantage if those publicans opening on Sunday had to pay an increased license, Mackie 4341, 4342—Inadequacy of a system of six days' licenses as a means towards Sunday closing, Bushell 4676.

Tendency of an excessive number of public-houses to increase drinking habits; strong objection on this score to a free licensing system, Winterbotham 6663-6665. 6678, 6679—Objection to the proposal for a system of six days' licenses, if the license for the whole week is to be increased beyond the present amount, Candelet 8515, 8516. 8575, 8576.

Suggestion by the Committee whether it may not be desirable that in certain cases licenses should be granted at a reduced rate for the sale of liquors on week days only, Rep. iv.

1. Details relative to the Amount of Drunkenness on Week-days and on Sunday:

Statement of the number of drunken cases in Liverpool in each year since 1858; apparent decrease in the last few years, for which it is difficult to account, the population having increased, Greig 974-980. 991-995. 1003-1013. 1216—Statement of the number of public-houses and beer-shops, and the amount of vice in Liverpool and Manchester respectively, ib. 1217-1223.

Conclusion that drunkenness has decidedly increased in Liverpool, and that the increase has extended to Sundays as well as week-days, White 2868-2876—Excess of drunkenness in Liverpool as compared with any other town in England, there being also an excess of pauperism and an increase of crime, ib. 2874-2876—Stringent regulations under which the Liverpool police act in connexion with drunkenness, ib. 2904-2906—Features in common between Liverpool and Glasgow, the two towns being remarkable for drunkenness, ib. 2951-2953—Doubt as to the large seafaring population accounting sufficiently for the excess of drinking, ib. 2971, 2972.

Considerable amount of drunkenness among the seafaring population, Gladstone 2999—Weight attached to the statistics submitted to the Committee by Dr. White, ib. 3007, 3008.

Statement on the subject of the much larger proportion of drunkenness in Liverpool than in other seaport towns, Wybergh 7646-7653. 7702, 7703—Very efficient police, cases of drunkenness being closely looked after, ib. 7702, 7703.

Tabular statement containing sundry details in connection with the operation of the public-houses and beer-houses respectively in the years 1858-67, App. 415.

1. Details relative to the Amount of Drunkenness, &c.—continued.

Return showing the number of apprehensions for drunkenness, and for offences in which the charge of drunkenness was merged in a graver offence, in the years 1853-67, distinguishing those apprehended on Sunday, App. 416.

2. Mortality of Children from Suffocation in Bed by Drunken Parents :

Statement relative to the large number of deaths of children in Liverpool through their being overlaid or suffocated in bed by their parents in consequence of drunkenness: less proportion of these deaths due to Sunday drinking than to drinking on Saturday night, Greig 1045-1062. 1071, 1072. 1195-1200—Numerous children suffocated in bed in Liverpool by drunken parents between Saturday and Monday of each week, White 2907. 2919-2921.

Return of inquests held upon infants found suffocated in bed with their parents on each morning of the week during 1867: large proportion of suffocations on Sunday, App. 415.

3. System of Free Licenses from 1862 to 1866 : its Effect :

Less drunkenness under the restrictive system than under the free licensing system, White 2873—Baneful results of the system of free trade in drink, as tried in Liverpool for about three years, Leicester 5864. 5872-5874.

Evidence in explanation of the practice adopted by the Liverpool magistrates from 1862 to 1866 of granting licenses to all applicants of good character; abandonment of the practice in 1866, several memorials having been presented against the system, Wybergh 7568-7571. 7612-7645—Approval by witness of the system of free licenses, ib. 7568-7570. 7582-7585. 7669-7674—Increase of public-houses and decrease of beer-shops since 1858, ib. 7572—Much larger number of licensed public-houses in Liverpool than in Manchester, the drunken cases being also much more numerous in Liverpool, ib. 7573-7576.

4. Effect of Restrictions on the Sale of Drink on Sunday :

Diminution of drunkenness in Liverpool on Sunday by the partial closing of public-houses on that day, Greig 887—Statement relative to the material decrease in the number of drunken cases on Sunday during the operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act of 1854, ib. 888-913. 958-961—Further diminution of drunkenness on Sunday if there were further restriction upon the sale of liquor, ib. 919-921. 931-935. 962—Question considered whether the proposed restrictions would not be very inconvenient to sailors and the large floating population who have no homes: numerous refreshment houses available to this class, ib. 1163-1193.

Check upon drunkenness under the system of restriction, White 2873—Approval, as regards Liverpool, of the restrictions proposed by the Bill upon the sale of drink on Sunday, there being much drunkenness on Sunday evening which it is very desirable to check, Gladstone 2973-2982. 2997, 2998.

Other causes than restriction to which diminution of drunkenness in the town is owing; an increase of restriction on Sunday is, in fact, no check upon intemperance, Wybergh, 7588 et seq.—Doubt as to the Act of 1854 having produced any decrease of drunkenness, whilst it caused great dissatisfaction, ib. 7655-7661.

5. Effect of Excursions as regards Drunkenness :

Question considered whether the excess of Sunday drinking is not to some extent owing to the people not taking excursions out of town in larger numbers, White 2956-2968—Small amount of drinking on Sunday as compared with week-days; growing practice of excursions adverted to hereon, Gladstone 2990-2992. 3000. 3009-3011.

6. Effect of Restrictions as regards Sunday Excursionists :

Very little inconvenience as regards excursionists from Liverpool by a restriction of the hours of sale on Sunday, Greig 954-957. 999. 1030—Improbability of much inconvenience to steam-boat excursionists at Liverpool if the public-houses were closed at half-past nine, ib. 1105-1114.

7. Public Opinion on the Question of Increased Restriction :

Very general satisfaction to be given in Liverpool if public-houses were only open on Sunday for an hour and a half in the middle of the day, and an hour and a half in the evening, Greig 921-923. 937. 981-986. 1014, 1015. 1124-1126. 1135-1137—Temporary character of complaints by the lower classes and the publicans if the restrictions of the Bill were carried out, and if consumption on the premises were not allowed, ib. 924-930. 1016, 1017. 1099—Careful steps taken a few years since in order to ascertain the feeling in the town on the subject of Sunday closing, ib. 966-969. 981-983. 1013.

7. Public Opinion on the Question of Increased Restriction—continued.

Large proportion of the householders of Liverpool in favour of entire closing of public-houses on Sunday, there being, however, a very large section of the community opposed to total closing, Greig 981-986—Belief that there was no great opposition in Liverpool to the working of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, ib. 1097. 1100-1104—Conclusion that discontent at Liverpool with the Bill would be limited to the class of habitual drinkers, and that the middle classes would be pleased with the proposed restrictions, ib. 1234-1240.

Exceedingly careful canvass of the householders generally in 1863, the result being that an immense majority declared in favour of total closing on Sunday, White 2880-2883. 2888-2892, 2912-2917—Very large majority of artisans and of labourers in favour of total closing, ib. 2891—Reference to a recent large petition from Liverpool as showing the widespread feeling in the town in support of restrictions on the Sunday sale of liquor, ib. 2893-2899.

Belief that no public disturbance would arise in Liverpool if further restrictions were imposed, White 2925-2937—Immense attendance at a public meeting in 1863 in favour of entire closing on Sunday, ib. 2940-2945—Approval of restrictions by large numbers of those who cannot resist the temptation to drink to excess, ib. 2954, 2955

Opinion that the Bill would be carried out in Liverpool without any serious opposition being experienced, there being a general feeling in favour of restriction, Gladstone 2983, 2984. 2989-2991. 3003-3005—Considerable amount of drunkenness in Liverpool, whereas eighty per cent. of the householders have decided in favour of entire closing on Sunday, Steinthal 3799-3806.

Reference to a canvass in Liverpool on the question of restriction, witness having from the first taken an active part as an opponent of restrictive legislation, Wybergh 7577-7585—Feeling of the municipality in favour of further restriction, ib. 7688-7690.

8. Feeling among the Publicans in favour of Sunday Closing :

Evidence relative to the views and the practice of the publicans of Liverpool upon the question of curtailing the hours of sale on Sunday ; probable satisfaction if there were one restrictive rule applicable to all, Greig 926. 962. 970-972. 1035-1038. 1087. 1154-1162. 1224-1233. 1242-1245—Large number of public-houses voluntarily closed, ib. 926. 962. 972—Approval of entire closing by a large number of publicans over and above those who have actually closed, ib. 970-972—Canvass of the publicans of Liverpool in 1860 upon the question of Sunday closing ; large majority in favour thereof, White 2877-2879. 2884-2887—Approval of Sunday closing by a large number of publicans, Wybergh 7586.

See also Beer-houses.

Local Regulations. Objection to the hours of closing in different towns being left to the local authorities, Sir R. Mayne 263—Concurrence in the objection to its resting with the local authorities in any town, as under the Act of 1864, to apply restrictions upon the sale of liquor on Sunday, Sir T. Henry, 438-442.—See also Permissive Bill.

Lodgers. Admission that some inconvenience must be experienced by lodgers and others if the Bill be passed, such inconvenience however being trifling, in comparison with the great benefit to the community at large, Hall 2577-2595—Comparatively few lodgers in Bolton to be inconvenienced by the Bill, Barlow 4263-4265. 4270-4272. 4299-4303—Doubt as to much inconvenience in the case of lodgers, &c., at Southampton if the public-houses could not supply meals and drink to them on Sunday, Enright 4469-4475. 4494-4503—Little, if any, inconvenience to be caused by the Bill to lodgers, Flather 4638-4641. 4645-4650.

Very few lodgers in Bedford, to whom, moreover, the Bill would not prove any inconvenience, Freshwater 4928-4932. 4973, 4974—Absence of any real hardship to lodgers in London ; if the Bill become law they would soon accommodate themselves to it, ib. 4947-4959—Grounds for dissenting from the view that the present Bill would necessarily cause great inconvenience to lodgers and others, Potter 5088-5099. 5109-5113—Very little inconvenience by the Bill to such of the men in witness's district as are lodgers, Cockburn 5966-5968—Statement that but little inconvenience would be caused to lodgers in London, if excluded from having Sunday meals in public-houses, McCree 6192-6210.

Belief as to public-houses on Sunday being very necessary for persons in lodgings, Winterbotham 6552-6554—Inconvenience to be caused by the Bill in the case of lodgers and others who take their meals in public-houses on Sunday, Wadhams 8033-8036. 8142-8145.

See also Meals (Lower Classes) Provinces.

Lord's Day Society. Comment on the widespread opposition on the part of the Lord's Day Society to the opening of places of recreation on Sunday, Morrell 6297-6302.

Loss of Trade. Calculation that the Bill would entail a loss of 8,000 l. a week to the 5,430 licensed victuallers comprising the Provincial Defence League, Candelet 8520. 8608-8613. 8727, 8728.

Lupton, Darnton. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Merchant at Leeds, has been president of the Leeds Chamber of Commerce, and a magistrate of the borough for many years, and has had considerable experience in connection with the operation and the licensing of public-houses, 3014-3019—Great improvement in Leeds by the Act which required public-houses to be shut on Sunday till half-past twelve, 3019-3021. 3045, 3046—Statement of the population of Leeds and the number of public-houses and beer shops, 3022-3024.

Information relative to the constitution of the Leeds Working Men's Institute, and the very general feeling of the members in favour of the present Bill, 3025-3040. 3141-3147—Approval of the Bill by the magistrates of the borough, with but one dissentient, 3041-3044. 3208—Boon to the publicans themselves by Sunday restrictions, 3046—Very prosperous business of some of the largest publicans, who have closed voluntarily for many years, 3047, 3048. 3149-3151—Desire of numerous publicans for total closing on Sunday, but for the abstraction of their week day custom by those remaining open, 3049. 3177, 3178.

Very injurious effect upon young women in Leeds, when attracted to the public-houses on Sunday by the music formerly allowed there; benefits consequent on the Local Act for preventing Sunday music in public-houses, 3050-3053. 3152, 3153—Extensive indulgence of the working classes in drink on Sunday, so that they are constantly unfitted for work on Monday; instances of this, 3054-3061. 3154, 3155—Great benefit to the working men if there were a complete break on Sunday, 3057—Excessive drinking on Sunday in some of the villages around Leeds, 3058-3060.

Concurrence of opinion of employers in Leeds in favour of the present Bill, 3061. 3080-3082—Witness cannot conceive any advantage in Sunday drinking, whilst the men and their families would be all the happier if it were suppressed, 3062, 3063—Statistics of the actual number of drunken cases in Leeds on Sunday, the number being larger than on any other day save Saturday; explanation as to the basis of this calculation, 3064-3076. 3160-3163. 3194, 3195.

Decided approval of the Bill before the Committee, as conferring public benefits far outweighing any individual inconvenience that might arise, 3077. 3093. 3129-3135. 3166—Statement showing the large number of men and women found drinking between nine and eleven on Sunday evening, in the public-houses and beer shops in certain districts in Leeds, 3077-3079. 3105-3114. 3164-3166—Strong approval of the Bill by two of the largest employers in the town, 3080-3082—Examination to the effect that witness does not propose to deprive working men of opportunities to obtain drink on Sunday for consumption at home, whilst if the houses were entirely closed on that day it might be obtained in bottle on the previous evening, 3083-3102. 3156-3159.

Expected improvement in the homes of the people, if beer could not be consumed in the public-houses on Sunday, 3103, 3104—Happier state of the men as well as of their families if the former spent less of their time in the public-houses and more of it with their families, not only on Sunday but on Saturday night, 3104. 3115-3128—Influence of the Licensed Victuallers Association adverted to as preventing many publicans from openly supporting restrictions, 3136-3140.

Statement that the facility under the Bill for obtaining drink on Sunday evening from eight till ten o'clock, for consumption at home, would prevent serious inconvenience in the case of excursionists and others, 3167-3175. 3202-3204. 3208. 3212, 3213—Belief that a permissive measure would be adopted in all large towns in a few years, 3176—Preference for a compulsory measure in districts outside large towns, ib.—Opinion that publicans generally would conduct their houses more prosperously, if Sunday were a day of rest for them, 3177.

Beneficial effect of the practice in Leeds of paying wages on Friday; approval of a compulsory enactment to this effect, 3179-3181—Very small number of persons in Leeds to be inconvenienced by the present Bill, as compared with the general good to be effected, 3182-3187—Limited evil from private drinking at home, as compared with the evil of public-house drinking, 3188-3193.

Decided approval of the provision of means of innocent recreation for the lower classes on Sunday, 3196-3198—Satisfactory operation of the Working Men's Institution conducted by witness in Leeds, and opened on Sunday, 3196. 3222, 3223—Importance in the first instance of imposing restrictions on the sale of drink, it being the strong conviction of witness that the people will in such case spend their Sunday within the scope of beneficent influences, 3196-3199—Great improvement in the homes of working men and the physical condition of their families, if the money spent in public-houses on Sunday were available for food and clothing, 3199-3201.

Excellent effect of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act in Leeds, 3205-3207—Belief that the Bill before the Committee would work well in Leeds, and would not encounter any violent violent resistance, 3208-3211. 3217—Increased expenditure in drink when wages are high, 3214-3216—Habits of the Irish in Leeds as to drinking; restraint exercised over them by their clergy, 3218-3221.

M.

McCree, The Rev. George Wilson. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has had twenty years' experience among the lower classes in St. Giles, as a Baptist minister, 6113, 6114—Excessive amount of drinking in St. Giles on Sunday as compared with any other day in the week, the result being a great impetus to misery and crime, 6115-6120—Large attendance of young people in the public-houses in St. Giles, &c., on Sunday; great demoralisation in consequence, 6119, 6120. 6135, 6136—Feeling of the more respectable working men in favour of increased restriction, 6121. 6150. 6174, 6175—Failure of attempts by witness to attract the people away from the public-houses on week days by means of entertainments of different kinds, 6122-6124.

Success of excursions carried out by witness for the lower classes, at which intoxicating drinks have been disallowed, 6125-6127—Increase of juvenile intemperance, 6128—Increase of drunkenness among women, 6129—Statement relative to the improper temptation held out to children by some publicans in St. Giles, to bring the jugs for beer to their houses, 6129-6133. 6176-6183. 6216-6225—Numerous public-houses in St. Giles, and large expenditure in them, 6133, 6134.

Excessive drinking by large numbers of working men on Sunday, 6137, 6138—Improvement among the working classes, owing to various causes, 6139-6141—Deplorable amount of drinking among the working classes in the North of England, 6142, 6143—Fallacy of the police returns of drunkenness, 6143-6145—Great prevalence of drunkenness in country villages, 6147-6149—Peculiarly objectionable operation of beer-houses 6148, 6149.

Decided approval of the present Bill, as an instalment towards total closing, 6151-6154. 6164-6166—Absence of popular opposition to the Bill in St. Giles, 6155—Beneficial operation of the Act of 1854 in St. Giles, there having been no good reason for the repeal of the Act, 6156-6163—Decrease of drunkenness as restriction is increased, 6164-6166. 6188—Feeling of employers of labour strongly in favour of Sunday closing, 6167, 6168.

Great boon to working men, and to their wives and children, if the Legislature were to remove the temptation of Sunday drinking 6169, 6170—More beneficial character of excursions out of London, if the Bill be passed, 6171-6173—Advantage, short of the Bill, by limiting the hours of opening in the evening, 6186-6190—Statement that but little inconvenience would be caused to lodgers in London if excluded from having Sunday meals in public-houses, 6191-6210.

Great check to intemperance by requiring the drink to be consumed off the premises, there being but little drunkenness in the homes of the people, 6211—Encouragement of juvenile drinking by publicans, in evasion of the law, 6212—Evil results of sending children to fetch beer from the public-houses, 6213-6215—Temptation of the public-houses in St. Giles, on Sunday, in being open after the dinners of the lower classes, 6226-6228.

Mackie, Mr. Alderman. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been three times mayor of Manchester; is largely interested in the liquor trade throughout the kingdom, 4304-4308—Explanation as to witness having retail licenses in connection with most of his establishments, with a view chiefly to selling beer by the single bottle, 4309. 4334-4336. 4353-4364—Practice of witness to close all his houses on Sunday; grounds for the conclusion that he is a considerable gainer thereby, in doing a more respectable business, 4310. 4316, 4317. 4334-4339. 4365 4398-4400. 4407-4413—Belief that further restrictions on Sunday would be accepted by the working men in Manchester without disturbance, and would be a great public good, 4311-4315. 4323-4326.

Advantage of Sunday closing as enabling publicans to have a better and superior class of servants, and to do a more respectable business, 4317. 4407-4418—Large proportion of crime which emanates from drunkenness, 4318-4322—Approval of the present Bill as an instalment, witness being in favour of total closing on Sunday, 4323-4329—Favourable operation of Forbes Mackenzie's Act in Scotland, the habits of the people as to drinking being, however, very different from the habits of the English, 4330-4333. 4383-4387.

Willingness of many publicans to close on Sunday, but for the competition of those declining to do so, 4340—Great advantage if those opening on Sunday had to pay an increased license, 4341, 4342—Practice in Manchester in regard to musical recreation for the people on Sunday; discontinuance of music in the parks, 4345-4352—Question whether there may not be more drunkenness on the part of witness's customers on week days through his closing on Sunday, 4365-4370.

Further statement relative to the retail business of witness in the sale of beer or gin at the counter, and the mode in which conducted; refusal to serve drunken people or profligate women, &c., 4371-4382. 4419-4430—Absence of any real hardship to the working classes in Manchester if prevented from consuming liquor in the public-houses, or if required to purchase their Sunday beer on Saturday night, 4388-4397—Regard had by the publicans to their own interests, and not to the interests of the public, in opening on Sunday, 4404-4406.

M'Laren, Duncan (Member of the House). (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was Lord Provost of Edinburgh from 1851 to 1854; has for many years taken a strong interest in the laws regulating the sale of drink on Sunday, 2664, 2665—Information relative to the movement set on foot in Edinburgh in 1852, and the measures adopted by the magistrates for closing the public-houses on Sunday, 2666—Great prevalence of drunkenness on Sunday before the public-houses were (for the most part) closed, as compared with the state of things subsequently, 2666, 2667—Introduction of the Forbes Mackenzie Act, in order to correct the defects of the Edinburgh regulations, and to render compulsory throughout Scotland the system of Sunday closing, 2666, 2668, 2669.

Adoption by Mr. Muir's Act of 1861 of certain amendments of Forbes Mackenzie's Act, in order to prevent evasion, 2670, 2671. 2675-2678—Inquiry by a commission into the working of Forbes Mackenzie's Act, the evidence in its favour having been overwhelming, 2670-2672—Small section opposed to the Act, the mass of the people being strongly in its favour, 2673, 2674—Requirement by the Act that all public-houses be closed at eleven o'clock on week days, and entirely closed on Sunday, there being an exception in favour of hotels, 2677. 2750, 2751.

Statistics showing the great decrease of drunkenness in Edinburgh on week days and on Sunday since the operation of Forbes Mackenzie's Act, in 1854; 2679-2685—Great diminution of drunken cases on Saturday and Monday by closing the public-houses on the intervening day, 2685—Statement relative to the great diminution of crime in the city and county of Edinburgh since the formation of Forbes Mackenzie's Act, and the decrease of drinking, 2686. 2716.

Evidence relative to the large diminution in the consumption of spirits in Scotland since the passing of Forbes Mackenzie's Act; examination hereon whether this may not be attributable to the increase of duty and price, and to other causes than the Act in question, 2686-2715. 2739-2746. 2752 et seq., 2839. 2854-2859—Decided effect of increased restriction upon sale in further diminishing drunkenness, 2717, 2718—Admission that evasion and illicit drinking exist to some extent in Edinburgh, &c., but the amount of such drinking is small in comparison with the diminution through restrictions, 2719-2722. 2768-2790. 2840, 2841.

Belief that the great majority of the working classes in Edinburgh and throughout Scotland are favourable to the present state of the law, 2724-2727. 2737—Conclusion as to public opinion in Scotland being, on the whole, decidedly adverse to a removal of the existing restrictions, 2727. 2731-2738—Approval of the limit of the hours of opening on week days to eleven o'clock at night, including Saturday, 2728-2730—Feeling of women strongly in favour of restrictions, 2738.

Respects in which restrictions would probably be accepted more willingly by the people of Scotland than by the people of England, 2747-2749. 2805. 2842-2847. 2860—Relative consumption of spirits in Ireland and in Scotland, with reference to the population in each case, and the restrictions in force, 2765-2767. 2857-2859—Approval generally of the adoption in England of the Bill before the Committee; doubt, however, whether its immediate application to London might not create dissatisfaction, 2792. 2803-2805. 2835-2837. 2860, 2861.

Different effect of restrictions in Scotland and in London, inasmuch as beer rather than whisky is drunk in the London public-houses, 2793-2805—Dangerous temptation offered to the working classes by public-houses, even though frequented much in the same way as clubs are by the upper classes, 2793. 2821-2827—Facility under the Bill for the public to obtain beer for their meals, 2803—Admission that diminished drinking habits in Scotland are the result partly of other influences besides that of restrictive legislation, 2806-2820. 2839.

Belief that the great majority of the working classes of England would approve of further restrictions on the sale of drink on Sunday, 2827-2829—Expediency, before legislation, of studying the feelings of those to be affected thereby; means of ascertaining public opinion on the subject, 2828. 2845-2848—Interested motives of publicans in getting up petitions against the Bill, whereas there are no such personal motives in connection with petitions in support of restriction, 2830-2834.

Witness would have no hesitation in applying the Bill to Liverpool, Manchester, and other large towns, though he has some hesitation as regards London, 2835-2837—Very few beer-houses in Edinburgh, 2838—Marked difference in which the Sunday is spent by the people in Scotland and in the large towns in England, 2842-2844.

With

With regard to the small per-centage of drunkenness in Edinburgh on the part of those who used to frequent public-houses on Sunday, it does not follow that Sunday closing is non-beneficial or objectionable to the large majority who do not indulge to excess, 2849-2853—Doubt as to the expediency of closing earlier on Saturday than on other nights, 2862, 2863—Other considerations besides that of excessive drinking which render restrictions on the Sabbath peculiarly desirable, 2863, 2864.

[Second Examination.]—Further explanation of the circumstances which led to Forbes Mackenzie's Act; the authorship of the Act rested mainly with Lord Kinnaird, 7322, 7323.

Magistrates. Belief that the bench of magistrates at Liverpool would be nearly unanimous in favour of the Bill, Gladstone 2989—Approval of the Bill by the magistrates of the borough of Leeds, with but one dissentient, Lupton 3041-3044. 3208—Almost unanimous support of the Bill by the borough magistrates at Leeds, Jackson 3277—Belief that a majority of the borough magistrates at Southampton are favourable to further restrictions, Eldridge 3861-3867. 3950-3954—General feeling of the Cheshire magistrates in favour of the Bill, Bushell 4664.

1. Amount of Drunkenness on Sunday and on Week Days :

Statement of the number of drunken cases in Manchester on Sunday, and on the rest of the week : smaller number on Sunday than on the average of other days, Palin 1250-1255—Explanation of the mode in which cases of drunkenness are recorded, ib. 1261, 1262—Considerable increase in the number of drunken cases taken up by the police, ib. 1263, 1264. 1303, 1304. 1341-1347—Much fewer public-houses and less drunkenness in Manchester than in Liverpool, whilst the beerhouses are far more numerous, ib. 1296-1302.

Exceptions taken to the statistics submitted to the Committee by Captain Palin upon the subject of drunkenness in Manchester, on Sunday and on week days : different results according to witness's calculations, Candelet 8500-8508. 8523-8525—Circumstance of there having been more cases of drunkenness in Manchester after the increase of the spirit duties in 1860 than previously : this may have been owing to the consumption of spirits which evaded duty, ib. 8709-8712.

Return of the number of apprehensions for drunkenness, &c., in the years 1862-67, distinguishing the number between one p.m. on Sunday and four a.m. on Monday, App. 418.

2. Effect of Restrictions on the Sale of Liquor :

Operation of the existing restrictions in Manchester on Sunday in keeping down drunkenness on that day, witness being unprepared, however, to say positively that further restrictions are advisable, Palin 1258-1260. 1266. 1280-1282. 1293-1295. 1314. 1357-1364. 1424-1436—With regard to the smaller number of cases on Sunday than on other days, the less facilities for obtaining are much less on Sunday than on week days, ib. 1365-1375—Beneficial operation of Sir George Grey's Act in Manchester : prompt adoption of the Act by the town council, ib. 1376-1379.

3. Public Opinion on the Question of Restriction :

Impression that the imposition of further restrictions would be favourably received by the great majority of the people of Manchester, Palin 1272-1278. 1312-1322. 1351-1356—Very strong feeling in Manchester in favour of the total closing of public-houses on Sunday : large meetings on the subject, Garrett 2193. 2199-2207—A large majority of the working classes approve of total closing, ib. 2224-2226—Feeling of the working classes in Manchester in favour of Sunday closing, Jowett 3563.

Particulars as to the result of the canvass in the case of Manchester : large majority of the lower classes favourable to total closing on Sunday, Steinthal 3733, 3734. 3737-3740. 3751-3753—Belief that further restriction on Sunday would be accepted by the working men without disturbance, and would be a great public good, Mackie 4311-4315. 4323-4326.

Strong movement in Manchester in 1855 for the repeal of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, Candelet 8494, 8495—Statement as to the watch committee being influenced by the agitation in the town in favour of the Bill, ib. 8503. 8547-8551. 8598-8603—Objection to the household canvass carried out in Manchester by supporters of the Bill, as being of an ex parte character, ib. 8540, 8541—The agitation does not represent the real state of public opinion on the question, ib. 8599-8603.

MANCHESTER—continued.4. Views of Publicans on the Subject:

Feeling among the publicans on the question of increased restriction; proportion favourable to further restrictions, Palin 1315. 1323-1327. 1380-1382—Willingness of many publicans to close on Sunday but for the competition of those declining to do so, Mackie 4340—Voluntary closing on Sunday by some few publicans in the town, Candelet 8509.

5. Effect of increased Restriction as regards Excursionists:

Opinion that further restriction would not cause much inconvenience to excursionists, Palin 1336-1340. 1384-1398. 1437-1443.

6. Moral and Educational Condition of the People:

Great improvement in the moral and educational character of the people of Manchester, Candelet 8535, 8536—Question considered whether there has not been a larger comparative increase of beerhouses than of the means of education, ib. 8663. 8674. 8706-8708.

7. Means of Sunday Recreation:

Injurious effect of the system of musical performances in the public-houses on Sunday evening, Garrett 2235, 2236; Steinthal 3825-3837—Practice in Manchester in regard to musical recreation for the people on Sunday; discontinuance of music in the parks, Mackie 4345-4352.—See also Music (Public Houses).

Manning, Most Reverend Archbishop. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Comment on the less restriction upon the sale of drink on Sunday than of meat, bread, &c., 2364. 2490-2493—Belief that the evil of drunkenness has been steadily increasing, and that the police returns on the subject are far from representing the real extent of the evil, 2364-2367. 2401-2405—Occurrence of the evil more especially on Saturday night, the mischief being much greater on that evening than on Sunday, 2364. 2368, 2369—Beneficial operation of voluntary associations for checking drunkenness on Saturday and Sunday, these however being quite inadequate in the absence of legislative restrictions, 2367. 2494, 2495.

Great boon to be conferred by the present Bill though it does not touch the mischief of Saturday evening, 2368, 2369—Extensive evasion of the existing restrictions, 2369-2371. 2410—Decided approval of the provisions of the Bill, even though it may lead to some increase of evasion, 2372, 2373—Conclusion as to the very beneficial effects produced in Scotland by the Forbes Mackenzie Act; large diminution through the Act in the consumption of spirits. 2373. 2375-2380. 2424.

Importance of prohibiting consumption on the premises, as a means of keeping the working classes more at home with their families, 2373—Immense amount of demoralisation and misery caused by the excessive facilities for procuring drink, more especially on Saturday night and Sunday, 2373, 2374. 2385—Spread of drinking habits among women and children, 2374. 2394. 2432-2434—Great evil of the facilities of the licensing system, 2374. 2445. 2495-2500—Large diminution expected in the excessive consumption of beer on Sunday, if proper restrictions be applied, 2380-2382.

Belief that the opposition to the Act of 1854 was not the spontaneous action of the people, 2383. 2391. 2466—Statement showing the wide-spread feeling among the working classes in London, Manchester, and in numerous other large towns, in favour of the restrictions proposed by the present Bill, 2383-2385. 2395—Desolate homes of the working classes owing to the want of legislative restrictions upon the sale of drink, 2385—Expediency of improved police arrangements for preventing evasion, 2386. 2410, 2411.

Great importance attached to improved dwellings for the lower classes in London and other large places, as a means of counteracting the attractions of the public-houses, 2386. 2426. 2454. 2478-2489. 2502—Limited abuse likely to arise from working men taking drink home for consumption on Sunday, 2387, 2388. 2393—Argument as to the moderate and temperate character of the proposal for the adoption of a permissive Bill, 2389, 2390—Statement showing the exceedingly satisfactory operation of the system of voluntary closing on Sunday in several Roman Catholic dioceses in Ireland, by the spontaneous action of the people, 2389. 2397-2400. 2441. 2468-2471.

Especial difficulty in applying restrictions in London, as compared with smaller places; the present Bill, however, may well be tried, 2389, 2390. 2396. 2410. 2448-2453—Great advance of public opinion on the question since the Act of 1854; 2391, 2392—Advantage of additional restrictions on sale on Saturday night, 2406, 2407—Expediency of increased restrictions on Sunday being combined with increased facilities for harmless recreation, 2408. 2428—Decided improvement by closing at ten instead of eleven on Sunday night, 2412-2416.

Further evidence as to the desire of the working classes for the proposed restrictions, and as to the expediency of the Legislature giving encouragement and force to the movement, 2417-2423. 2442-2445—Decided effect of restrictions in diminishing drunkenness, though there may be some increase of evasions, 2424. 2429, 2430—Limited amount of inconvenience to be caused to travellers, &c., as compared with the benefits to be conferred by the proposed Bill, 2425-2431. 2438-2440. 2467—Frequent instances of the miserable homes of the working classes being owing to the public-houses, 2435-2437. 2501.

Readiness of the Irish population in England to conform to a restrictive law, 2442-2444. 2468-2471—Expediency of the Legislature retracing its steps in the matter of licenses, &c., 2445. 2495-2500—Strong feeling of the Roman Catholic clergy in favour of restrictions being applied on Saturday night and Sunday, 2446. 2447—Dissent from the view that in the present miserable state of the dwellings of the lower classes it is a grievance to working men to shut them out of the public-houses, 2455. 2478-2489. 2504.

Exhaustive and convincing character of the Report of the Select Committee of 1854 in favour of limiting the hours of sale on Sunday, 2457-2459—Material diminution of drunkenness in London after the passing of the Act, 2460, 2461—Unwillingness of publicans to close on Sunday through fear of the competition of those who remain open, 2462-2465. 2495—Statement in approval of extending to the country the clause in the Bill relative to lodgers and others in the metropolis having facilities for obtaining meals or refreshments on Sunday, 2472-2476. 2486-2489.

Manufacturing Districts. Strong feeling of the working classes in the manufacturing districts in favour of the Bill, Archbishop Manning 2383, 2384.

Results of a canvass of householders and of workshops in the manufacturing districts; very large majority in favour of closing public-houses on Sunday, App. 423, 424.

Memorial of numerous employers of labour relative to the exceedingly injurious consequences of Sunday drinking, App. 425, 426.

Mathews, The Rev. Edward. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a Baptist minister at Bristol, 6086—Has strong convictions as to the baneful effects of drunkenness, in reference to morality, poverty, and crime, 6087, 6088—Is of opinion that there is more drinking on Sunday than on other days, 6089, 6090—Supplies details of the results of public meetings and of a house to canvass in Bristol, showing a large majority in favour of Sunday closing of public-houses; the canvass, however, was for certain reasons very incomplete, 6091-6103. 6108, 6109—A considerable number of the electors, though only a small minority of the whole, have signed an address in favour of the Bill, 6104-6107—The labouring classes are largely in favour of total closing on Sunday, 6110-6112.

Mayne, Sir Richard, K.C.B. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has on several former occasions given evidence upon the question of restrictions on the sale of liquor; in 1855 expressed himself favourable to the removal of some of the restrictions under the Act of 1854; 1-6. 112, 113—Similar principle involved in the present Bill as in the Act of 1854; 7-8—Statistics of the amount of drunkenness in the metropolis since the year 1831; conclusion as to the favourable operation of the Act 18 & 19 Vict.; 9-4. 18-23. 38.

Salutary working of the Public House Closing Act of 1864, with reference to the amount of drunkenness and disorderly conduct, 14-23—Very rare instances of the grant of exceptional licenses in the metropolis exempting from the provisions of the Act of 1864; 15-17—Increasing amount of drunkenness among females, 26, 27—Information relative to the number of cases of drunkenness on Sunday as compared with other days, the result being that the Sunday cases are only half the number of those on other days, 28-34—Much more drunkenness on Saturday than on any other day, 35-37.

Considerable relaxation of the restrictions under the Act of 1855, with reference to travellers, 38-41—Belief as to the practice of excursions on Sunday having tended to diminish drunkenness, 42-48—Absence of increase of drunkenness in the suburban districts frequented by excursionists, 44-48—Difficulty in ascertaining the relative amounts of drunkenness originating in beerhouses and in public-houses, 49-54.

Strict enforcement generally of the regulations as to closing on Sunday, there being however some evasion of the law, 55-57. 69, 120-122. 136—Total of eight hours for which public-houses are open on Sunday as compared with an average of twenty-one hours on other days, 61-65. 247-250—Occurrence of the greater number of drunken cases in the after part of the day, 66-68.

Less necessity for the public-houses being open after ten o'clock in the evening, now that there are such facilities for travellers to obtain refreshments at railway stations, 70-73—Consideration of the state of the law as regards the hours of sale at railway refreshment rooms; witness was not aware that there exists a similar restriction as in 402—I.

the case of public-houses, 74-86. 214—Evidence relative to various Acts fixing the hours of opening in London and in the country, the present hours in London being from one to three in the afternoon and from five to eleven in the evening, 87-107.

Objection generally to increased restriction on Sunday as tending to the inconvenience of the lower classes, and as leading to discontent and evasion, 108. 217-229 et seq.—Repeal of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act of 1854, because of the numerous complaints made, 109-111. 180-187. 259, 260—Conclusions as to the greater disadvantage than advantage by closing at ten instead of eleven, as regards the public generally, 112-134—Probability of closing at ten reducing the number of drunken cases, 119. 129, 130—Apprehension of serious discontent by increased restriction, 120-123—Various and objectionable modes of evasion likely to result from more restrictive regulations, 120-122. 125-134.

Similar action of the police for various years in which there has been a great difference in the number of drunken cases, 135-137—Belief that a majority of the working classes of London are unfavourable to restrictions as to opening on Sunday, 138, 139; 198-201 Consideration of the changes at various periods since 1831 in the hours of opening on Sunday in connection with the number of drunken cases at such periods; conclusion that the increase of restriction has doubtless led to decrease of drunkenness, 140-159. 165-172. 188-189. 202-218.

Approval of restriction up to the limit beyond which much inconvenience and evasion would arise from any increase of restriction, 159. 175—Great bane of drunkenness not only to the men but to their wives and children, whilst it is a fruitful source of crime, 160-161. 173—Very beneficial effect of the earlier closing on Saturday night than on other nights, 174-188—Belief as to the riots in Hyde Park in 1854-55 having been connected with the working of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act, 180-187. 243-246.

Part taken by witness in urging the earlier closing on week days, as carried out by the Act of 1864; 188. 305-308—Very large amount of drunkenness arising after payment of wages on Saturday evening, 190-193—Total of 6,479 public-houses in the metropolitan district in 1866; 194—The total number of beerhouses in 1866 was 4,207, ib.—Impression that the public-houses and beerhouses have not increased in proportion to the population, 197.

Much less evil involved in the evasions of the law than if there were no restriction, in the increased drunkenness that would result, 202, 203—Comparatively large number of persons to whom, as well as to regular excursionists, the closing of public-houses from ten to eleven on Sunday night would be an inconvenience and a hardship, 204-210—Effect of distress in diminishing drunkenness, 211-213—Mitigation of the inconvenience of closing at ten on Sunday if the railway refreshment rooms were not restricted at that hour, 214-216.

Examination showing that restrictions were applied in the metropolis on Sunday for some years before they were extended to the country, 221-233—Probable accuracy of certain returns showing a large decrease of drunkenness as the direct result of the Act of 1854; 234-237—Doubt as to any greater amount of illegal drinking under the Act of 1854 than under Mr. Berkeley's Act of 1855; 238-242.

Prevention doubtless of numerous cases of drunkenness by closing earlier on Sunday, the question being whether this would not be counterbalanced by the discontent and evasion, 247-262—Objection to the hours of closing in different towns being left to the local authorities, 263—Doubt as to the expediency of a system of six days' licenses, 264-266. 324-330—Opinion as to the unreasonable proof required by some magistrates from the police in regard to the sale of drink at prohibited hours; difficulty on this subject, 267-271—Interference with the other duties of the police in watching the public-houses, 272-276.

Evidence strongly opposed to the provision of the Bill that, except in the metropolis, all liquor sold on Sunday must not be drunk on the premises; great evasion there-by, 277-289—More general practice of excursions in London than in provincial towns, so that more facilities are desirable in the former case on the score of travellers, 290-296—Statement of the number of drunken cases in the metropolitan district in the two years before and the two years after Sir George Grey's Act of 1864; 297-301.

Opinion that increase of punishment would not deter from drunkenness, 303, 304—Principal object of witness in recommending the closing clause in the Act of 1864 to lessen the disorder arising from houses in the Haymarket, 305-308—Examination in disapproval of the proviso in the Bill under which travellers in the country might be precluded from obtaining refreshment on Sunday, unless for consumption off the premises, 309-320.

Concurrence generally in the opinion of Chief Justice Erle adverse to the principle of severe restrictions upon the sale of refreshments, 321-324—Great difficulty in proving evasion of the law in regard to drink sold and consumed on the premises on Sunday, 325—Opinion that it is not compulsory upon publicans as upon innkeepers to open their houses on Sunday for the accommodation of travellers if they so demand, 330-337.

MEALS (LOWER CLASSES):

1. Effect of the Bill as regards the Sunday meals of the People in their own Homes.

2. Effect as regards meals at Public-houses.

1. Effect of the Bill as regards the Sunday meals of the People in their own Homes:

Obstacle to the middle and lower classes obtaining beer in proper condition at their meals, if the proposed restrictions be carried out, Woolrych 752-755. Ellison 835, 836. 863-866. 875-877.

Doubt as to any extensive inconvenience if the houses were open for only an hour and a half twice in the day, through persons wanting beer for their meals, Greig 1138-1149—Very limited inconvenience as regards the meals of the working classes, lodgers, &c., if the hours of opening in the afternoon were limited from half-past twelve to half-past two, Bigge 2108-2153—Facility under the Bill for the public to obtain beer for their meals, McLaren 2803.

Approval of the Bill on the ground that the working classes would have sufficient facilities for procuring beer, either in draught or in bottle for consumption with their meals at home, Jackson 3338-3341. 3347-3351. 3362-3378—Concurrence in opinion as to the sufficiency of the hours named in the Bill for the sale of beer to be consumed at home by the working classes with their meals, Eldridge 3898-3913. Freshwater 4904. 4953, 4954. 4967. Cockburn 6028, 6029. 6050.

Probability of but little interference as regards the supply of beer for the meals of the lower classes by the proposed restrictions, Winterbotham 6695-6700.

2. Effect as regards meals at Public-houses:

Extreme difficulty in enforcing the provision as to beer being allowed to be consumed on the premises when a bonâ fide meal is taken on Sunday, Sir R. Mayne 288, 289—Small number of people at Liverpool who take their meals at public-houses on Sunday, Greig 989, 990. 1032-1034—Very few persons who take their meals at public-houses at Sheffield, Jackson 1510, 1511.

Approval of the proviso in the Bill giving persons in London power to consume a meal as well as drink on the premises, Garrett 2355-2358—Very few if any people who take their meals at public-houses in Lambeth, Hall 2633, 2634—Few persons in London who take their meals at public-houses on Sunday, Potter 5179.

Prospect of frequent legal proceedings under the Bill, unless there be a clear definition of what constitutes a bonâ fide meal, Winterbotham 6636—Difficulty and litigation as to the term bonâ fide meal, Candelet 8512-8514. 8655-8662.

Conclusion as to the very little difficulty likely to arise upon the question as to what constitutes a bonâ fide meal, Johnes 8771.

Apprehended difficulty under the Bill upon the question as to what constitutes a bonâ fide meal, Rep. iv. See also Lodgers.

Metropolis. Total of 6,479 public-houses and 4,207 beer-houses in the metropolitan district in 1866, Sir R. Mayne 194—Impression that the public-houses and beer-houses have not increased in proportion to the population, ib. 197—Examination showing that restrictions were applied in the metropolis on Sunday for some years before they were extended to the country, ib. 221-223—More general practice of excursions in London than in provincial towns, so that more facilities are desirable in the former case on the score of travellers, ib. 290-296.

Especial difficulty in applying restrictions in London as compared with smaller places: the present Bill, however, may well be tried in London, Archbishop Manning 2389, 2390. 2396. 2410. 2448-2453—Explanation that whilst witness approves generally of the adoption in England of the Bill before the Committee, he doubts whether its immediate application to London might not create dissatisfaction, McLaren 2792. 2803-2805. 2835-2837. 2860, 2861.

Statistics of drunkenness in the metropolitan police district in the years 1831-1840, and in the years 1858-67, App. 413—Returns for the years 1866 and 1867 distinguishing the amount of drunkenness on week days and on Sunday, ib. 414—Return of the number of public-houses and beer-shops, in the metropolitan police district, and the number reported as being disorderly, ib.

Return of the number of summonses taken out by the metropolitan police in 1867 against the keepers of public-houses and beer-houses, with the results, App. 419—Return of the number of offences between certain hours on Sunday, Monday, and Wednesday nights, for which the police proceeded against keepers of the houses, ib.

Metropolis—continued.

420—Return of the number of charges of drunkenness received at the several metropolitan police-stations on Sundays during 1867: total of 704 charges, App. 421.

Classes.

Middle Classes. Inconvenience to the middle classes, and to large numbers of people who do not drink to excess, if they were unable to procure beer for their Sunday meals, save as allowed under the Bill, Woolrych 752-755. Ellison 833-844. 863-866. 875-877.

Grounds for concluding that whilst the majority of working men are in favour of the total closing of public houses on Sunday, the opponents belong largely to the middle and upper classes, Murphy 5647.

Mining Population. Statistics showing the much larger proportion of men off work in mines in Yorkshire on the first three days of the week than on the other three days, owing to the effect of Sunday drinking, Cockburn 5932-5936. 6059-6061. —Good wages of the miners in Yorkshire, &c., their condition being very comfortable save in the case of those who indulge in drink and neglect their work, ib. 5937-5939. 5954-5962.

Decided improvement of late years in the habits of the Yorkshire miners, this being due in part to the increased restriction on Sunday drinking; belief that the restriction may be carried further, as proposed by the Bill, with increased benefit, Cockburn, 5941-5946. 5955 et seq. —Satisfactory attendance of the miners at places of religious worship, whilst they have otherwise strict views as to Sabbath observance, ib. 5949. 5973-5978. 5990-5992. 6063-6071 —Serious interference of Sunday drinking with work on Monday and in the earlier part of the week, ib. 5950-5954. 5969-5971 —Few excursions in witness's district, the locality itself being very attractive, ib. 5972. 6025.

Expediency of legislative restriction as regards the minority in the district, who cannot resist the temptation of public-houses on Sunday, Cockburn 6026, 6027. 6030-6035. 6038-6042. 6065-6078.

See also Accidents.

Monday Drinking. Statement as to Sunday drinking being a prolific source of Monday tippling, Leicester 5706. 5739. 5811.

Moral Influence. Feeling of large numbers of the people that any further restriction should be result of moral influence rather than of Parliamentary enactment, Aitken 8212-8214.

Importance attached by the Committee to moral influences as a means, in lieu of legislative restrictions, towards the improvement of the people and the diminution of drunkenness, Rep. iv, v.

Morrell, Robert Matthew. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is by trade a goldsmith and jeweller; has had various opportunities of becoming acquainted with the working classes generally, and represents the opinions of a large number of that body on the present question, 6230-6238 —Statement showing that an immense majority of the men in Mr. Poole's tailoring establishment are opposed to the Sunday closing of public-houses, 6238-6241 —Decided objection, on several grounds, to any increased restriction on the sale of liquors on Sunday, 6242 et seq.

Difficulties and hardship in the case of London excursionists if the public-houses be closed as proposed by the Bill, 6245-6247. 6249, 6250 —Very inconvenient effect of the Bill in the case of the vast numbers of persons attending the Sunday bands in the parks, 6248, 6249. 6367-6369. 6380-6388 —Denial of certain statements as to excursionists frequently returning home in a drunken state, 6250. 6376-6379, 6416, 6417. 6459-6462 —Beneficial effect of the Sunday band in Battersea Park in attracting people away from Cremorne, and in inducing order, 6250, 6251. 6306-6309 —Prevalence of drunkenness chiefly among the very lowest class, it being unjust to punish the respectable working men for the sake of restricting the former, 6251, 6252.

Statement relative to the untrustworthy character of a canvass in St. Pancras some years ago, said to be favourable to Sunday closing, 6252-6259 —Partial and untrustworthy character of the statistics submitted to the Committee, representing a large majority of the public largely in favour of increased restriction, 6259 —Impartial inquiry necessary in order to ascertain the opinions for and against the Bill, 6259. 6397 —Confidence felt by the working classes that the House of Commons has too much sense to pass a measure so objectionable and unpopular, 6260. 6468 —Inaccuracy of a statement that the Hyde Park agitation against the Act of 1854 was set on foot by the publicans; strong popular feeling against the Act, 6260-6262 —Circumstance of a relative of witness (or of his wife) having signed five petitions in favour of restriction, 6262. 6370-6375.

Denial

Denial that there has been any advance of opinion among the working classes in favour of restrictive measures, though there has been a large advance in intellectual culture, 6263, 6264—Approval of the present hours of closing on Sunday, though some inconvenience arises through the houses not being open before one o'clock, 6265, 6266. 6273-6280—Approval also of the restriction in regard to the closing at one in the morning on week days, 6267-6272—Very little increase of convenience to the publican by limiting the hours of opening on Sunday to from one to three, and from eight to ten, 6281-6285.

Hardship of increased restrictions in the case of Sunday excursionists from London to the suburbs, further adverted to; difficulty also in the case of travellers, 6285-6290—Total of about a quarter of a million of excursionists from London every Sunday; grounds for this statement, 6285—Tendency of increased restriction to cause excessive drinking at home, 6291, 6292—Belief that further restriction would lead to evasion and would defeat the object in view, 6293, 6294.

Evidence strongly in favour of opening the Crystal Palace, British Museum, &c. on Sunday as a check to the influence of the public-houses, 6295-6297. 6303-6306. 6391. 6401-6404. 6494-6499—Comment on the wide-spread opposition on the part of the Lord's Day Society to the opening of places of recreation on Sunday, 6297-6302—Excellent effect in Paris of the system of recreation on Sunday, 6304-6306. 6310-6312. 6455-6458.

Objection to the proposal of Mr. Villiers' Committee of 1854 for Sunday closing except from six to nine in the evening, 6313-6317—Examination relative to the views of a body with which witness is connected, called the Recreative Religionists; details also relative to the course of action of this body on the question of Sunday recreation as distinct from religious worship in churches or chapels, 6318-6337. 6469-6493—Circumstance of the men at Mr. Poole's not having been canvassed on the subject of the present Bill, 6338-6343.

Statement with further reference to the canvass in St. Pancras, as having been made on the question of the Permissive Bill, and not of the present measure, 6344-6354. 6516-6518—Explanation of the sense in which witness has long advocated temperance; that is, as not applied to drink, 6389-6392—Grounds for disputing the statement that public opinion has shown itself favourable to increased restriction, by means of certain large meetings on the subject, 6393-6400. 6421-6429—Beneficial effect of the opening of Glasnevin Gardens, Dublin, on Sunday, 6403. 6494-6499.

Serious inconvenience to excursionists and others if the public-houses, closed at ten instead of eleven, 6406-6415—Exception taken to the evidence of Mr. Leicester as to the feeling of working men in favour of increased restriction, 6418-6421—Statement as to witness, who is now a news agent, keeping his shop open for part of the day on Sunday; consistency of this practice with his views as a recreative religionist, 6430-6442.

Admission that closing up to one o'clock on Sunday has aided in diminishing drunkenness, witness believing, however, that further restriction would not produce further diminution, 6443-6447—Doubt whether total closing on Sunday in Scotland has been the cause of diminished drinking, 6448-6454—Statement that the respectable working classes, who form the great majority, are above the temptation presented by gin palaces on Sunday evening, 6463-6465.

Impolicy of the proposed legislation as sure to cause strong popular resistance, 6466-6468—Immense number of persons travelling in and around the metropolis on Sunday; statistics hereon, 6499-6504—Explanation relative to certain meetings held by the National Sunday League, and the divided feeling evinced at such meetings on the question of opening the national institutions on Sunday, 6505-6515.

Murphy, The Rev. George Mollett. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is minister of the Borough-road Congregational Church, has for many years been conversant with the habits of the working classes, and has taken a deep interest in the temperance movement, 5403-5409—Great improvement produced in London by the closing of public-houses on Sunday morning by the Act of 1839; 5410, 5411. 5545—Very beneficial effect produced in Birmingham by the Act of 1854; 5412, 5413. 5545—Premature closing of the Select Committee on the Act of 1854, only one witness out of London having been examined, 5413, 5414—Comment upon the agitation in London against the Act of 1854, and upon the improper course pursued on the part of the licensed victuallers in fomenting the riots in Hyde Park, 5415, 5416.

Marked improvement consequent upon the restrictions imposed by Sir George Grey's Act of 1864; 5417. 5545-5547—Much more temperate habits of the better class of workmen, though there is a Sunday drinking class to which this improvement has not extended, 5418, 5419. 5568—Belief that every restriction upon the facilities for Sunday drinking is beneficial, and enables the working classes to devote a larger portion of their wages to the wants of their families, 5420, 5421. 5544, 5545. 5609-5613.

Explanation relative to a voluntary canvass of certain streets in the south of London, at the expense of working men, the result showing a majority of two to one in favour of entire closing on Sunday, 5422-5431.—Canvass also of certain large workshops, &c., there being a considerable majority of workmen in favour of entire closing, 5432-5435, 5506-5509.

Evidence as to the extremely disastrous effect of Sunday drinking in the districts south of the Thames as regards the wives and children of the drunkards, 5436-5443. 5493-5498.—Statement showing that there are 301 public-houses and beer-shops in a district not a mile square, and that they lead to an immense amount of drinking on Sunday evening, 5436-5439. 5476-5482. 5524-5537.—Particulars relative to several large public meetings, more especially those held at the Lambeth Baths, at which the working classes have declared almost unanimously in favour of entire closing on Sunday, or of further restriction, 5444-5452. 5595-5608.

Prejudicial effect of drunkenness upon the ratepayers as it largely increases pauperism; instances of this, 5452-5456.—Statistics relative to the immense amount of crime which originates in drinking, 5457-5462.—Peculiar frequency of accidents in factories on Monday on account of the effect of Sunday drinking, 5463.—Belief that the better class of working men are more especially favourable to restriction, and that the present Bill would not provoke any violent resistance, 5464, 5465. 5473-5475. 5631-5634.—Conclusion that the advantages of the Bill, socially and morally, would far outweigh any inconvenience to individuals, 5466, 5467.

Grounds for concluding that Sunday excursions out of London are now very limited, and that the Bill would not largely affect this class, 5468-5472.—Great advantage to publicans and their families and servants if they had a day of rest on Sunday, 5483-5492.—Comment on the practice of publicans in supplying drink to people who have already had too much, 5485.—Exceedingly baneful effect of the present system upon the children or rising generation of the working classes, 5493-5504.—Doubt as to any real necessity for the distinction in the Bill between London and the country, and for the facilities proposed in the case of lodgers, 5510-5517. 5571-5588.

Decided approval of prohibiting consumption on the premises rather than of merely limiting the hours of sale, 5518.—Inexpediency of staying the Bill, because of opposition on the part of habitual drinkers in public-houses on Sunday, 5519, 5520. 5569, 5570.—Important benefit of restriction in leading to improved homes, 5521, 5522.—Impression that not one publican in witness's district closes entirely on Sunday, 5523.—Very satisfactory working in Guernsey of the practice of total closing, 5547-5554. 5644-5646.—Statement relative to the adulteration of beer and spirits by publicans, 5555-5567.

Further statement that though the Bill may cause some inconvenience it will be for the general benefit of the community, and has the support of the people at large, 5569-5575. 5626-5630.—Approval not only of the present measure, but of total closing on Sundays and week days if the people were in favour of legislation to that effect, 5609-5618.

Satisfactory operation of restrictive laws in America; explanations hereon in connection with the present state of the law in Massachusetts, 5613. 5619-5627.—Doubt as to the adequacy of public opinion as a means of requiring publicans to close on Sunday, 5634-5643.—Reference to a canvass of householders in the neighbourhood of Peckham, the result being a very large majority in favour of total closing, 5647.

[Second Examination.]—Evidence in further explanation of the course pursued in the matter of the house to house canvass; on this point witness proffers the signatures of the householders for the examination of the Committee, as the best answer to the statement of Mr. Winterbotham, 6901. 6904-6906. 6912-6922.—Further details relative to the canvass by Mr. Jabez West of the men employed in certain large establishments, the papers being ready for production, and demonstrating the inaccuracy of Mr. Winterbotham's statement that in numerous instances there was no canvass at all, 6901-6904.—Objectionable manner in which a canvass on behalf of the Licensed Victuallers' Protection Society has been carried out, 6906-6912.

Museums. Advantage if museums were open on week-day evenings, but not on Sunday, Potter 5180-5184.

 —Practice in Bolton of having music in some public-houses on Sunday, Barlow 4075, 4076—Evil effect of the system of psalm singing in public-houses at Sheffield on Sunday evening, Flather 4630-4636.

Particulars relative to the operation of public-houses at Bolton where music is performed on Sunday evening; opinion that evil does not result from this system, Staton 7111-7127. 7181-7183. 7252-7256. 7262-7267. 7307, 7308. 7317-7321.

N.

National Institutions. Evidence strongly in favour of opening the British Museum and other national institutions on Sunday, Morrell 6295-6297. 6303-6306. 6391. 6401-6404. 6494-6499—Inaccuracy of the view that the opening of the British Museum, &c., on Sunday would necessitate the employment of an increased number of police on that day, ib. 6303-6307—Explanation relative to certain meetings held by the National Sunday League, and the divided feeling evinced at such meetings on the question of opening the national institutions on Sunday, ib. 6505-6515.

See also Recreation on Sunday.

Neston (Cheshire). Statement showing the desire of the publicans and beershop keepers in the parish of Neston for further restriction; failure, however, after a time, of a voluntary agreement on their part to carry out the provisions contained in the present Bill, Bushell 4661. 4668. 4677. 4679. 4756-4760—Excessive amount of drinking in witness's district on Sunday and on Saturday night, ib. 4665-4667—Decided decrease of drunkenness in the district around Neston, ib. 4773-4775.

New Cut (Lambeth). Doubt as to the frequent occurrence of disorder in the New Cut on Sunday morning and evening, Burcham 531-545—Demoralising effect of the collection of young people at public-houses in the New Cut, Garrett 2230-2233. 2266-2270.

New York. Beneficial results in New York of the system of separating the sale of intoxicating drinks from dancing and singing rooms, Hall 2639-2644.

Newall, Robert Stirling. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is mayor of Gateshead, 5202—Statement of the population of the town, and the amount of drunkenness; belief that a great many cases arise from Sunday drinking, 5203-5206. 5257-5265. 5298-5304—Feeling of the magistrates and of the better class of workmen in favour of further restrictions on the sale of drink on Sunday; acceptance of the present Bill by the town without resistance or disturbance, 5207-5209. 5214-5216. 5224-5227—Beneficial effect of the existing restrictions on Sunday drinking in Gateshead, witness anticipating further benefits from the Bill and preferring it for the present to total closing, 5210-5221. 5228 et seq.

Hardship in several other trades being prohibited on Sunday while trade in liquor is allowed, 5222, 5223. 5234-5242—Very little inconvenience by prohibiting consumption on the premises on Sunday as compared with the good to be effected, 5229-5233. 5242-5247. 5292-5295—Belief that the Bill would decidedly reduce Sunday drunkenness in Gateshead, even though some men might drink more at home, or might endeavour to evade the law, 5245-5252. 5266-5270. 5282-5297.

Strict check upon Sunday trading in the town, 5253-5256—Approval of pleasure grounds and museums being open to the people on Sunday, though it would still be desirable to impose further restrictions on the public-houses, 5271-5281—Feeling of several publicans in the town in favour of total closing, 5298, 5299.

Newcastle-under-Lyme. Witness submits to the Committee the result of a canvass of the householders of Newcastle and of the workshops, showing an immense majority in favour of the total closing of public-houses on Sunday, De Vine 5014-5027—A large minority of the publicans also declared in favour of total closing, ib. 5026—There was no canvass of the lodgers, ib. 5028, 5029.

North of England. Deplorable amount of drinking among the working classes in the North of England, McCree 6142, 6143.—See also Mining Population.

Oldham. Diminution of drunkenness in Oldham by the restrictions under the Act of 1854, Jackson 1468-1473. 1520-1522. 1536, 1537.

Opponents of Bill. Expectation that the opponents of the Bill would ultimately admit it was beneficial to them, Potter 5121. 5166. 5176.

P.

Page, The Rev. Cyril. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Incumbent of Christ Church, Westminster, 2645–2647—Doubts very much whether the Bill before the Committee would operate beneficially in his district, as it would probably lead to much evasion and to secret or private drinking, 2648–2659—Considers that a further slight restriction upon the hours of sale on Sunday is the preferable plan, 2658—Testifies to the beneficial effect of the former Act closing public-houses in the metropolis till one o'clock on Sunday, 2661–2663.

Palin, Capt. William Henry. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been chief constable of Manchester for the last eleven years, 1246, 1247—Statement of the number of drunken cases in Manchester on Sunday and on the rest of the week; smaller number on Sunday than on the average of other days, 1250–1255—Much greater number on Saturday than on any other day, 1256, 1257—Effect of the existing restrictions in Manchester on Sunday in keeping down drunkenness on that day, witness being unprepared, however, to say positively that further restrictions are advisable, 1258–1260. 1266. 1280–1282. 1293–1295. 1314. 1357–1364. 1424–1436.

Explanation of the mode in which the cases of drunkenness at Manchester are recorded, 1261, 1262—Considerable increase in the number of drunken cases taken up by the police, 1263, 1264. 1303, 1304. 1341–1347—Consideration of the extent to which increased restrictions on the sale of drink on Sunday would interfere with the habits and the legitimate wants of the people; opinion favourable on the whole to the public-houses being open for only three or four hours in the day, 1267 et seq.

Impression that the imposition of further restrictions would be favourably received by the great majority of the people of Manchester, 1272–1278. 1312–1322. 1351–1356—Much fewer public-houses and less drunkenness in Manchester than in Liverpool, whilst the beerhouses are far more numerous in Manchester, 1296–1302—Objection to total closing of public-houses on Sunday, 1308—Doubt whether a prohibition of consumption on the premises would lead to a decrease of drunkenness, 1310—Views of the publicans adverted to; proportion favourable to further restrictions, 1315. 1323–1327. 1380–1382—Favourable opinion of the women in regard to increase of restrictions, 1322.

Advantage if the public-houses closed an hour earlier on Sunday evening; little inconvenience thereby, 1328–1340—Opinion that further restriction would not cause much inconvenience to excursionists at Manchester, 1336–1340. 1384–1398. 1437–1443—With regard to the smaller number of cases on Sunday than on other days, the facilities for obtaining drink are much less on Sunday than on week days, 1365–1375—Beneficial operation of Sir George Grey's Act in Manchester; prompt adoption of the Act by the Town Council, 1376–1379—Probable effect of total closing in leading to evasion, and to drinking in private houses, though not to a very serious extent, 1399–1420.

Paris. Vicious effect of the system of recreation in Paris on Sunday, Leicester 5877—Excellent effect in Paris of the system of recreation on Sunday, Morrell 6304–6306. 6310–6312. 6455–6458—Experience of witness in Paris; conclusion that the mode of keeping Sunday there is in some respects inferior and in some superior as compared with this country, Wilson 7875–7882. 7892, 7893. 7899–7908.

Parliamentary Discussion. Statement as to the expediency of frequent Parliamentary discussion of the subject under consideration, Garrett 2308–2323.

Patten, The Right Hon. Wilson (Act of 1854). See Act of 1854.

Pauperism. Origination of much poverty and crime through drunkenness, Elliott 5349–5351—Prejudicial effect of drunkenness upon the ratepayers, as it largely increases pauperism; instances of this, Murphy 5452–5456.

Payment of Wages. Very large amount of drunkenness arising after payment of wages on Saturday evening, Sir R. Mayne 190–193—Beneficial effect of the practice in Leeds of paying wages on Friday; approval of a compulsory enactment to this effect, Lupton 3179–3181—Improvement if wages were paid on some other day than Saturday, as tending to less expenditure in drink on Sunday, White 2921, 2922—Important improvement if wages in London were paid on Friday, Potter 5185–5188.

Peckham. Reference to a canvass of householders in the neighbourhood of Peckham, the result being a very large majority in favour of total closing of public-houses on Sunday, Murphy 5647.

Peel's Coffee House. Information relative to the character of the business at witness's establishment (Peel's Coffee House); less injury to be suffered by him through Sunday restrictions than by many other houses in the trade, Winterbotham 6668–6677. 6684, 6685. 6694, 6695. 6704, 6705.

Permissive Bill. Obstacles to the practical application of a Permissive Bill in different localities, Garrett 2273—Argument as to the moderate and temperate character of the proposal for the adoption of a Permissive Bill, Archbishop Manning 2389, 2390—Belief that a permissive measure would be adopted in all large towns in a few years, Lupton 3176—Explanation that some working men at Bradford approve of the Sunday Closing Bill, but object to the Permissive Bill, Jowett 3637–3645.

Defence of the movement for an entire prohibition of the sale of drink, as by means of a Permissive Bill; conclusion as to the decided public benefit thereby, and as to the better health of the people, Steinthal 3782–3794—Explanation that though witness advocates the passing of the present Bill, he prefers a Permissive Bill and total closing on Sunday, Barlow 4081–4087. 4161–4172. 4253–4258. 4277–4279—Explanation that witness is an advocate of the Permissive Bill, and that he approves only of the present measure as an instalment towards the entire closing of public-houses, Leicester 5845–5850.

Decided objection to a Permissive Bill as compared with the present measure, Howard 4863, 4864—Explanation that witness is opposed to the Permissive Bill, though he advocates legislation in accordance with the wishes of the majority of the people in his own locality, Cockburn 6077–6085.

Petitions. Numerous petitions in favour of entire closing, or of the present Bill, Garrett 2208–2211—Numerous mayors and magistrates who have signed a petition in support of the Bill, ib. 2213–2215—Interested motives of publicans in getting up petitions against the Bill, whereas there are no such personal motives in connection with petitions in support of restriction, M'Laren 2830–2834—Comment upon the mode in which signatures were obtained to a large petition from Sheffield against the Bill, Flather 4572–4577.

Circumstance of a relative of witness (or of his wife) having signed five petitions in favour of restriction, Morrell 6362. 6370–6375—Explanatory statement relative to the course taken in obtaining petitions against the Bill; in three weeks nearly 500,000 signatures were procured, Winterbotham 6569–6572—Explanation and defence of the course pursued as regards the petitions against the Bill, and the mode of obtaining signatures, ib. 6637–6640. 6643, 6644.

Belief as to there having been much irregularity as regards the signatures to petitions in favour of the Bill; grounds for this statement, Winterbotham 6641, 6642. 6713–6717. 6774, 6775—Positive denial that beer was given in exchange for signatures to petitions against the Bill, ib. 6643, 6644—Statement as to the character of some of the persons employed in getting up the Sheffield petition against the Bill, Beal 7832–7840—Large petitions from Stockport and the neighbourhood against the Bill; doubt how the signatures were obtained, Rea 8383–8394.

Excess of petitions against the Bill at one period, as compared with the petitions in its favour, Candelet 8540—Exceptional course pursued in getting up agitations and petitions in support of the Bill; belief as to the expenditure of large sums in promoting petitions, ib. 8556–8566. 8616–8625. 8645—Examination showing that the combined petitions in favour of total closing on Sunday and of the present Bill exceed those against the Bill; explanation on this point, ib. 8675–8687. 8716–8726—Probability of the same persons having to a large extent signed the petitions in favour of the Bill and the petitions in favour of total closing, ib. 8721–8726.

Plymouth. Feeling of the great majority of the working classes of Plymouth and of the public generally in favour of further restriction, so that the present Bill would not be likely to provoke any local disturbance, Elliott 5314–5316. 5334–5337. 5360, 5361—Considerable improvement in the habits of the people, ib. 5327, 5328—Belief that the publicans are generally opposed to the Bill, though it would be a great comfort to them and their families to have a day's rest on Sunday, ib. 5348, 5349—Feeling of the clergy of Plymouth in favour of total or partial closing, ib. 5358–5360—Probable inconvenience to the large seafaring population of the port, if the Bill be adopted, ib. 5362–5375. 5394–5400.

Police. Unsatisfactory employment thrown upon the metropolitan police, in requiring strict compliance with the regulations as to Sunday closing, Sir R. Mayne 120—Similar action of the metropolitan police for various years, in which there has been a great difference in the number of drunken cases, ib. 135–137—Interference with the other duties of the police in watching the public-houses, ib. 272–276.

Expediency of improved police arrangements for preventing evasion, Archbishop Manning 2386. 2410, 2411—Advantage of the relief to be given to the police in Liverpool by total closing on Sunday, Gladstone 2979. 2985, 2986—Obstacle to police prevention of illicit drinking if the Bill be passed, Segrave 7404, 7405. 7529, 7530.

Police—continued.

Suggestion that supervision on Sunday should be carried out by a class of men superior to ordinary policemen; much abuse at present through the latter being open to bribes, Wadhams 7983. 8003-8006. 8009-8013. 8038-8040. 8072.

Objection to the functions of the police being too strictly exercised in watching the public-houses, and in apprehending drunken persons, Candelet 8599-8607—Dissent from a statement that the police largely connive at illicit drinking on Sunday, ib. 8713-8715.

Material increase of the duties of the police under the Bill, whilst such duties would be at once harassing to them, and annoying to the public, Rep. iv.

Poole, Mr. (Saville Row.) Statement showing that an immense majority of the men in Mr. Poole's tailoring establishment are opposed to the Sunday closing of public-houses, Morrell 6238-6241—Circumstance of the men at Mr. Poole's not having been canvassed on the subject of the present Bill, ib. 6338-6343.

Potter George. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is president of the London Working Men's Association; has been long and intimately connected with the working classes, and takes the deepest interest in their welfare 5030-5032. 5050—Is strongly in favour of temperance, and advocates the passing of the present Bill, 5033 et seq.—Considers that the more intelligent and respectable of the working classes would gladly accept the Bill, but that it would probably receive opposition from the lower class of workmen, such as unskilled labourers, &c. 5037. 5040, 5041. 5044. 5114. 5115.

Great improvement and great decrease of drinking among the better class of workmen in recent years, the improvement however not being so marked or so satisfactory in the case of unskilled labourers, 5038. 5042. 5044. 5061-5067—Belief that improvement and temperance will be greatly expedited among the labouring classes by increased restrictions on Sunday drinking, 5039. 5044-5048. 5050. 5061-5070. 5101—Suggestion that much opposition to the Bill may be disarmed by extending the time of opening on Sunday evening till eleven o'clock for the convenience of excursionists, 5048, 5049. 5051, 5052. 5071.

Decided advantage if returning excursionists went to their houses for refreshments instead of to the public-house, 5052-5054—Exhausting effect of Sunday excursions out of London, it being, in witness's opinion far better for the working classes to spend their Sunday more as a day of rest, 5054, 5055. 5072-5087—Conclusion as to the injurious effect of the public-houses on Sunday upon the morals of young men, 5056-5060—Great advantage, without any real inconvenience, by prohibiting consumption on the premises, 5068-5070.

Expediency of national holidays for the working classes on week-days, so that they may take excursions without using Sunday for the purpose, 5081-5087. 5144-5148. 5180-5184—Grounds for dissenting from the view that the present Bill would necessarily cause great inconvenience to lodgers and others, 5088-5099. 5109-5113—Facilities for keeping beer in the house in bottle for Sunday use, 5097-5099—Conclusion that individual inconvenience should give way to the great public good to be effected by the Bill, 5100-5102. 5121-5128.

Explanation that witness looks forward to total closing on Sunday, but is not in favour of a Maine liquor law, 5103-5108—Very many publicans in favour of Sunday closing, 5118—Expediency of compulsory regulations, though there are thousands of the working classes who voluntarily keep out of public-houses on Sunday, 5119-5128—Expectation that the opponents of the Bill would ultimately admit it was beneficial to them, 5121. 5166. 5176—Importance of the Bill as providing a day of rest for the publicans and their servants; doubt, moreover, whether they would be losers pecuniarily, 5131-5136.

Statement that witness would rather wait for further restrictions for a year or two, and for a new Parliament, if he had any fear that the Bill would cause any popular movement, 5138-5140—Belief that no such opposition would now be experienced as at the time of the Bill of 1854, the popular feeling at that time having had reference, moreover, to Lord Ebury's Bill rather than Mr. Wilson Patten's measure, 5138, 5139. 5190-5196—Improvement by limiting the hours of sale as named in the Bill, even if consumption on the premises be not prohibited, 5141-5143.

Admission that a large portion of the working classes are not intelligent; question as to restrictions being desirable for this class chiefly, 5149-5160—Grounds for approving of the distinction in the Bill between London and the country, 5161-5164—Defence of the proposition that the Bill should be put in force for the benefit of the community, even though objected to by a large minority of the people, 5165-5176—Probability of some of the opposition to the Bill being encouraged by the publicans, 5167.

Few persons in London who take their meals at public-houses on Sunday, 5179—Advantage if museums were open on week-day evenings, but not on Sunday, 5180-5184—Important improvement if wages in London were paid on Friday, 5185-5188—Improvement

—Improvement, also, if there were a half-holiday on Saturday 5189—Further statement that a reduction of the hours of sale on Sunday would be a great benefit, though not so satisfactory, unless connected with a prohibition of consumption on the premises, 5197-5201.

Private Drinking. Tendency of the Bill to, lead to a large amount of private drinking in the houses of the people, Sir R. Mayne 282-284; Morrell 6291, 6292; Staton 7099-7102. 7175—Check upon excessive drinking on the premises, whilst there is no check upon excess at home, Sir T. Henry 452; Wooltrych 665-667. 683, 684. 723-726—Prejudicial effect of the Bill if it led to increased drinking in private houses, not under control, Burcham 615-618—Probability of persons laying in drink at home before the hours of closing, if there are increased restrictions on the sale of liquor on Sunday, Ellison 830, 831.

Belief that secret drinking would not result from prohibiting consumption on the premises, Greig 1002; Johnes 8746—Limited abuse likely to arise from working men taking drink home for consumption on Sunday, Archbishop Manning 2387, 2388. 2393—Limited evil from private drinking at home as compared with the evil of public-house drinking, Lupton 3188-3193—Very little drinking or setting at home if the public-houses were closed, Jackson 3241. 3252, 3253.

Probability of an increased amount of home drinking and drunkenness, though to a very limited extent as compared with public-house drunkenness, Steinthal 3769-3781 Probable increase of private drinking at home if the Bill be passed, Bushell 4680. 4769—Improbability of any systematic excess of drinking by working men in their own homes, Howard 4818. 4854-4862; Freshwater 4925-4927.

Belief that the men in witness's trade would not drink much at home on Sunday if the Bill be passed, Leicester 5851-5858—Grounds for concluding that the Bill would not give rise to an increase of home drinking on Sunday in witness's district, Cochrane 6003-6017. 6036, 6037. 6043-6048.

Apprehension that the Bill would lead to much secret drinking, which would be a great bane, Winterbotham 6567, 6568—Belief that the Bill would cause at Wolverhampton a large amount of illicit drinking in the homes of the people; examination as to the grounds for this conclusion, Segrave 7341-7349. 7360-7363. 7403. 7496-7501. 7536-7542.

Prostitution. Beneficial effects of drunkenness as a source of prostitution; illustration of this, White 2900-2902. 2949, 2950.

Provinces. Statement in approval of extending to the country the clause in the Bill relative to lodgers and others in the metropolis having facilities for obtaining meals or refreshments on Sunday, Archbishop Manning 2472-2476. 2486-2489; McCree 6191, 6192—Witness would have no hesitation in applying the Bill to Liverpool, Manchester, and other large towns, though he has some hesitation as regards London, M'Laren 2835-2837—Grounds for approving of the distinction in the Bill between London and the country, Potter 5161-5164.

Doubt as to any real necessity for the distinction in the Bill between London and the country, and for the facilities proposed in the case of lodgers, Murphy 5510-5517. 5571-5588—Objection to the distinction made by the Bill between the metropolis and the provinces, Aiken 8176—Limit of sale by the Bill to three and a half hours in the provinces, as compared with four hours in London, Candelet 8497.

PUBLIC OPINION:

1. Evidence adverse to increased Reduction upon the Sale of Liquor on Sunday as opposed to Public Opinion on the Subject.
2. Testimony in support of the Conclusion that increased Restriction would be satisfactory to the Great Mass of the People.
3. Views of the Committee as to the Absence of any General Demand for increased Restriction.

1. Evidence adverse to increased Restriction upon the Sale of Liquor on Sunday as opposed to Public Opinion on the Subject:

Apprehension of serious discontent by increased restriction, Sir R. Mayne 120-123—Inexpediency of passing the present Bill; great inconvenience and discontent to be caused caused thereby, Sir F. Henry 355, et seq.—Concurrence in the view that if the community generally were in favour of further restriction on Sunday, the present Bill might be desirable; belief, however, that the great mass of the people would be much inconvenienced, ib. 403-406—Belief that the great majority of the people in London and other large towns are opposed to further restriction upon the sale of liquor on Sunday, ib. 416-423.

Expectation that increased restrictions would be very unpopular and would encounter much opposition, though probably some of the working-classes would be in favour of the Bill, Woolrych 652-658. 678. 701-703. 707, 708. 777—Opinion that the Bill is not practicable, as the country would not submit to it, Jackson, 1566. 1569.

Partial and untrustworthy character of the statistics submitted to the Committee, representing a large majority of the public largely in favour of increased restriction, Morrell 6259—Impartial inquiry necessary in order to ascertain the opinion for and against the Bill, ib. 6259. 6397—Grounds for disputing the statement that public opinion has shown itself favourable to increased restriction by means of certain large meetings on the subject, ib. 6393-6400. 6421-6429—Impolicy of the proposed legislation as sure to cause strong popular resistance, ib. 6466-6468.

Inquiry instituted by witness in order to test the accuracy of the Rev. Mr. Murphy's evidence as to the results of a house-to-house canvass in, and adjoining the New Cut, Lambeth, upon the question of total closing on Sunday; entire inaccuracy of the figures submitted by Mr. Murphy, Winterbotham, 6573-6576—Belief that public dissatisfaction would be sure to follow increased restrictions at the present time, ib. 6620, 6621—With regard to the influential support given to the Bill by publicans, magistrates, &c., in numerous towns, this does not affect witness's objection to it, ib. 6747, 6748.

Witness has been engaged by the Licensed Victuallers' Protection Society in carrying out a house-to-house canvass in the New Cut district on the subject of Sunday closing of public-houses; his qualifications for the duty, Rowland 6962-6966. 6977-6979. 7002-7004—Explanation relative to an inaccuracy in recording the result of the canvass, as referred to by the Rev. Mr. Murphy; subsequent correction of the error as soon as discovered; ib. 6966-6972—Careful canvass by witness and two assistants of certain streets previously canvassed on the part of advocates of the Bill; very different results shown as compared with the result submitted in the evidence of Mr. Murphy, ib. 6973-6976.

Exception taken generally to the system of household canvass undertaken by supporters of the Bill, Candelet 8540, 8541—Approval of past restrictions whereas further restrictions would clash with public opinion, ib. 8614, 8615.

2. Testimony in support of the Conclusion that increased Restriction would be satisfactory to the Great Mass of the Public:

Details relative to the strong and wide-spread public feeling in favour of further restrictions on the sale of drink on Sunday, Garrett 2192 et seq.—Very large and influential public meetings in London and in Manchester in favour either of entirely closing public-houses on Sunday or of a Permissive Bill, ib. 2193-2211—Denial that any popular disturbance need be apprehended if the Bill be passed, ib. 2228, 2229—Disapproval of total closing on Sunday in the present state of public opinion on the subject; conclusion as to the Bill before the Committee having the support of public opinion, ib. 2308-2334. 2353, 2354.

Great advance of public opinion on the question since the Act of 1854, Archbishop Manning, 2391, 2392; Potter 5138, 5139—Witness has never heard any complaint of existing restrictions on the Sunday opening of public-houses, Hall 2542-2544—Reliance placed on a house-to-house visitation as a means of arriving at public opinion upon the question of Sunday closing, McLaren 2848.

Particulars relative to a house-to-house canvass as made in various large towns, at the instance of the Central Sunday Closing Association, the result being that a very large majority of the people have declared in favour of total closing; examination hereon as to the practice in carrying out this canvass, Steinthal 3730-3744. 3751-3753. 3763, 3764. 3795, 3796. 3799. 3807-3818—The result of the canvass hitherto shows that 88,876 persons have declared in favour of total closing, 13,809 against, and 11,127 neutral, ib. 3731—Belief that the people generally would regard the Bill as a blessing, though habitual drinkers would doubtless be opposed to it, Bushell 4663. 4727-4732. 4756-4762.

Explanation relative to a voluntary canvass of certain streets in the south of London, at the expense of working men, the result showing a majority of two to one in favour of entire closing on Sunday, Murphy 5422-5431—Statement that though the Bill may cause some inconvenience it will be for the general benefit of the community, and has the support of the people at large, ib. 5569-5595. 5626-5630.

Peculiar absence of opposition to the present Bill, notwithstanding the agitation of the publicans, publicans, Leicester 5675-5678—Expediency of legislative restriction on the ground that it would be a reflex of public opinion, and is called for by the great majority of the people, ib. 5741. 5794-5802. 5847. 5859. 5866. 5871. 5878.

Evidence in further explanation of the course pursued in the matter of the house to house canvass; on this point witness proffers the signatures of the householders for the examination of the Committee, as the best answer to the statement of Mr. Winterbotham, Murphy 6901. 6904-6906. 6912-6922—Objectionable manner in which a canvass on behalf of the Licensed Victuallers Protection Society has been carried out, ib. 6906-6912.

Uselessness of attempting to enact prohibitory measures unless demanded by public opinion; expediency, however, of the present Bill as an instalment, Johnes 8745. 8748. 8749. 8767-8769. 8772, 8773—Opinion as to its being the duty of the Legislature to give force to the wishes of the people in the matter, ib. 8758. 8773—Conclusion that the Bill may be carried out without any serious difficulty, ib. 8767-8769.

Return, submitted by Mr. Steinthal, showing the number of persons in various towns throughout the kingdom, in favour, against, and neutral, as regards the stopping of the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sundays; very large majority in favour of total closing, App. 423, 424.

3. Views of the Committee as to the Absence of any general Demand for increased Restriction:

Conclusion of the Committee that in certain parts of the country a considerable feeling exists in favour of further restriction upon the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday, Rep. iii—Exceptions taken to the canvasses made in various large towns, as not adequately representing the opinions of the community, ib.

Absence of any proof of such a general demand for increased restrictions as should induce Parliament to disregard other considerations which lead to a different conclusion, Rep. iii—Serious inconvenience and great discontent to be caused by the proposed restrictions, ib.

7. Hardship upon Publicans through the constant Attempts at Legislative Interference.

1. Generally as to the Opposition of the Licensed Victuallers to further Restriction upon the Sale of Liquors on Sunday:

Facility and probability of agitation and opposition on the part of the publicans in the event of the Bill being passed, Hall 2510. 2516. 2564, 2565—Influence of the Licensed Victuallers Association adverted to as preventing many publicans from openly supporting restrictions, Lupton 3136-3140—Regard had by the publicans to their own interests, and not to the interests of the public in opening on Sunday, Mackie 4404-4406—Probability of some of the opposition to the Bill being encouraged by the publicans, Potter 5167—Comment upon the opposition raised or sought to be raised by the publicans, Leicester 5675-5678. 5815-5820. 5832.

Unanimous objection to the Bill by a delegate meeting of licensed victuallers held at Manchester on 5th February 1868; several resolutions adopted by the meeting showing the various grounds of objection, Candelet 8498. 8499. 8510, 8511—Statement that the licensed victuallers, though possibly actuated primarily by self-interest in their opposition to the Bill, are also influenced in the matter by the convenience of the public, ib. 8634-8638. 8685-8687. 8729-8733.

2. Extent of Feeling among Publicans in favour of increased Restrictions:

Evidence relative to the views and the practice of the publicans of Liverpool upon the question of curtailing the hours of sale on Sunday; probable satisfaction if there were one restrictive rule applicable to all, Greig 926, 962-972. 1035-1038. 1087. 1154-1162. 1224-1233. 1242-1245—Approval of entire closing by a large number of publicans at Liverpool, over and above those who have actually closed, ib. 970-972—Feeling among the publicans of Manchester on the question of increased restriction; proportion favourable to further restriction, Palin 1315. 1323-1327. 1380-1382—Objection by the publicans at Sheffield to total closing; out of 548 houses, fourteen are closed voluntarily, Jackson 1525-1530. 1542, 1543.

Feeling of many, if not all, publicans at Birmingham in favour of total closing, provided it were carried out by the whole trade, Glossop 1701, 1702. 1756-1758—Canvass of the publicans of Liverpool in 1860 upon the question of Sunday closing; large majority in favour thereof, White 2877-2879. 2884-2887—Desire of numerous publicans at Leeds for total closing on Sunday but for the abstraction of their week-day custom by those remaining open, Lupton 3049. 3177, 3178—Desire of very many publicans at Leeds for compulsory law on the subject of Sunday closing, Jackson 3258. 3260, 3261. 3302-3304—Willingness of some of the publicans at Southampton to close on Sunday, Eldridge 3860.

Willingness of many publicans at Manchester to close on Sunday but for the competition of those declining to do so, Mackie 4340—Impression that many of the licensed victuallers at Sheffield are favourable to further restrictions, Flather 4607-4611—Feeling of many publicans at Bedford in favour of Sunday closing, Freshwater 5004-5006—Large minority of the publicans of Newcastle-under-Lyme in favour of Sunday closing, De Vine 5026.

Very many publicans in favour of Sunday closing, Potter, 5118—Feeling of several publicans at Gateshead in favour of total closing on Sunday, Newall 5298, 5299—Belief that the publicans at Plymouth are generally opposed to the Bill, though it would be a great comfort to them and their families to have a day's rest on Sunday, Elliott 5342-5349.

Comparatively few publicans who have petitioned in favour of the Bill, Winterbotham 6709-6712—Strong objection by publicans at Bolton to the Bill, Staton 7151-7154. 7159-7162—Approval of Sunday closing by a large number of publicans at Liverpool, Wybergh 7586—Absence of any general feeling among licensed victuallers in favour of Sunday closing being made compulsory, Candelet 8521.

3. Question of Voluntary Closing on Sunday; Extent to which carried out:

Large number of public-houses voluntarily closed at Liverpool, Greig 926. 962. 972.—Total closing on Sunday by twenty-seven publicans and forty-six beerhouse keepers at Birmingham, Glossop 1700—Unwillingness of publicans to close on Sunday through fear of the competition of those who remain open, Archbishop Manning 2462-2465. 2495—Very prosperous business of some of the largest publicans at Leeds who have closed voluntarily for many years, Lupton 3047, 3048. 3149-3151.

Obstacle to a combined action of publicans in favour of total closing, so that the interference of the Legislature is essential, Walker 3521-3525—Details relative to a voluntary arrangement at Neston in Cheshire for carrying out the restrictions proposed by the Bill; failure of the arrangement after a time, Bushell 4661. 4668. 4677. 4679. 4756-4760—Circumstance of witness, when a publican, having opened on Sunday because his neighbours did so, Freshwater 4985-4988.

Impression that not one publican in witness's district closes entirely on Sunday, Murphy 5523—Doubt as to the adequacy of public opinion as a means of requiring publicans to close on Sunday, ib. 5634-5643—Closing of twenty-five public-houses and beershops at Wolverhampton on Sunday out of 500, Segrave 7462-7467.

Impracticability of Sunday closing by means of voluntary and united action of the publicans, as advised by Mr. Bright, Wadhams 8073-8075. 8092, 8093—Inadequacy of the amicable arrangement suggested by Mr. Bright, as it would not be a permanent settlement of the question, ib. 8159-8162—Voluntary closing on Sunday by some few publicans at Manchester, Candelet 8509—Loss of week-day business in the case of those who close voluntarily on Sunday, ib. 8521, 8522.

4. Question as to the Check exercised by Publicans upon excessive Drinking:

Belief that the publicans generally obey the prohibition as to the hours for the sale of drink, and that they do not encourage drunkenness, Sir T. Henry 345-359. 452—Check by means of the publicans upon excessive drinking in public-houses, Burcham 610-614.

Very little restraint upon excessive drinking on the premises, Archbishop Manning 2393—Interest of the publicans in promoting the sale of drink on Sunday, and thereby encouraging drunkenness, Bushell 4763-4768—Belief that at Bedford the publicans do not encourage drunkenness, Freshwater 4887—Comment on the practice of publicans in supplying drink to people who have already had too much, Murphy 5485.

Denial

PUBLICANS (LICENSED VICTUALLERS)—continued.4. Question as to the Check exercised by Publicans upon excessive Drinking—cont^d.

Denial of the statement that publicans are promoters of drunkenness for their own interest, Winterbotham 6635. 6703.

Evil of social drinking in public-houses, the same being moreover often encouraged by the landlords, Johnes 8743. 8809-8812.

5. Respects in which Sunday Closing would be beneficial to Publicans :

Expediency of total closing on Sunday in order to give rest and liberty to the publicans themselves and to their families and servants, Gladstone 2979. 3012, 3013 —Boon to the publicans themselves by Sunday restrictions, Lupton 3046—Opinion that publicans generally would conduct their houses more prosperously if Sunday were a day of rest for them, ib. 3177.

Evidence as to the great injury to the health of publicans through not having a day of rest on Sunday; illustration on this point, Jackson 3257-3259. 3262. 3298-3301 —Benefit to the publicans themselves by Sunday closing, Walker 3402, 3403. 3405 —Advantage of Sunday closing as enabling publicans to have a better and superior class of servants and to do a more respectable business, Mackie 4317. 4407-4418.

Very injurious effect of the present system of sale on Sunday in regard to the publicans themselves, both in a religious and a moral sense, Bushell 4667, 4668. 4677. 4681. 4719-4726 —Complaints by publicans as to their not being able to attend a place of worship, ib. 4667. 4723-4726—Importance of the Bill as providing a day of rest for the publicans and their servants; doubt, moreover, whether they would be losers pecuniarily, Potter 5131-5136—Great advantage to publicans and their families and servants if they had a day of rest on Sunday, Murphy 5453-5492.

Very little increase of convenience to the publican by limiting the hours of opening on Sunday to from 1 to 3 and from 8 to 10, Morrell 6281-6285—Advantage if publicans would close voluntarily, for the sake of their families and servants, Wilson 7955-7958.

6. Loss of Trade, as a Result of the Proposed Bill :

Great importance of the Sunday to many houses in the outskirts of the metropolis, Winterbotham 6674, 6675. 6694, 6695—Utter ruin of many publicans if the Bill become law, ib. 6675-6677.

Estimated loss of 8,000*l.* a week by the Bill in the case of the 5,430 licensed victuallers composing the Provincial Defence League, Candelet 8520. 8608-8613. 8727, 8728.

7. Hardship upon Publicans through the constant Attempts at Legislative Interference :

Great dissatisfaction caused among licensed victuallers by the constant attempts at legislative interference with their trade, Winterbotham 6623-6629. Wadhams 8061.

Hardship and injustice to licensed victuallers and keepers of beershops by constant attempts to impose upon them restrictions which do not appear to be demanded by any urgent public necessity, Rep. iv.

R.

Ratepayers. Interest of the ratepayers in the diminution of Sunday drunkenness, Elliott 5349-5351. Murphy 5542.

Rea, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a currier at Stockport, 8283—The population of the town is about 60,000, there being 130 public-houses and 140 beershops, 8284-8286—Very little drunkenness in the town on Sunday, there having been a great improvement generally in the habits of the people, 8287. 8323-8331. 8373-8376—Statement relative to the great inconvenience to be caused by the Bill to sick and burial societies, 8288-8311. 8332-8344—Reference to a meeting in Stockport, presided over by the mayor, in favour of Sunday closing, 8312-8315. 8377-8382—Partial and dishonest character of a house-to-house canvass of the town; grounds for this statement, 8316-8322. 8345-8369.

Satisfactory working of the present restrictions in Stockport, any increase of restriction being productive of much hardship to the working classes, 8323-8327. 8370-8376—Large petitions from Stockport and the neighbourhood against the Bill; doubt how the signatures were obtained, 8383-8394—Comment upon the strong expression used by temperance advocates in their condemnation of public-houses, 8395-8401.

Recreation on Sunday. Approval of the opening of places of innocent recreation on Sunday, where no drinking is allowed, Sir T. Henry 471-475—Expediency of increased restriction on Sunday being combined with increased facilities for harmless recreation, Archbishop Manning 2408. 2428.

Consideration of the question of opening places of recreation on Sunday, in order to counteract the baneful operation of the public-houses; grounds for concluding that such opening would not be for the public good, Hall 2550, 2551. 2615-2632—Decided approval of the provision of means of innocent recreation for the lower classes on Sunday, Lupton 3196-3198—Grounds for objecting to museums and art galleries being open on Sunday, though there is not the same objection to the opening of unlicensed gardens and reading rooms, Jackson 3320-3337.

Examination favourable to the provision of various means of recreation for the people on Sunday, including music, the opening of art exhibitions, &c., Walker 3440-3448. 3502-3513—Conclusions as to the evil in London, as in Leeds, of facilities for drinking on Sunday in conjunction with excursions, or with open-air music, &c., ib. 3449-3457—Question considered as to the way in which those debarred from the public-houses on Sunday might more profitably spend their time; objection to open-air music being provided for them, Jowett 3617-3636—Approval of recreation in parks on Sunday, but not of open-air music at the same time, Barlow 4224-4240.

Approval of pleasure grounds and museums being open to the people on Sunday, though it would still be desirable to impose further restrictions on the public-houses, Newall 5271-5281—Evil in encouraging such places as Cremorne Gardens, Highbury Barn, &c., on Sunday, so long as public-houses are open at the same time, Leicester 5875, 5876—Question considered whether, instead of increased restrictions on Sunday drinking, means of recreation might not be tried, in order to counteract the influences of the public-houses; dissent from this proposition, Cockburn 5973-5981. 6018-6027. 6062-6070.

Evidence strongly in favour of opening the Crystal Palace, British Museum, &c., on Sunday, as a check to the influence of the public-houses, Morrell, 6295-6297. 6303-6306. 6391. 6401-6404. 6494-6499—Examination relative to the views of a body with which witness is connected, called the Recreative Religionists; details also relative to the course of action of this body on the question of Sunday recreation as distinct from religious worship in churches or chapels, ib. 6318-6337. 6490-6493—Explanation of the sense in which witness has long advocated temperance, that is, as not applied to drink, ib. 6389-6392—Statement as to witness, who is now a newsagent, keeping his shop open for part of the day on Sunday; consistency of this practice with his views as a recreative religionist, ib. 6430-6442.

Importance of excursions and of the opening of museums, &c., on Sunday, as a means of inducing temperate habits; illustration of this in Paris and Berlin, where there are no restrictions on the Sunday sale of liquor, Waygood 7033, 7034. 7040. 7050-7056—Valuable effect of innocent amusements as a check upon drunkenness, Wybergh 7682. Beal 7761, 7762.

See also Excursionists. Lord's Day Society. Paris. Sunday Bands.

Refreshment Rooms (Metropolis). Consideration of the state of the law as regards the hours of sale at refreshment rooms; witness was not aware that there exists a similar restriction as in the case of public-houses, Sir R. Mayne 74-86. 214—Mitigation of the inconvenience of closing at ten on Sunday if the railway refreshment rooms were not restricted at that hour, ib. 214-216.

Report of Police Superintendent Hannant, recommending that refreshment houses in the metropolis should be closed at the same time as licensed victuallers' houses, App. 419.

RESTRICTIONS UPON SALE:

1. Beneficial Effect of the Restrictions hitherto upon the Sale of Drink on Sunday.
2. Evidence opposed to the further Restrictions contained in the present Bill.
3. Inexpediency of restricting the Many for the Protection of the Few.
4. Evidence in Approval generally of increased Restrictions upon the Sunday Sale of Liquor.
5. Expediency of Legislation for the general good, though Productive of individual Hardship.
6. Decision of the Committee adverse to the proposed Restrictions.
1. Beneficial Effect of the Restrictions hitherto upon the Sale of Drink on Sunday:

Conclusion that the restrictions hitherto upon the Sunday sale of drink have been useful in diminishing drunkenness, Sir R. Mayne 9-14. 18-23. 38. 140-159. 165-172. 188, 189. 202. 218—Concurrence of evidence as to the effect of past restrictions in diminishing drunkenness, Avery 1858-1868. 1952; Bigge 1972-1980; Eldridge 3881 et seq.; Flather 4586.

Witness testifies to the beneficial effect of the former Act closing public-houses in the metropolis till one o'clock on Sunday, Page 2661-2663; Murphy 5410, 5411. 5545—

Beneficial

1. Beneficial Effect of the Restrictions, &c—continued.

Beneficial result of the closing till half-past twelve on Sunday in the country, Jackson 3239—Beneficial effect of past restrictions generally, Bushell 4669. 4783.

Approval of the present law, though witness doubts whether the closing up to one o'clock on Sunday has diminished drunkenness, Staton 7165-7170. 7231-7237. 7289, 7290—Beneficial effect of the closing of public-houses on Sunday forenoon, Wilson 7897-7869. 7894—Admission that the restrictions hitherto on the Sunday sale of liquors have produced much good, Wadhams 8048-8050.

2. Evidence opposed to the further Restrictions contained in the present Bill:

Witness has on several former occasions given evidence upon the question of restrictions on the sale of liquors, and in 1855 expressed himself favourable to the removal of some of the restrictions under the Act of 1854; adherence to his former views in disapproval of increased restrictions, Sir R. Mayne 1-6. 112 et seq.—Similar principle involved in the present Bill as in the Act of 1854, though the Bill goes further than the Act, ib. 7, 8—Objection generally to increased restriction on Sunday as tending to the inconvenience of the lower classes, and as leading to discontent and evasion, ib. 108 et seq. 217-220—Approval of restriction up to the limit beyond which much inconvenience and evasion would arise from any increase of restriction, ib. 159. 175—Prevention, doubtless, of numerous cases of drunkenness by closing earlier on Sunday, the question being whether this would not be counterbalanced by the discontent and evasion, ib. 247-262.

Disapproval of any increase of restriction upon the sale of drink on Sunday, as not being called for by the morals or the habits of the people, at least in Southwark, Burcham 495. 502 et seq.—Approval of restrictions upon the sale of liquor, if they are not carried too far, the opinion of witness being that the proper limit for such restrictions has already been reached, ib. 586-595.

Opinion that increased restrictions upon the hours of opening of public-houses on Sunday would diminish the cases of drunkenness, but would be attended with evils which would make such restrictions undesirable, Woolrych 639 et seq.—Great inconvenience to which large numbers of people would be put by the restrictions proposed in the present Bill, 640-646. 693-671. 750-755. 775, 776—Beneficial effect of restrictions, so far as they have gone, witness considering that to carry them further would do more harm than good, ib. 659-664. 704-707. 714. 730-734—Diminution of drunkenness on Sunday if the Bill be carried out, the inconvenience on the other hand being very great, ib. 762-766. 775, 776—Conclusion as to the present Bill being a very extensive change as compared with previous restrictions, ib. 800-808.

Approval of the restrictions hitherto applied to the sale of drink on Sunday, witness considering, however, that we have gone far enough, and that further restriction would cause great inconvenience and dissatisfaction, Ellison 839-854—Question considered, whether the inconvenience to be caused by the Bill would not outweigh the advantages; opinion that the Bill does, in fact, go too far, Glossop 1649 et seq.

Decided objection, on several grounds, to any increased restriction on the sale of liquors on Sunday, Morrell 6242 et seq.—Large class of persons employed in London on Sunday, to whom the proposed restrictions would be most inconvenient, Winterbotham 6545-6551—Opinion that there is no necessity whatever for any alteration of the law, ib. 6622—Immense amount of inconvenience to be caused by the present Bill, as compared with any benefit to be derived, 6666, 6667. 6686-6690. 6695-6707.

Belief that further restrictions would lead to much hostility; and to a great increase of illicit drinking; restriction, in fact, is no check upon drunkenness, Waygood 7035-7040. 7047-7049—Witness considers that the Bill before the Committee would cause great inconvenience without any corresponding benefit, Wybergh 7546-7549—Witness has no faith whatever in restrictive laws on the subject of the sale of liquors, and doubts very much whether existing restrictions have diminished drunkenness in Liverpool, ib. 7549 et seq. 7692.

Witness considers that legislative restriction on the Sunday sale of liquors has gone quite far enough, and that further restriction would cause great inconvenience, Beal 7717-7722. 7748, 7749. 7767. 7773-7777—Hardship of restrictions pressing too severely on the great body of working men who consume beer in moderation on Sunday, Wadhams 8052-8055—Expediency of the Committee not being guided by the views of partisans on either side of the question, ib. 8088-8091—Grounds for the conclusion that the Bill before the Committee would be a serious inconvenience to the working classes, and to the public at large, Aithen 8171-8176—Beneficial effect of restrictive legislation up to the present point, whilst further reduction would unduly encroach on the liberty of the subject, ib. 8186, 8187. 8200.

RESTRICTIONS UPON SALE—continued.3. Inexpediency of restricting the Many for the Protection of the Few :

Main ground of witness's objection to further restrictions, that the many would be inconvenienced for the sake of the few, Sir T. Henry 458-465—Prevalence of drunkenness, chiefly amongst the very lowest class, it being unjust to punish the respectable working men for the sake of restricting the former, Morrell 6251, 6252—Objection to interference with the reasonable wants of the great majority of the people, even though resulting in an abatement of drunkenness, Fisher 6857-6860.

Objection to restriction in order to remove temptation from drunkards, if at the same time the great mass of the people are to be put to serious inconvenience, Wybergh 7692-7695, 7700—Hardship in imposing further restriction upon the great mass of temperate men for the sake of a very small number of habitual drunkards, Beal 7748, 7749, 7781, 7782, 7790, 7791—Decided objection to further restriction upon the liberty of the many for the protection of the few, Wilson 7870-7872, 7883-7885, 7906 et seq.; Wadhams 8052-8055.

4. Evidence in Approval generally of increased Restrictions upon the Sunday Sale of Liquor :

Consideration of the extent to which increased restrictions on the sale of drink on Sunday would interfere with the habits of the legitimate wants of the people; opinion favourable, on the whole, to the public-houses being open for only three or four hours in the day, Palin 1267 et seq.—Approval of restriction being carried as far as possible, but not so far as to become intolerable, Greig 1024-1029, 1150-1153—Expediency of restrictions in the interest of those who cannot avoid the temptation when opportunity offers, Bigge 2005 et seq.

Great boon to be conferred by the present Bill, though it does not touch the mischief of Saturday evening, Archbishop Manning 2369-2371, 2410—Earnest hope of witness that the present Bill may become law, the benefits under it far outweighing the inconvenience, Hall 2535, 2536—Other considerations besides that of excessive drinking which render restrictions on the Sabbath peculiarly desirable, McLaren 2863, 2864.

Importance, in the first instance, of imposing restrictions on the sale of drink, it being the strong conviction of witness that the people will in such case spend their Sunday within the scope of beneficent influences, Lupton 3196-3199—Greater reason for closing on Sunday than on any other day in the week, Jackson 3315-3319, 3345, 3346—Decided approval of further restrictions on the sale of drink on Sunday, in the interest of working men and their families, Jowett 3532-3534.

Approval of the restrictive policy hitherto, as regards Sunday drinking and Sunday trading, and approval also of the further restrictions, under the present Bill, as tending to a further diminution of drunkenness, Eldridge 3849-3853, 3881 et seq.—Decided approval of the restrictions in the Bill before the Committee, Flather 4531, 4532; Howard 4790-4793—Justification of restrictive legislation in the interests of religion and morality, rather than of the present law antagonistic to such interests, Bushell 4735-4742, 4780-4783—Primary importance of removing the temptation to drink, ib. 4780—Witness is strongly in favour of temperance, and advocates the passing of the present Bill, Potter 5033.

5. Expediency of Legislation for the general good, though productive of individual Hardship :

With regard to exceptional cases of hardship or inconvenience, these should give way for the general good, Greig 946, 973, 1019-1023, 1064—Object of the present movement to impose restrictions believed to be beneficial to the whole country, Garrett 2352—Decided approval of the Bill before the Committee as conferring public benefits far outweighing any individual inconvenience that might arise, Lupton 3077, 3093, 3129-3135, 3166.

Argument that though a portion of the community may use public-houses in moderation on Sunday, their feelings on the subject should be sacrificed for the benefit of the community at large, Walker 3488-3501, 3514-3516; Potter 5165-5176; Elliott 5376-5388; Leicester 5833-5844, 5859-5871, 5888-5892—Expediency of personal inconvenience not preventing the removal of a great public evil, Flather 4585—Justification of restrictive legislation for a great public good, even though individuals may be put to some inconvenience, Freshwater 4966, 4967, 4975-4978, 4996-5003; Cockburn 5947, 5948, 5959 et seq.

Conclusion that individual inconvenience should give way to the great public good to be effected by the Bill, Potter 5100-5102, 5121-5128—Great advantage of Sunday closing as compared with the small amount of inconvenience, Elliott 5338-5341, 5349-5351—Conclusion that the advantages of the Bill, socially and morally, would far outweigh any inconvenience to individuals, Murphy 5466, 5467.

6. Decision of the Committee adverse to the proposed Restrictions :

Conclusion that the further restrictions contemplated by the Bill would be productive of serious inconvenience to a very large number of persons who use public-houses on Sunday, without giving cause for complaint, Rep. iii.—Conclusion that the safe limit of restrictive legislation has been reached, and that further measures in the same direction would be unwise and injudicious, ib. iv. v.—Circumstance of the proposed restrictions not affording any hope of the settlement of the question upon a permanent basis, ib. v.

See also the Headings generally throughout the Index.

Roman Catholic Clergy. Strong feeling of the Catholic clergy in favour of restrictions being applied on Saturday night and Sunday, Archbishop Manning 2446, 2447.

Rowland, John Theophilus. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been engaged by the Licensed Victuallers' Protection Society in carrying out a house-to-house canvass in the New Cut district on the subject of Sunday closing of public-houses; his qualifications for the duty, 6962-6966. 6977-6979. 7002-7004—Explanation relative to an inaccuracy in recording the result of the canvass, as referred to by the Rev. Mr. Murphy; subsequent correction of the error as soon as discovered, 6966-6972.

Careful canvass by witness and two assistants of certain streets previously canvassed on the part of advocates of the Bill; very different results shown as compared with the results submitted in the evidence of Mr. Murphy, 6973-6976—Details relative to the canvass by witness of numerous workshops in the metropolis, some of which were stated by Mr. Murphy to have declared by large majorities in favour of total closing on Sunday; very partial and inaccurate character of the latter canvass as compared with that conducted by witness, which showed very different results, 6980-7030.

Rural Districts. Statement as to the very demoralising results of the opening of public-houses in rural districts on Sunday, Garrett 2187-2189—Excessive drinking on Sunday in some of the villages around Leeds, Lupton 3058-3060—Expediency of a compulsory measure in country districts, ib. 3176.

Effect of the present system in country towns and villages in preventing working men taking short excursions with their families, the beer-house being a greater attraction to many, Bushell 4675. 4677—Difficulty as to means of innocent recreation for the rural classes on Sunday, ib. 4778-4780.

Expediency of increased restriction in the country, the effect of restriction being a diminution of drunkenness, Howard 4804, 4805. 4809-4811—Doubt as to there being any dissatisfaction on the part of farm labourers if the Bill be passed, ib. 4838-4845—Great prevalence of drunkenness in country villages, McCree 6147-6149.

S.

St. Giles. Excessive amount of drinking in St. Giles on Sunday as compared with any other day in the week, the result being a great impetus to misery and crime, McCree 6115-6120—Failure of attempts by witness to attract the people away from the public-houses on week days by means of entertainments of different kinds, ib. 6122-6124—Success of excursions carried out by witness for the lower classes, at which intoxicating drinks have been disallowed, ib. 6125-6127.

Statement relative to the improper temptation held out to children by some publicans in St. Giles to bring the jugs for beer to their houses, McCree 6129-6133. 6176-6183. 6216-6225—Numerous public-houses in St. Giles, and large expenditure in them, ib. 6133, 6134—Absence of popular opposition to the Bill in St. Giles, ib. 6155—None of the publicans close on Sunday, ib. 6184, 6185—Temptation of the public-houses in St. Giles on Sunday in being open after the dinners of the lower class, ib. 6226-6228.

St. Pancras. Statement relative to the untrustworthy character of a canvass in St. Pancras some years ago, said to be favourable to Sunday closing, Morrell 6252-6259—Statement with further reference to the canvass in St. Pancras, as having been made on the question of the Permissive Bill and not of the present measure, ib. 6344-6354. 6516-6518.

Letter from Mr. Dawson Burns explanatory of the circumstances connected with, and the results of, the canvass of St. Pancras in 1863, and showing the inaccuracy of portions of the evidence of Mr. Morrell on the subject, App. 432, 433.

Sale, the Rev. Dr. Earnest support of further restriction by Dr. Sale, vicar of Sheffield, Flather 4578.

Saturday. Much more drunkenness in the metropolis on Saturday than on any other day, Sir R. Mayne 35-37—Very beneficial effect of the earlier closing on Saturday night than on other nights, ib. 174, 188—Peculiar excess of drinking in Liverpool on Saturday night from ten to twelve, Greig 1021, 1201—Circumstance of the Bill not touching the evil of excessive drinking on Saturday night, ib. 1201-1205—Much greater number of drunken cases in Manchester on Saturday than on any other day, Palin 1256, 1257.

Occurrence of the evil more especially on Saturday night, the mischief being much greater on that evening than on Sunday, Archbishop Manning 2364, 2368, 2369—Advantage of additional restrictions on sale on Saturday night, ib. 2406, 2407—Doubt as to the expediency of closing earlier on Saturday than on other nights, McLaren 2862, 2863—Indulgence in drink chiefly on Saturday, Walker 3393.

Excessive drinking on Saturday night, so that witness would propose to close the public-houses at ten o'clock in the evening, Bushell 4666, 4667—Great improvement if the public-houses were closed at ten on Saturday evening, Howard 4799; Freshwater 4878, 4879, 4920-4924—Expediency of applying legislative restrictions to Sunday rather than Saturday, Howard 4865-4867—Advantage if the public-houses were entirely closed on Saturday as well as Sunday, Leicester, 5707—Origination on Saturday night of many of the drunken cases on Sunday, Staton 7090.

Saturday Half-holiday. Improvement if there were a half-holiday on Saturday, Potter 5189.

SCOTLAND:

Conclusion as to the very beneficial effects produced in Scotland by the Forbes Mackenzie Act; large diminution through the Act in the consumption of spirits, Archbishop Manning 2373, 2375-2380, 2424.

Introduction of the Forbes Mackenzie Act in order to correct the defects of the Edinburgh regulations, and to render compulsory throughout Scotland the system of Sunday closing of public-houses, McLaren 2666, 2668, 2669—Adoption by Mr. Muir's Act of 1861 of certain amendments of Forbes Mackenzie's Act in order to prevent evasion, ib. 2670, 2671, 2675-2678—Inquiry by a Commission into the working of Forbes Mackenzie's Act, the evidence in its favour being overwhelming, ib. 2670-2672—Small section opposed to the Act, the mass of the people being strongly in its favour, ib. 2673, 2674—Requirement by the Act that all public-houses be closed at eleven o'clock on week days, and entirely closed on Sunday, there being an exception in favour of hotels, ib. 2677, 2750, 2751.

Evidence relative to the large diminution in the consumption of spirits in Scotland since the passing of the Forbes Mackenzie's Act; examination hereon whether this may not be attributable to the increase of duty and price, and to other causes than the Act in question, McLaren 2686-2715, 2739-2746, 2752 et seq. 2839, 2854-2859—Admission that evasion and illicit drinking exist to some extent in Edinburgh, &c., but the amount of such drinking is small in comparison with the diminution through restriction, ib. 2719-2722, 2768-2790, 2840, 2841—Belief that the great majority of the working classes in Edinburgh and throughout Scotland are favourable to the present state of the law, ib. 2724-2727, 2737—Conclusion as to public opinion being on the whole decidedly adverse to a removal of the existing restrictions, ib. 2727, 2731-2738.

Approval of the limit of the hours of opening on week days to eleven o'clock at night, including Saturday, McLaren 2728-2730—Respects in which restrictions would probably be accepted more willingly by the people of England, ib. 2747-2749, 2805, 2842-2860—Relative consumption of spirits in Ireland and in Scotland, with reference to the population in each case, and the restrictions in force, ib. 2765-2767, 2857-2859—Different effect of restrictions in Scotland and in London, inasmuch as beer rather than whisky is drunk in the London public-houses, ib. 2793-2805.

Admission that diminished drinking habits in Scotland are the result partly of other influences besides that of restrictive legislation, McLaren 2806, 2839—Marked difference in which the Sunday is spent by the people in Scotland and in the large towns in England, ib. 2842-2844—Favourable operation of Forbes Mackenzie's Act in Scotland, the habits of the people as to drinking being, however, very different from the habits of the English, Mackie 4330-4333, 4383-4387—Further explanation of the circumstances which led to Forbes Mackenzie's Act; the authorship of the Act rested mainly with Lord Kinnaird, McLaren 7322, 7323.

Doubt whether total closing on Sunday in Scotland has been the cause of diminished drunkenness, Morrell 6448-6454—Belief as to there being much private drinking in Scotland on Sunday, Winterbotham 6745—Immense amount of Sunday drunkenness in Glasgow and in Dundee, notwithstanding Forbes Mackenzie's Act, Waygood 7040-7045—Belief that in Scotland the system of Sunday closing has led to increased drinking, though not in public, Staton 7175-7180, 7279-7283—Belief that the alleged diminution

diminution of Sunday drunkenness in Scotland is more apparent than real, there being a great increase of private drinking, Wadhams 8041-8047. 8155-8158 — Effect of the increased price of whisky in Scotland in checking the consumption, ib. 8148-8155.

Conclusion of the Committee that the beneficial working of the law in Scotland does not establish any proof that a law similar, or approaching it in strictness, would be either acceptable or expedient in England, Rep. iv.

Select Committee of 1854. Exhaustive and convincing character of the Report of the Select Committee of the House of 1854 in favour of limiting the hours of sale on Sunday, Archbishop Manning, 2457-2459.

Segrave, Captain Henry. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is chief constable of Wolverhampton, 7324 — Considers that the present law is working very well in Wolverhampton, and that the proposed change would cause great inconvenience without any commensurate benefit, 7325 et seq.—Inconvenience more especially in the case of the excursionist class by the proposed closing at ten on Sunday evening; sundry details hereon, 7327-7330. 7341. 7343-7345. 7435-7449 — Great decrease of drunkenness in the town on Sunday in the last ten years; statistics hereon, 7331-7340. 7347-7352.

Belief that the Bill would cause a large amount of illicit drinking in the houses of the people; examination as to the grounds for this conclusion, 7341-7349. 7360-7363. 7403. 7496-7501. 7536-7542 — Improved education and habits of the people, owing to which rather than to restriction drunkenness has decreased, 7347-7352. 7370 — Evasion of the law in beer-houses rather than public-houses, control of the magistrates over the former being much required, 7349. 7372, 7373. 7423-7425. 7491-7495 — Apathy among the working classes in the town upon the question of further restriction, 7353-7358. 7368-7370. 7374. 7375.

Dissatisfaction to a large class if Sunday closing were enforced, 7358, 7359 — Prevalence of drinking among the women, 7363, 7364. 7490, 7491 — Explanation of the circumstances under which witness appears before the Committee; statement also as to his mode of appointment and tenure of office as chief constable, 7376-7380. 7414-7422. 7531, 7532. 7535 — Divided feeling of the local magistrates and other persons of influence upon the question of increased restriction, 7381-7390.

Examination relative to the habits of the people and the amount of drunkenness in the Black Country, with reference to the expediency of further restriction in the district, 7391-7412. 7507-7509 — Obstacle to police prevention of illicit drinking if the Bill be passed, 7404, 7405. 7529, 7530 — Large number of public-houses and beer-houses in Wolverhampton in proportion to the population; belief nevertheless that drinking is not excessive either on Sunday or week days, 7426-7430. 7457-7476. 7493-7495. 7510-7521 — Employment on Sunday of a large number of persons in the public-houses, 7432-7434.

Increase of drinking when wages are high, 7450, 7451 — Special causes to which an increase of the poor-rate in the town in 1867 was owing, 7452-7456 — Respectable character of many of those who use the public-houses on Sunday, 7459-7462. 7474-7476 — Closing of twenty-five public-houses and beer-shops on Sunday out of 500; 7462-7467 — Statement as to music not being performed at any of the public-houses on Sunday, 7468-7472 — Improvement of the people owing to the exertions of their employers, 7477-7481 — Large influx of people to the town on market days, the public-houses being then more exclusively used, 7522-7528.

from a committee of the council in favour of restrictions; doubt as to this report having been formally adopted, Fisher 6801-6824. 6883-6900.

Report made to the town council by a committee in 1852 upon the subject of further restriction; no action was taken on this report, Beal 7723-7726. 7810-7815. 7841, 7842 — Large meeting in December 1854 adverse to increased restriction, ib. 7729-7739. 7778-7780. 7816-7818 — Reference to a public meeting in 1854 on the question of Sundayclosing; majority on this occasion in favour of total closing on Sunday, Wilson 7950-7954.

Resolution of the town council on the 12th January 1853, in favour of an entire prohibition of the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday, except in the case of travellers, App. 430.

2. Operation of the Act of 1854:

Opinion in favour of the Act of 1854, and of its application to Sheffield, Jackson 1477. 1498. 1507-1509. 1515-1522. 1531. 1539-1541. 1570 — Great diminution of Sunday drunkenness during the operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act of 1854; general satisfaction given by the Act, Flather 4511-4519. 4604-4606 — Examination showing that during the operation of the Act there was a considerable diminution of drunkenness on Sunday; the cases are however very rare at present, Fisher 6835-6856.

Dissatisfaction caused in Sheffield by Mr. Wilson Patten's Act of 1854, Beal 7727, 7728 — Letter from some working men to witness in 1855 representing the hardship suffered by them as excursionists under the Act of 1854; circumstance of one of these men being now a teetotaler, ib. 7767-7769. 7844-7846 — Discontent during the operation of the Act; instance of hardship under the Act, Wilson 7946-7950.

3. State of the Town in different Years in regard to Drunkenness on Week Days and on Sunday:

Statement of the amount of drunkenness in Sheffield in each of the last ten years, distinguishing between Sunday and the rest of the week, Jackson 1450-1454 — Considerable decrease of drunkenness with reference to the population since 1848; causes to which owing, ib. 1455-1459. 1571-1573 — Explanation of the mode in which the cases of drunkenness are recorded, ib. 1568 — Large number of beershops in addition to public-houses, ib. 1574.

Opinion that drinking on Sunday is in excess of other days, Flather 4510 — Improved habits of the people, drunkenness having diminished, ib. 4579, 4580. 4637 — Great reduction in the charges for drunkenness within the last twenty years, and since the repeal of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act of 1854, ib. 6781, 6782. 6785-6787. 6793-6800 — Serious inconvenience to be caused by the proposed restrictions, whilst they are not called for by the state of the town on Sunday, ib. 6785. 6788-6791 — Belief that the numbers frequenting the public-houses on Sunday are not excessive, and that but little abuse occurs, ib. 6870-6874.

Important diminution of drunkenness in the town, owing partly to increased means of recreation, Beal 7756-7766 — Great improvement in the habits and social condition of the people of Sheffield under the existing law, Wilson 7860-7867. 7961 — Beneficial operation of temperance societies in the town, ib. 7938-7940.

Return of the number of persons charged with drunkenness during the years 1848-67, distinguishing for the last ten years those who were drunk on Sundays, App. 417 — Statement of the number of publicans and beersellers fined during the last ten years, distinguishing the convictions for offences on Sundays from those on other days, ib.

Return of the number of apprehensions for drunkenness for the six months prior, and for the six months subsequent, to the operation of the Act of 1854; great decrease in consequence of the Act, App. 431.

4. Local Feeling on the Question of increased Restriction; conflicting Evidence on the Subject:

Evidence to the effect that a prohibition of drinking in public-houses on Sunday would cause great inconvenience to large numbers of people, and would lead to great complaint, Jackson 1460 et seq. — Approval by many of the working classes of some further restrictions, ib. 1474-1477. 1496-1507. 1523. 1524 — Further statement as to a large class at Sheffield being favourable to further restriction though opposed to total closing, ib. 1556-1565.

Large majority of householders who declared in 1863 in favour of total closing on Sunday, Flather 4524-4530 — Belief that the working men would generally approve of the the Bill; details hereon relative to the recent canvass of 130 workshops on the question of total closing, Flather 4533-4551. 4566-4572. 4591-4603. 4612-4616—Conclusion that the Bill if applied to Sheffield would excite no disturbance, ib. 4553. 4560. 4563—Feeling of professional men, manufacturers, &c., in favour of further restriction, ib. 4553. 4566.

Information relative to a public meeting in December 1867, attended by about 100 people, in support of the Bill, Flather 4553-4560. 4567-4626—Expected opposition to total closing, but not to further restriction, ib. 4566-4568. 4599-4603. 4627, 4628—Increase of the feeling in favour of restrictions, ib. 4581—Dissent from the views of the chief constable as to the state of feeling in the town on the subject of the Bill, ib. 4652, 4653.

Belief that the present Bill would cause great dissatisfaction in Sheffield, and would be opposed by a majority of the working classes, Fisher 6784-6792—Statement that witness has no connection with the brewing trade nor with publicans; he has acted as chairman of Mr. Roebuck's election committee, the publicans being favourable to Mr. Roebuck, ib. 6825-6833. 6875-6878—Recent canvass of the workshops adverted to, ib. 6861-6867.

Partial character of a recent canvass purporting to be in favour of the Bill, Beal 7740-7747—Belief that the majority of the working men and of the town council are opposed to the Bill; grounds for this conclusion, ib. 7750-7755. 7770-7772. 7782-7785. 7797-7829—Large petitions from Sheffield and the neighbourhood against the present Bill, ib. 7770-7772—Attention of witness drawn to some meetings in 1863 favourable to the movement in aid of Sunday closing, ib. 7819-7829.

Statement as to the partial and incomplete character of the canvass carried out by supporters of the Bill; belief that a full canvass of the workshops would have shown a large majority against further restriction, Wilson 7857-7859. 7895, 7896. 7926-7937—Great discontent if the Bill be passed, ib. 7873, 7874—Statement in further support of the conclusion that the majority of the people are opposed to increased restriction on the Sunday sale of liquors, ib. 7885-7891. 7895-7898. 7944, 7945.

5. Views of the Publicans on the Question of Sunday Closing:

Objection by the publicans at Sheffield to total closing; out of 548 houses fourteen are closed voluntarily, Jackson 1525-1530. 1542, 1543—Impression that many of the licensed victuallers are favourable to further restriction, Flather 4607-4611.

6. Effect of the proposed Act as regards Excursionists:

Extent to which excursionists and travellers at Sheffield might be effected by the restrictions proposed in the Bill; doubt as to any serious inconvenience if they could obtain beer, &c., up to ten o'clock, Jackson 1481-1484. 1488-1495. 1512-1514. 1554, 1555—Slight inconvenience to be caused by the Bill to Sunday excursionists, Flather 4582-4585. 4642-4644—Conclusion as to the serious inconvenience in the case of Sunday excursionists, Beal 7723. 7743. 7767. 7774. 7775. 7787-7789. 7794-7796—Concurrence in the view as to the great inconvenience of the Bill in the case of Sunday excursionists, Wilson 7916-7925.

Smith, John Abel (Member of the Committee). Draft Report proposed by him, summarising the evidence adduced before the Committee, and submitting conclusions in favour of extended restrictions on the Sunday sale of alcoholic liquors, Rep. xii-xxiii—Adoption by the Committee, in lieu of the foregoing, of Draft Report proposed by Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen, ib. xxiv-xxvi.

Smith, Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Denial of the accuracy of a statement by the Rev. Mr. Murphy, reflecting on the course pursued by witness as representing the Licensed Victuallers' Association at the time of the riots in Hyde Park in 1854; 5648-5650.

Southampton. Statement relative to the satisfactory operation in the town of a Local Act in 1844, and of the General Act of 1848, upon the subject of restrictions on the sale of drink and other articles on Sunday, Eldridge 3839-3848—Adoption by the town council in 1865 of Sir George Grey's Act of 1864, the result being a continued improvement in the state of the town as regards drunkenness, ib. 3846. 3854-3857. 3920-3923—Feeling of a portion of the working classes in favour of Sunday closing, ib. 3858, 3859—Willingness of some of the publicans to close on Sunday, ib. 3860.

Opinion that there is more drunkenness on Sunday than on other days, Eldridge 3868-3874—Belief that the Bill would not create any disturbance in the town, ib. 3875—Probable inconvenience to lodgers, and to the large floating population attached to shipping, by applying the proposed Bill to Southampton, Eldridge 3888-3897. 3936-3946. 4013-4021.

Further statement that though drunkenness is on the decrease in the town, and though some inconvenience might arise from further restrictions on the Sunday, witness is, on the whole, favourable to an increase of restrictive policy, Eldridge 3920 et seq.

Decided improvement at Southampton by different Acts imposing restrictions on the sale of drink on Sunday and week days, Enright 4434-4443. 4476-4479—Belief that the present Bill would not create any disturbance in the town, and would further diminish drunkenness on Sunday, ib. 4444. 4449-4451. 4462-4468. 4476-4482—Very little inconvenience to lodgers, &c., by prohibiting consumption on the premises, ib. 4469-4475. 4494-4503.

Southwark. Considerable diminution during the last two years in the number of drunken cases and criminal charges brought before witness at the Southwark Police Court on Monday as well as on other days, Burcham 478-484. 495. 501. 619—Doubt as to the diminution of drunkenness in witness's district being owing to the increased restrictions under the Act of 1864 upon the sale of drink, more especially on Sunday; belief that it is due rather to the improved education and morality of the people, ib. 485-492. 495-501. 552-568. 608. 619, 620—Evidence in detail to the effect that increased restrictions in the district on the sale of drink on Sunday are not required, ib. 495 et seq.

Absence of excess in the number of drunken cases brought before witness on Monday morning, Burcham 506-509—Opinion that the men employed on the river side in witness's district have not become more intemperate in their habits, ib. 546-551—Question considered whether the returns which may be had from witness's court will confirm his statement as to the improved habits and morals of the people, and the decrease of drunkenness in the district, ib. 568-585.

Consideration of certain returns showing the much greater amount of Sunday drunkenness in Southwark police district before the Acts of 1854 and 1855; probability of the great improvement subsequently having been owing to the much shorter time of opening the public-houses on Sunday, Burcham 596-603.

Limited weight attached to a certain statement by the late Mr. A'Beckett as to the great diminution of drunken cases at the Southwark police court on Monday morning, owing to Mr. Wilson Patten's Act of 1854, Woolrych 715-720.

Special Licenses (Metropolis). Very rare instances of the grant of exceptional licenses in the metropolis exempting from the provisions of the Act of 1864, Sir R. Mayne 15-17.

Increase of the number of police at Bolton, the drunken cases being also more closely looked after, 7093-7095. 7244, 7245—Effect of further restriction in increasing private drinking at home, 7099-7102. 7175—Belief that the bulk of the population of Bolton and its neighbourhood is decidedly against any further restriction, 7103, 7104. 7149—Details in contradiction of certain evidence of the mayor of Bolton as to the results of a canvass of the householders, and of public meetings on the question of increased restriction, 7107-7110. 7137-7158. 7171-7173. 7184-7190. 7193-7240. 7291-7306. 7315, 7316.

Particulars relative to the operation of public-houses where music is performed on Sunday evening; opinion that evil does not result from this system, 7111-7127. 7181-7183. 7252-7256. 7262-7277. 7307, 7308. 7317-7321—Practice as to Sunday excursions at Bolton; great inconvenience to the excursionists if the Bill be passed, 7128-7136—Strong objection by publicans to the Bill, 7151-7154. 7159-7162—Considerable dissatisfaction caused by the Act of 1854; 7155-7158—Approval of the present law, though witness doubts whether the closing up to one o'clock on Sunday has diminished drunkenness, 7165-7170. 7231-7237. 7289, 7290.

Inaccuracy of a statement that all the Bolton newspapers are in favour of Sunday closing, 7173, 7174. 7205-7209. 7315. 7316—Belief that in Scotland the system of Sunday closing has led to increased drinking, though not in public, 7175-7180. 7279-7283—Statement as to the town council of Bolton not representing public opinion, 7185-7190. 7291-7295—Doubt as to abuse arising in connection with the holding of clubs in public-houses; there have however been complaints on the subject, 7284-7288. 7309-7314.

Steinthal, The Rev. Samuel Alfred. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Nonconformist minister at Manchester; was for eight years at Liverpool, and has had ample opportunities of observing the operation of the laws for the sale of drink among the lower classes, 3711-3719. 3723, 3724—Testifies to the fact that there is a very large amount of Sunday drinking among the working classes, 3720-3724—Is connected with the United Kingdom Alliance, the British Temperance League, and the Central Sunday Closing Association, and has taken an active interest in the present Bill, as an instalment towards entire closing, 3725-3727. 3745, 3746. 3758. 3761. 3782-3784.

Issue of circulars by the Central Sunday Closing Association to the chief constables of various towns, the replies showing that there is an unduly large proportion of drunkenness on Sunday as compared with week days, 3727, 3728. 3762—Inadequacy of the police statistics as a means of indicating the real amount of drunkenness in any place, 3729. 3765—Necessity of visiting the homes of the people in order to ascertain the extent to which drinking is carried, 3729. 3766-3769.

Particulars relative to a house-to-house canvass, as made in large towns, at the instance of the Central Sunday Closing Association, the result being that a very large majority of the people have declared in favour of total closing; examination hereon as to the practice in carrying out this canvass, 3730-3744. 3751-3753. 3763, 3764. 3795, 3796. 3799. 3807-3818—Particulars as to the result of the canvass in the case of Manchester; large majority of the lower classes favourable to total closing on Sunday, 3733, 3734. 3737. 3742. 3751-3753.

Approval of the present Bill by the advocates of total closing, 3745, 3746. 3758. 3797, 3798—Belief that the Bill would not lead to any disturbance or violence on the part of the working classes, 3747-3751—Very general opinion of employers of labour in support of Sunday closing, 3754—Canvass of numerous workshops at Manchester, &c., the result showing a large majority of the workpeople in favour of total closing, 3755-3757.

Belief that the Bill would not lead to much illicit drinking, 3759, 3760—Probability of an increased amount of home drinking and drunkenness, though to a very limited extent as compared with public-house drunkenness, 3769-3781—Defence of the movement for an entire prohibition of the sale of drink, as by means of a Permissive Bill; conclusion as to the decided public benefit thereby, and as to the better health of the people, 3782-3794.

Considerable amount of drunkenness in Liverpool, whereas eighty per cent. of the householders have declared in favour of entire closing on Sunday, 3799-3806—General opinion of Sunday school teachers in favour of the Bill, 3819—Evil effects of public-houses as regards Sunday scholars, 3820. 3829—Almost unanimous feeling of the wives of working men in favour of Sunday closing, 3821-3824—Information relative to the practice in Manchester, and other towns, of having music at public-houses on Sunday evening, the result being very injurious, 3825-3837.

Stockport. The population of the town is about 60,000, there being 130 public-houses and 140 beershops, Rea 8284-8286—Very little drunkenness in the town on Sunday, there having been a great improvement generally in the habits of the people, ib. 8287. 8323-8331. 8373-8376—Reference to a meeting in Stockport provided over by the mayor, in favour of Sunday closing, ib. 8312-8315. 8377-8382—Partial and dishonest character of a house-to-house canvass of the town; grounds for this statement, ib. 8316-8322. 8345-8369—Satisfactory working of the present restrictions in Stockport, any increase of restriction being productive of much hardship to the working classes, ib. 8323-8327. 8370-8376.

Sunday Bands. Very inconvenient effect of the Bill in the case of the vast numbers of persons attending the Sunday bands in the parks, Morrell 6248, 6249. 6367-6369. 6380-6388—Beneficial effect of the Sunday band in Battersea Park, in attracting people away from Cremorne and in inducing order, ib. 6250, 6251. 6306-6309.

Sunday Drinking. See the Headings generally throughout the Index.

Sunday Schools. Antagonism of the public-houses on Sunday to Sunday schools, Hall 2554, 2555—Great evil of the antagonism between the public-houses and the Sunday schools, Jackson 3248-3256—General opinion of Sunday school teachers in favour of the Bill, Steinthal 3819—Evil effects of public-houses as regards Sunday scholars, ib. 3820. 3829—Injurious effect of the public-houses on Sunday schools, Elliott 5352-5354—Approval by Sunday school teachers at Birmingham of Sunday closing, Wadhams 8056-8059.

Conclusion that the Bill would be no benefit as regards Sunday schools, Henshall 8433-8435.

Sunday Trading. Information relative to the Sunday trading in Southwark as regards the necessaries of life; conclusion that neither in this respect nor in the case of the sale of liquor is there any need for further restriction, Burcham 502-511. 521-545. 622-626.

Comment on the less restriction upon the sale of drink on Sunday than of meat, bread, &c., Archbishop Manning 2364. 2490-2493—Inconsistency in public-houses being permitted to be open whilst shops generally are closed, Bushell 4669. 4740-4749—Hardship in several other trades being prohibited on Sunday while trade in liquor is allowed, Newall 5222, 5223. 5234-5242.

Special restrictions and penalties of the publican's trade as compared with other trades, so that the former has a special claim to seven days' trade in the week, Winterbotham 6691-6693—Grounds for concluding that more inconvenience would arise from applying further restrictions to the sale of drink on Sunday than already arises from the prohibition of the sale of bread, meat, &c., or from the cessation of mechanical labour, ib. 6732. 6738-6742.

T.

Temperance. Witness believes that the greatest possible blessing to the nation would be the total closing of public-houses and the spread of temperance, Leicester 5691. 5708, 5709. 5742-5745—Probable effect of temperance societies in checking drunkenness, as at Manchester, Candelet 8703-8705.

Value attached to the temperance movement as materially contributing to the diminution of drunkenness, Rep. iv.

See also Permissive Bill.

Total Closing. Objection to the total closing of public-houses on Sunday, Palin 1308—Part taken by the United Kingdom Alliance in favour of total closing on Sunday, Garrett 2275-2281. 2326-2328—Decided approval of the Bill before the Committee, though witness would rather regard it as an instalment towards total closing, White 2910, 2911. 2914-2918—Great advantage if ultimately the public-houses (in Liverpool) were entirely closed on Sunday, it being desirable in the meantime to pass the present Bill as an instalment of the full measure, Gladstone 2982-2984. 2989-2991. 3001-3006.

Witness is connected with the United Kingdom Alliance, the British Temperance League, and the Central Sunday Closing Association, and has taken an active interest in the present Bill as an instalment towards entire closing, Steinthal 3725-3727. 3745, 3746. 3758. 3761. 3782-3784—Approval of the present Bill by the advocates of total closing, ib. 3745, 3746. 3758. 3797, 3798—Approval of the present Bill as an instalment, witness being in favour of total closing on Sunday, Mackie 4323-4329. 4344, 4245.

Conclusion as to the moderate character of the restrictions in the Bill rather than of a Bill for immediate and total closing on Sunday; good prospect of total closing in course of time, Bushell 4669. 4673. 4754, 4755. 4762—Approval by witness of entire closing on Sunday, though he would gladly accept the present Bill as an instalment, Freshwater 4982-4984—Explanation that witness looks forward to total closing on Sunday, but is not in favour of a Maine Liquor law, Potter 5103-5108—Witness considers that Sunday drinking is a source of great evil, and is in favour of total closing on that day, Elliott 5311-5313.

Approval not only of the present measure but of total closing on Sundays and weekdays if the people were in favour of legislation to that effect, Murphy 5609-5618—Witness would like to see the public-houses closed entirely on Sunday, Mathews 6094; M'Cree 6152, 6153—Decided approval of the present Bill as an instalment towards total closing, M'Cree 6151-6154. 6164-6166.

Comment upon a Letter from the Rev. J. Garrett, as showing that the advocates of the Bill regard it only as an instalment towards further restriction, Candelet 8551, 8552.

Return showing the results of a household canvass in various towns throughout the kingdom, the great majority of the people declaring in favour of entire closing on Sunday, App. 423, 424—Large majority of the men in various workshops in the manufacturing districts in favour of total closing on Sunday, ib. 424—Memorial of numerous large employers of labour as to the great evils consequent upon not closing the public-houses on Sunday, ib. 425, 426.

Travellers. Considerable relaxation of the restrictions under the Act of 1855, with reference to travellers, Sir R. Mayne 38-41—Less necessity for the public-houses being open after ten o'clock in the evening now that there are such facilities for travellers to obtain refreshments at railway stations, ib. 70-73—Examination in disapproval of the proviso proviso in the Bill under which travellers in the country might be precluded from obtaining refreshment on Sunday, unless for consumption off the premises, Sir R. Mayne 309-320—Opinion that it is not compulsory upon publicans, as upon innkeepers, to open their houses on Sunday for the accommodation of travellers, if they so demand, ib. 330-337.

Question whether the first clause of the Bill, as at present drawn, would not interfere with bonâ fide travellers in the country, Sir T. Henry 453-457—Improbability of doubtful interpretation of the first clause of the Act upon the question of travellers in the country being precluded from obtaining refreshment on Sunday, Woolrych 740-747. 806—Legal doubt and difficulty likely to arise in connection with the interpretation of the term “traveller” under the proposed restrictions, ib. 788-799.

Facilities under the Bill for persons at Brighton who go any distance from home to procure drink as travellers; examination hereon as to the legal interpretation of the Act in regard to travellers in the country, Bigge 2034-2040. 2073-2107. 2041-2045.—Limited amount of inconvenience to be caused to travellers, &c., as compared with the benefits to be conferred by the proposed Bill, Archbishop Manning, 2425-2431. 2438-2440. 2467—Ample facilities under the present Bill in the case of travellers and excursionists, Jackson 3266. 3268, 3269.

Difficulty under the Bill in the case of bonâ fide travellers, as well as of excursionists, Morrell 6247. 6249, 6250—Immense number of persons travelling in and around the metropolis on Sunday; statistics hereon, ib. 6499-6504—Belief that the legal effect of the present Bill would be to abolish the privileges of travellers throughout the country, Winterbotham 6536-6538—Dissent from the view that the traveller question may be considered as already settled, Candelet 8511, 8512. 8655-8662.

Legal settlement already of the traveller question, Johnes 8770—Contemplated right of travellers to use houses and taverns in addition to these places being used also such occasions as public dinners, &c., ib. 8795-8809.

U.

United Kingdom Alliance. Reference to the part taken by the United Kingdom Alliance in support of a Permissive Bill and of total closing on Sunday, Garrett 2275-2281. 2326-2328—Approval by witness of the principles of action of the United Kingdom Alliance, ib. 2282-2287.

Comment upon the strong expressions used by members of the Alliance in their condemnation of public-houses, Rea 8395-8401.

United States. Question considered whether in the United States the system of prohibition has not led to great abuse, and has ended in failure, Barlow 4173-4185—Satisfactory operation of restrictive law in America; explanation hereon in connection with the present state of the laws in Massachusetts, Murphy 5613. 5619-5627.

United Towns Association, &c. Witness is president of the United Towns Association and National Licensed Victuallers' Defence League; objects of the association and numerous large towns represented by it, Wadhams 7965-7968. 8007, 8008—Issue of circulars by the Association to the various towns on the subject of the present Bill; replies received in uniform condemnation of the Bill, ib. 7969, 7970. 7976-7982.

V.

Voluntary Associations. Beneficial operation of voluntary associations for checking drunkenness on Saturday and Sunday, these, however, being quite inadequate in the absence of legislative restrictions, Archbishop Manning 2367. 2494, 2495.

Voluntary Closing. Large number of public-houses voluntarily closed at Liverpool, Greig 926. 962. 972—Total closing on Sunday by twenty-seven publicans and forty-six beerhouse keepers at Birmingham, Glossop 1700—Unwillingness of publicans to close on Sunday through fear of the competition of those who remain open, Archbishop Manning 2462-2465. 2495—Very prosperous business of some of the largest publicans at Leeds, who have closed voluntarily for many years, Lupton 3047, 3048. 3149-3151.

Obstacle to a combined action of publicans in favour of total closing, so that the interference of the Legislature is essential, Walker 3521-3525—Details relative to a voluntary arrangement at Neston, in Cheshire, for carrying out the restrictions proposed by the Bill; failure of the arrangement after a time, Bushell 4661. 4668. 4677. 4679. 4756-4760—Circumstance of witness, when a publican, having opened on Sunday because his neighbours did so, Freshwater 4985-4988—Impression that not one publican in witness's district close entirely on Sunday, Murphy 5523—Doubt as to the adequacy of public opinion as a means of requiring publicans to close on Sunday, ib. 5634-5643—Closing of twenty-five public-houses and beershops at Wolverhampton, on Sunday, out of 500, Segrave 7462-7467.

Advantage if publicans would close voluntarily for the sake of their families and servants, Wilson 7955-7958—Impracticability of Sunday closing by means of voluntary and united action of the publicans, as advised by Mr. Bright, Wadhams 8073-8075. 8092, 8093—Inadequacy of the amicable arrangement suggested by Mr. Bright, as it would not be a permanent settlement of the question, ib. 8159-8162—Voluntary closing on Sunday by some few publicans at Manchester, Candelet 8509—Loss of week-day business in the case of those who close voluntarily on Sunday, ib. 8521, 8522.

W.

Wadhams, Joseph. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a member of the Birmingham Town Council; was for twenty years a licensed victualler, 7963, 7964—Is president of the United Towns Association and National Licensed Victuallers' Defence League; objects of the association and numerous large towns represented by it, 7965-7968. 8007, 8008—Issue of circulars by the association to the various towns on the subject of the present Bill; replies received in uniform condemnation of the Bill, 7969, 7970. 7976-7982.

More restrictive character of the present Bill than of the Bill of last Session, on account of the proposed prohibition of consumption on the premises, 7970-7975. 8062—Opinion as to the sufficiency of the present law in Birmingham if properly carried out, and if drinking during the prohibited hours on Sunday morning were effectually prevented; suggestions hereon for a better system of supervision, 7983. 8003-8006. 8009-8013. 8038-8040. 8072—Statistics showing that Sunday drunkenness in Birmingham has much decreased with reference to the population, 7983-7986. 8038, 8039—Decrease of drunkenness owing to the opening of parks, &c., on Sunday and to the improved habits of the people, 7986-7995. 8107, 8108—System of free libraries at Birmingham; statement as to these not being open on Sunday, 7987-7993. 8016-8022.

Conclusion as to the great inconvenience to be caused by the Bill to the numerous persons who take short excursions out of Birmingham on Sunday, and who frequent the parks and other places, 7994-7999. 8037. 8070—More stringent character of Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill as introduced than as passed, 8000, 8001—Considerable satisfaction in Birmingham whilst the Act of 1854 was in operation, 8001, 8002—Belief that the proposed restrictions could not be effectually enforced and would lead to a great increase of evasion, 8003. 8014, 8015. 8026-8028. 8108, 8109.

Very large capital employed in the licensed victuallers' trade; serious deterioration of profits and capital by the proposed restrictions, 8023-8025. 8060-8068—Great improvement of the people generally as well as in the matter of drunkenness, 8029-8032—Inconvenience to be caused by the Bill in the case of lodgers and others who take their meals in public-houses on Sunday, 8033-8036. 8142-8145.

Belief that the alleged diminution of Sunday drunkenness in Scotland is more apparent than real, there being a great increase of private drinking, 8041-8047. 8155-8158—Admission that the restrictions hitherto on the Sunday sale of liquors have produced much good, 8048-8050—Grounds for dissenting from the views of Mr. Hill, recorder of Birmingham, in favour of total closing on Sunday 8051-8055—Hardship of restrictions pressing too severely on the great body of working men who consume beer in moderation on Sunday, 8052-8055—Circumstance of Sunday school teachers at Birmingham being in favour of Sunday closing, 8056-8059.

Great dissatisfaction caused among licensed victuallers by the constant attempts at legislative interference with their trade, 8061—Absence of objections by the employes in public-houses to the present system, 8064-8066—Serious inconvenience by the Bill to a very large number of persons who are moving about in Birmingham between the hours of three and five on Sunday, 8069, 8070. 8142-8147—Impracticability of Sunday closing by means of voluntary and united action of the publicans, as advised by Mr. Bright, 8073-8075. 8092, 8093.

Grounds for the statement that a certain large meeting at Birmingham, referred to by Mr. Avery, did by no means represent the opinions of the working classes on the question of increased restriction, 8076-8087—Expediency of the Committee not being guided by the views of partisans on either side of the question, 8080-8091.

Very large proportion of beershops and public-houses in Birmingham, there being doubtless a vast amount of drinking 8094-8105—Expediency of the beerhouses being licensed by the magistrates, 8110-8112—Other articles besides beer upon the sale of which many of the beer-houses depend for a profit, 8113-8135—Doubt as to adulteration being much practised in the beershops or licensed houses, 8136-8141.

Effect of the increased price of whisky in Scotland in checking the consumption, 8148-8155—Inadequacy of the amicable arrangement suggested by Mr. Bright, as it would not be a permanent settlement of the question, 8159-8162.

Wages. Great boon to the families of working men if wages were not so largely spent in the public-houses, Greig 1043, 1044. 1241—Increased indulgence in drink according as wages are higher, Lupton 3214-3216; Leicester 5663, 5664. 5812-5814. 5887; Segrave 7450, 7451—Special temptation to drinking on Sunday, wages being paid the day before, and working men having nothing to do, Jackson 3236. 3318.

Large amount of other wages spent by some working men in beer, Walker 3392—Opinion that high wages do not lead to an increase of intemperance, Flather 4587-4590—Instances of high wages leading to an increase of drinking, there being also much drinking in times of depression and bad trade, Bushell 4776, 4777.

See also Payment of Wages.

Wales. Very little drinking in Wales, save in taverns, Johnes 8744. 8789-8794—Sobriety districts where taverns have been suppressed, as on part of the property of Lord Penrhyn, ib. 8744-8749. 8774-8796.

Immense majority of the working classes in North Wales, and probably in South Wales also, in favour of the present Bill, and still more so of total closing on Sunday details hereon relative to an exceedingly careful canvass carried out in various towns showing an almost unanimous support of further restriction, Johnes 8753-8757. 8762-8764. 8773.

Return showing the results of a household canvass in North Wales and South Wales upon the question of closing public houses on Sunday; very large majority in favour of total closing, App. 423, 424.

Paper submitted by Mr. Johnes, showing the results of a canvass of various towns in Wales, a very large majority of the people being in favour of Sunday closing, App. 434.

Walker, George. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was for many years a working man, and has had numerous and varied opportunities for becoming acquainted with the habits of the lower classes 3379-3391—Large amount spent by some working men in beer, 3392—Indulgence of drink chiefly on Saturday, 3393—Effect of Sunday drinking in unfitting men for work on Monday, 3394-3398. 3422—Great blessing to the working men and their families, if the former could drink only at home on Sunday; very little drinking in such case, 3397. 3399-3401. 3404, 3405.

Benefit to the publicans themselves by Sunday closing, 3402, 3403. 3405—Various ways in which the working classes in Leeds pass their time on Sunday, the temptation of the public-house being irresistible with many, especially in the evening, 3406-3410—Very injurious effect of public houses on Sunday in the case of young females and of lads about sixteen years of age or so, 3411-3414. 3423-3425—Ample facilities for excursionists to obtain beer for consumption at home under the proposed Bill, 3417, 3418.

Denial that the Bill would impose any real hardship upon working men in Leeds, or would prevent the home consumption of beer, 3418, 3419. 3465-3475—Great advantage by closing till half-past twelve on Sunday, 3420, 3421—Particulars relative to the operation of the Working Men's Institute at Leeds, and the practice as to the supply of refreshments, beer not being allowed, 3426-3431. 3476-3487—Grounds for the conclusion that restriction would be satisfactory to a large majority of the people, 3432-3439. 3517-3520. 3526.

Examination favourable to the provision of various means of recreation for the people on Sunday, including music, the opening of art exhibitions, &c., 3440-3448. 3502-3513—Conclusion as to the evil, in London as in Leeds, of facilities for drinking on Sunday in conjunction with excursions, or with open-air music, &c., 3449-3457—Argument, that though a portion of the community may use public-houses in moderation on Sunday, their feelings on the subject should be sacrificed for the benefit of the community at large, 3488-3501. 3514-3516.

Obstacle to a combined action of publicans in favour of total closing, so that the interference of the Legislature is essential, 3521-3525—Belief that in a very short time the present Bill would be accepted in Leeds without any resistance whatever, 3526.

Waygood, Richard. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is an engineer in the south of London, employing about seventy men; has had forty years' experience of working men, 7031-7033—Fallacy of the notion that the improved habits of the working classes and the decrease of drunkenness are owing in any way to restrictions on the sale of drink; other causes to which attributable, 7033-7048—Importance of excursions and of the opening of museums, &c., on Sunday, as a means of inducing temperate habits; illustration of this in Paris and Berlin, where there are no restrictions on the Sunday sale of liquor, 7033, 7034. 7040. 7050-7056.

Belief that further restrictions would lead to much hostility, and to a great increase of illicit drinking; restriction, in fact, is no check upon drunkenness, 7035-7040. 7047-7049—Immense amount of Sunday drunkenness in Glasgow, notwithstanding 402—I.

Forbes Mackenzie's Act, 7040-7045—Great extent to which illicit drinking is carried in Dundee on Sunday, 7040-7043.

Examination relative to the contents of a certain pamphlet written by witness; conclusion as to there being too much liberty for evil in this country, and as to the present reign being for certain reasons a peculiarly disastrous one, 7057-7078—Denial that liberty in drinking is liberty for evil; evil, rather, of any class legislation on the subject, 7062-7065. 7079-7084.

Week Days. Approval of the restriction in regard to the closing at one in the morning on week days, Morrell 6267-6272.

West, Jabez. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Details relative to the canvass by witness of certain workshops in the metropolis, and the steps taken in each case to obtain returns on the question of Sunday closing; inaccuracy of certain statements hereon by Mr. Winterbotham, 6923-6961.

White, The Rev. Verner Moore, LL.D. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Presbyterian minister in Liverpool; has had peculiar opportunities of information on the subject of local drunkenness, 2865-2868—Conclusion that drunkenness has decidedly increased in Liverpool, and that the increase has extended to Sundays as well as week days, 2868-2876—Less drunkenness under the restrictive system than under the free licensing system, 2873—Excess of drunkenness in Liverpool as compared with any other town in England, there being also an excess of pauperism and an increase of crime, 2874-2876.

Canvass of the publicans of Liverpool in 1860 upon the question of Sunday closing; large majority in favour thereof, 2877-2879. 2884-2887—Exceedingly careful canvass of the householders generally in 1863, the result being that an immense majority declared in favour of total closing on Sunday, 2880-2883. 2888-2892. 2912-2917—Very large majority of artisans and of labourers in favour of total closing, 2891—Reference to a recent large petition from Liverpool as showing the widespread feeling in the town in support of restrictions on the Sunday sale of liquor, 2893-2899.

Baneful effects of drunkenness as a source of prostitution; illustration of this, 2900-2902. 2949, 2950—Origination in drunkenness of a vast amount of vice and immorality, 2903—Stringent regulations under which the Liverpool police act in connection with drunkenness, 2904-2906—Numerous children suffocated in bed in Liverpool by drunken parents between Saturday and Monday of each week, 2907. 2919-2921—Comment made by the judges of assize upon the large amount of crime resulting from drunkenness, 2908.

Decided approval of the Bill before the Committee, though witness would rather regard it as an instalment towards total closing, 2910, 2911. 2914-2918. 2938, 2939—Improvement if wages were paid on some other day than Saturday, as tending to less expenditure in drink on Sunday, 2921, 2922—Improvement also by limiting the hours of sale from one to half-past two, and from eight to ten, 2923, 2924—Belief that no public disturbance would arise in Liverpool if further restrictions were imposed, 2925-2937.

Large majority of the Irish population of the town in favour of total closing, 2928-2932—Belief that total closing would be acceptable to the large towns generally in Lancashire 2935—Immense attendance at a public meeting in Liverpool, in 1863, in favour of entire closing on Sunday, 2940-2945—Similar feeling on the subject in Birkenhead as in Liverpool, 2946-2948—Features in common between Liverpool and Glasgow, the two towns being remarkable for drunkenness, 2951-2953.

Approval of restrictions in Liverpool by large numbers of those who cannot resist the temptation to drink to excess, 2954, 2955—Question considered whether the excess of of Sunday drinking is not to some extent owing to the people not taking excursions out of town in larger numbers, 2956-2968—Practice of the women to drink gin rather than beer, 2969, 2970—Belief that drunkenness among women is on the increase, 2970—Doubt as to the large seafaring population accounting sufficiently for the excess of drinking, 2971, 2972.

Wilson, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a mechanic at Sheffield, in the employment of Messrs. Rodgers and Sons; has had a very extended experience of the working classes of the town, 7847-7856—Statement as to the partial and incomplete character of the canvass carried out in Sheffield by supporters of the Bill; belief that a full canvass of the workshops would have shown a large majority against further restriction, 7857-7859. 7895, 7896. 7926-7937—Great improvement in the habits and social condition of the people of Sheffield under the existing law, 7860-7867. 7961.

Beneficial effect of the closing of public-houses on Sunday forenoon, 7867-7869. 7894—Decided objection to further restriction upon the liberty of the many for the protection of the few, 7870-7872. 7883-7885. 7906 et seq—Great discontent if the Bill be passed, 7873, 7874—Experience of witness in Paris; conclusion that the mode of keeping Sunday there is in some respects inferior, and in some superior, as compared with this country, 7875-7882. 7892, 7893. 7899-7908.

Distressed state of some of the lower class of workmen in Sheffield owing to intemperance, rance, 7880. 7962—Statement in further support of the conclusion that the majority of the people are opposed to increased restriction on the Sunday sale of liquors, 7885-7891. 7895-7898. 7944, 7945—Objection to the restriction under the Bill as regards Good Friday, 7909, 7910—Great inconvenience of the Bill in the case of Sunday excursionists, 7916-7925—Beneficial operation of temperance societies in the town, 7938-7940.

Discontent in Sheffield during the operation of the Act of 1854; instance of hardship under the Act, 7946-7950—Reference to a public meeting in 1854 on the question of Sunday closing; majority on this occasion in favour of total closing on Sunday, 7950-7954—Advantage if publicans were to close voluntarily, so that they and their families and employes should have a day of rest on Sunday, 7955-7958—Grounds for objecting to compulsory closing, though approving of voluntary closing, 7958-7961.

Winterbotham, Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a licensed victualler; has been engaged in business for thirty-six years, and has for the last twenty-five years taken an active and prominent part in almost every public question affecting the interests of the trade, 6519-6523—Was a member of the Protection Society in 1854, when Mr. Wilson Patten's Bill was introduced, and explains the circumstances under which a compromise was then effected as to the hours of closing on Sunday, 6524-6530.

Considerable dissatisfaction of the trade, and of the public, with the compromise of 1854; 6529. 6541—Opposition of a large portion of the trade to the Bill of 1854, though they had nothing to do with the meetings or riots in the parks which then took place, 6531-6535—Belief that the legal effect of the present Bill would be to abolish the privileges of travellers throughout the country, 6536-6538—Statement showing the very great inconvenience and hardship to excursionists under the restrictions in the Bill, 6539-6544. 6556-6564.

Large class of persons employed in London on Sunday to whom the proposed restrictions would be most inconvenient, 6545-6551—Belief as to public-houses on Sunday being very necessary for persons in lodgings, 6552-6554—Material improvement in the habits of the people in regard to drinking, 6555. 6563—Exceedingly salutary operation of the system of Sunday excursions, 6555. 6564—Great hardship to the excursionist class if further restricted in obtaining refreshment on Sunday, 6556-6562.

Calculation that out of about 4,000,000 people in the metropolitan district not more than 2,000 have been charged in one year with drunkenness, and crimes arising out of drunkenness, 6565—Conclusion as to the impracticability of strictly carrying out the Bill, extensive evasion being sure to result, 6566, 6567—Apprehension that the Bill would lead to much secret drinking, which would be a great bane, 6567, 6568.

Explanatory statement relative to the course taken in obtaining petitions against the Bill; in three weeks nearly 500,000 signatures were procured, 6569-6572—Inquiry instituted by witness in order to test the accuracy of the Rev. Mr. Murphy's evidence as to the results of a house-to-house canvass in and adjoining the New Cut, Lambeth, upon the question of total closing on Sunday; entire inaccuracy of the figures submitted by Mr. Murphy, 6573-6576—Statement showing the inaccuracy also of Mr. Murphy's evidence in regard to the working men in various large establishments having been canvassed, and having for the most part declared in favour of entire closing of the public-houses on Sunday; these establishments, in fact, were not canvassed at all, as reported by Mr. Murphy, 6577.

[Second Examination.]—Further reference to the course pursued in canvassing various workshops in London in order to rebut the evidence of Mr. Murphy, 6592-6595—Marked improvement in the drinking habits and in the general conduct of the lower classes since witness first engaged in business thirty-six years ago, 6596-6609. 6615, 6616—Belief that the brief operation of Mr. Wilson Patten's Act was productive of no benefit, whilst it caused much dissatisfaction, 6610-6612.

Numerous class of persons, including not only excursionists but cabmen, omnibus drivers, &c., to whom closing at ten instead of eleven on Sunday evening would be a great inconvenience and hardship, 6612-6614. 6630, 6631. 6686-6690. 6701, 6702—Discontent of the public with the Act of 1854 further adverted to; further denial that the licensed victuallers had anything to do with the meetings in Hyde Park at this period, 6617-6621. 6661, 6662. 6681-6683. 6757-6765—Belief that public dissatisfaction would be sure to follow increased restrictions at the present time, 6620, 6621—Opinion that there is no necessity whatever for any alteration of the law, 6622.

Great inconvenience to the licensed victuallers' trade through the constant attempts to impose restrictions upon it, 6623-6629—Very small percentage of drunkenness which takes place on Sunday, 6632—Expected increase of evasion as a result of further restrictions, 6633, 6634—Denial of a statement that publicans are promoters of drunkenness for their own interest, 6635. 6703—Prospect of frequent legal proceedings under the Bill, unless there be a clear definition of what constitutes a bonâ fide meal, 6636.

Explanation and defence of the course pursued as regards the petitions against the Bill, and the mode of obtaining signatures, 6637-6640. 6643, 6644—Belief as to there having been much irregularity as regards the signatures to petitions in favour of the Bill; grounds for this statement, 6641, 6642. 6713-6722. 6774, 6775—Examination upon the question whether witness did not join in a movement against the Bill of 1854, shortly after it was agreed to accept it as a compromise, 6645-6661. 6679-6681.

Tendency of an excessive number of public-houses to increase drinking habits; strong objection on this score to a free licensing system, 6663-6665. 6678, 6679—Immense amount of inconvenience to be caused by the present Bill as compared with any benefit to be derived, 6666, 6667. 6686-6690. 6695-6707—Information relative to the character of the business at witness's establishment (Peel's Coffee-house); less injury to be suffered by him through Sunday restrictions than by many other houses in the trade, 6668-6677. 6684, 6685. 6694, 6695. 6704, 6705—Utter ruin of many publicans if the Bill become law, 6675-6677.

Very little, if any, decrease of drunkenness on Sunday by the proposed restrictions, 6678, 6679. 6702—Special restrictions and penalties of the publicans' trade as compared with other trades, so that the former has a special claim to seven days' trade in the week, 6691-6693—Probability of but little interference, as regards the supply of beer for the meals of the lower classes, by the proposed restrictions, 6695-6700—Exception taken to the view that those employed in public-houses are very generally in favour of Sunday closing, 6708—Comparatively few publicans in London who have petitioned in favour of the Bill, 6709-6712.

Further statement as regards drunkenness in London, that the population is probably far short of 4,000,000, and that the 2,000 drunken cases before referred to occurred on Sundays exclusively, 6723-6731—Grounds for concluding that more inconvenience would arise from applying further restrictions to the sale of drink on Sunday than already arises from the prohibition of the sale of bread, meat, &c., or from the cessation of mechanical labour, 6732. 6738-6742—Inaccuracy of the statement that thirty years ago public-houses might have been open all day on Sunday, 6733-6737. 6756.

Importance of the preservation of a day of rest in each week, though it may with propriety be spent otherwise besides in churches and chapels, 6743—Denial that any serious amount of evil arises in the metropolis from Sunday drinking, 6744—Belief as to there being much private drinking in Scotland on Sunday, 6745—With regard to the influential support given to the Bill by publicans, magistrates, &c. in various towns, this does not affect witness's objection to it, 6747, 6748.

Probable reason for the severe restrictions applied to public-houses; application also to other trades of restrictions and penalties as to the quality of the articles sold, 6749-6751. 6766-6773—Impression that under the Act of 1854 drunkenness increased on week days though it decreased on Sunday, 6752-6755—Opposition made to the Bill of 1854, and inconvenience from its operation, further adverted to, 6757-6765.

Wives and Families (Working Classes). See also Families, &c. Women.

Wolverhampton. Witness considers that the present law is working very well in Wolverhampton, and that the proposed change would cause great inconvenience without any commensurate benefit, Segrave 7325 et seq.—Inconvenience, more especially in the case of the excursionist class, by the proposed closing at ten on Sunday evenings; sundry details hereon, ib. 7327-7330. 7341. 7343-7345. 7435-7449—Great decrease of drunkenness in the town on Sunday in the last ten years; statistics hereon, ib. 7331-7340. 7347-7352—Apathy among the working classes in the town, upon the questions of further restriction, ib. 7353-7358. 7368-7370. 7374, 7375—Dissatisfaction to a large class if Sunday closing were enforced, ib. 7358, 7359.

Explanation of the circumstances under which witness appears before the Committee; statement also as to his mode of appointment and tenure of office, as chief constable, Segrave 7376-7380. 7414-7422. 7531, 7532. 7535—Divided feeling of the local magistrates and other persons of influence upon the question of increased restriction, ib. 7381-7390,

Large number of public-houses and beerhouses in Wolverhampton, in proportion to the population; belief nevertheless that drinking is not excessive either on Sundays or week days, Segrave 7426-7430. 7457-7476. 7493-7495. 7510-7521—Special causes to which an increase of the poor rate in the town in 1867 was owing, ib. 7452-7456—Respectable character of many of those who use the public-houses on Sunday, ib. 7459-7462. 7474-7476—Closing of twenty-five public-houses and beer shops on Sunday out of 500, ib. 7462-7467—Large influx of people to the town on market days, the public-houses being then more extensively used, ib. 7522-7528.

Return submitted by Captain Segrave, containing sundry particulars in reference to the amount of drunkenness on Sunday, App. 429.

Women. Belief that the wives and daughters of the working class would strongly approve of the Bill; it would in fact be a great boon to them, Greig 1241—Favourable opinion opinion of the women in Manchester in regard to increase of restrictions, Palin 1322—

 Unanimity of the women in favour of restrictions, Hall 2517; Jackson 3266, 3267—
 Feeling of women in Scotland strongly in favour of restrictions, M'Laren 2738.

Decided approval of the present Bill by the wives of labouring men, Jowett 3581—
 Very general feeling among the wives of working men in favour of increased restriction, Bushell 4659—Strong feeling of the women in favour of Sunday closing, Howard 4813, 4814—Almost unanimous feeling of the wives of working men in favour of Sunday closing, Steinthal 3821-3824.

Woolrych, Edmund Humphry. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Magistrate of the Lambeth Police Court, 628, 629—Considers that there has been some diminution of late in the number of drunken cases in the Lambeth district, both on Sundays and on week days, 633-636. 672-674. 691-699—Effect of Sir George Grey's Act in leading to a decrease of drunken cases, 637, 638—Opinion that increased restrictions upon the hours of opening of public-houses on Sunday would diminish the cases of drunkenness, but would be attended with evils which would make such restrictions undesirable, 639 et seq.

Great inconvenience to which large numbers of people would be put by the restrictions proposed in the present Bill, 640-646. 663-671. 750-755. 775. 776—Tendency of the proposed restrictions to lead to evasion of the law, and to a system of private drinking, 640.
 647-650. 667—Expectation that increased restrictions would be very unpopular, and would encounter much opposition, though probably some of the working classes would be in favour of the Bill, 652-658. 678. 701-703. 707, 708. 777.

Beneficial effect of restrictions, so far as they have gone, witness considering that to carry them further would do more harm than good, 659-664. 704-707. 714. 730-734 —Objectionable result of the Bill as leading to the working classes indulging in drink in their own houses, instead of in comfortable public-houses, under the landlord's supervision, 665-667. 683, 684. 723-726—Advantage of increased restrictions, as limiting the hours of employment on Sunday, 677.

Experience of witness in regard to the habits of the lower classes in the country, 679-682. 709-713—Limited extent to which the lower classes in the Lambeth district indulge to excess in public-houses on Saturday night or on Sunday; perceptible improvement of late, 685-770—Limited weight attached to a certain statement by the late Mr. A'Beckett, as to the great diminution of drunken cases at the Southwark Police Court on Monday morning, owing to Mr. Wilson Patten's Act of 1854; 715-720—Very large proportion of the cases of crime and destitution coming before magistrates which are attributable to drink, 729—Frequent evasion of the law by beer-houses, it being advisable to place these under the same licensing restrictions as public-houses, 735-739.

Improbability of doubtful interpretation of the first clause of the Act upon the question of travellers in the country being precluded from obtaining refreshment on Sunday, 740-747. 806—Concurrence in the opinion of Mr. A'Beckett that the Act of 1854, though it diminished drunkenness, was not for the public convenience, 748, 749—Latitude in foreign countries in regard to the sale of drink on Sunday, whereas the people abroad are more sober than in England, 757-761—Diminution of drunkenness on Sunday, if the Bill be carried out, the inconvenience on the other hand being very great, 762-766. 775, 776.

Disapproval of the working classes and their families being compelled to drink in their uncomfortable homes on Sunday, or to their being prohibited from drinking in public-houses, 767-777. 802-809—Great inconvenience to excursionists on Sunday if the public-houses were closed at ten, and if refreshments could not be obtainable at the railway stations, 778-783—Legal doubt and difficulty likely to arise in connection with the interpretation of the term "traveller," under the proposed restrictions, 788-799 —Conclusion as to the present Bill being a very extensive change, as compared with previous restrictions, 800-808.

tions as to opening on Sunday, Sir R. Mayne 138, 139. 198-201—Impression as to a large number of the working classes being in favour of further restriction, Ellison 855-861. 868—Belief that a very large majority of the working classes are in favour of total closing on Sunday, Garrett 2216. 2220-2228.

Statement showing the wide-spread feeling among the working classes in London, Manchester, and in numerous other large towns, in favour of the restrictions proposed by the present Bill, Archbishop Manning 2383-2385. 2395—Further evidence as to the desire of the working classes for the proposed restrictions, and as to the expediency of the Legislature giving encouragement and force to the movement, ib. 2417-2423. 2442-2445.

Witness testifies to the strong and general feeling among the working classes in Lambeth and Southwark in favour of increased restrictions on the sale of beer and spirits on Sunday; very large meeting lately held at the Lambeth Baths on the subject, Hall 2505-2516. 2524-2528—Grounds for concluding that throughout the country as in London the great majority of the people approve of increased restrictions, ib. 2520-2523. 2531-2534. 2567, 2568—Further statement as to the wide-spread feeling among the working classes in favour of being relieved from the temptation of spending their money in drink on Sunday, ib. 2563, 2564—Statement that though publicans might organise an opposition to the Bill, they would not be supported by the working classes at large, the feeling in favour of restriction having much grown since the Act of 1854, ib. 2597-2613.

Belief that the great majority of the working classes of England would approve of further restrictions on the sale of drink on Sunday, M'Laren 2827-2829—Belief that the Bill would not lead to any disturbance or violence on the part of the working classes, Steinthal 3747-3751—Almost unanimous feeling of witness's workmen in favour of the principle of the Bill, Howard 4812. 4838-4842—Probable objection to the Bill on the part of working men in London, Freshwater 5009.

Witness considers that the more intelligent and respectable of the working classes would gladly accept the Bill, but that it would probably receive opposition from the lower class of workmen, such as unskilled labourers, &c., Potter 5037. 5040, 5041. 5044. 5114, 5115—Particulars relative to several large public meetings, more especially those held at the Lambeth Baths, at which the working classes have declared almost unanimously in favour of entire closing on Sunday or of further restriction, Murphy 5444-5452. 5595-5608—Belief that the better class of working men are more especially favourable to restriction, and that the present Bill would not provoke any violent resistance, ib. 5464, 5465. 5473-5475. 5631-5634.

Belief that the working classes generally are strongly in favour of increased restrictions on Sunday drinking, if not of total closing, Leicester 5655, 5656. 5675-5679—Evidence in detail showing the feeling of operatives in the glass trade, in favour of increased restriction, ib. 5657 et seq.—Witness has not the slightest fear of any popular resistance to the Bill, ib. 5675—Numerous meetings of working men addressed by witness and others in the New Cut and elsewhere in London on the question of temperance and of Sunday closing, the result showing a very general and growing feeling in support of restrictive measures, ib. 5677-5680. 5771-5776—Desire of many thousands of working men to be protected from the temptation of Sunday drinking, ib. 5713, 5714.

Opinion of the majority of the working men in favour of further restriction; expediency of legislating in accordance with such opinion, as being for the general good, even though some individual inconvenience might be produced, Cockburn 5947, 5948. 5959 et seq.—Feeling of the more respectable working men in favour of increased restriction, McCree 6121. 6150. 6174, 6175—Ready acceptance of the Bill by working men, if not tempted by others into combination against it, ib. 6155-6159. 6174, 6175.

Confidence felt by the working classes that the House of Commons has too much sense to pass a measure so objectionable and unpopular, Morrell 6260. 6468—Denial that there has been any advance of opinion among the working classes in favour of restrictive measures, though there has been a large advance in intellectual culture, ib. 6263, 6264—Exception taken to the evidence of Mr. Leicester as to the feeling of working men in favour of increased restriction, ib. 6418-6421—Satisfaction of the great majority of the working classes with the present law, Aithen 8105, 8106—Several grounds upon which working men strongly object to the present Bill, Henshall 8414-8419.

2. Results of a Canvass of Working Men in various Provincial Towns on the Question of Sunday Closing:

Reference to a house to house canvass of factory operatives in Manchester and other towns as showing a very large majority in favour of the Bill, Archbishop Manning 2383-2385.

2. Results of a Canvass of Working Men, &c.—continued.

2385. 2395—Canvass of numerous workshops at Manchester, &c., the result showing a large majority of the workpeople in favour of total closing, Steinthal 3755-3757.

Return showing the result of a canvass of numerous workshops in the manufacturing districts; very large majority of the men in favour of entire closing on Sunday, App. 424.

3. Particulars in connection with a Canvass of various Workshops in London:

Information relative to a canvass of certain large workshops, &c., in London, there being a considerable majority of workmen in favour of entire closing, Murphy 5432-5435. 5506-5509.

Statement showing the inaccuracy of Mr. Murphy's evidence in regard to the working men in various large establishments having been canvassed, and having for the most part declared in favour of entire closing of the public-houses on Sunday; these establishments, in fact, were not canvassed at all, as reported by Mr. Murphy, Winterbotham 6577—Further reference to the course pursued in canvassing various workshops in London, in order to rebut the evidence of Mr. Murphy, ib. 6592-6595.

Further details relative to the canvass by Mr. Jabez West, of the men employed in certain large establishments, the papers being ready for production, and demonstrating the inaccuracy of Mr. Winterbotham's statement, that in numerous instances there was no canvass at all, Murphy 6901-6904.

Details relative to the canvass by witness of certain workshops in the metropolis, and the steps taken in each case to obtain returns on the question of Sunday closing; inaccuracy of certain statements hereon by Mr. Winterbotham, West 6923-6961.

Particulars relative to the canvass by witness of numerous workshops in the metropolis, some of which were stated by Mr. Murphy to have declared by large majorities in favour of total closing on Sunday; very partial and inaccurate character of the latter canvass as compared with that conducted by witness, which showed very different results, Rowland 6980-7030.

4. Improvement of the Working Classes owing to various Causes, though there is still much Drinking on Sunday:

Improved habits of the people in the absence of restrictive measures, Glossop 1671-1678—Decided advantage of restrictions upon drinking with reference to the physical well-being and the moral habits of the working classes, ib. 1729-1762—Diminution of drunkenness owing partly to the improved habits of the people, Bigge 1986. 1997. 2002. 2058-2072. 2154, 2155—Extensive indulgence of the working classes in drink on Sunday, so that they are constantly unfitted for work on Monday; instances of this, Lupton 3054-3061. 3154, 3155—Exceedingly baneful effect of the opening of public-houses on Sunday, as regards not only the intemperate, but the temperate, members of the lower classes, Jackson 3235-3238.

Witness testifies to the fact that there is a very large amount of Sunday drinking among the working classes in Liverpool and Manchester, Steinthal 3720-3724—Improved habits of the people, and decrease of drunkenness owing to restrictions on the sale of drink and to other causes, Barlow 4051-4055. 4217-4223. 4247-4252—Injurious effect of Sunday drinking as regards the workpeople in witness's employment, ib. 4198-4201—Great improvement of late years in the habits of the working classes, Freshwater 4897-4901. 4905, 4906. 5010-5012.

Great improvement and great decrease of drinking among the better class of workmen in recent years, the improvement, however, not being so marked or so satisfactory in the case of unskilled labourers, Potter 5038. 5042-5044. 5061-5067—Much more temperate habits of the better class of workmen, though there is a Sunday drinking class to which this improvement has not extended, Murphy 5418, 5419. 5568—Excessive drinking by large numbers of working men on Sunday, Murphy 5436-5439. 5476-5482. 5524-5537; McCree 6137, 6138—Improvement among the working classes owing to various causes, McCree 6139-6141.

Statement that the respectable working classes, who form the great majority, are above the temptation presented by gin palaces on Sunday evening, Morrell 6463-6465—Material improvement in the habits of the people in regard to drinking, Winterbotham 6555. 6563—Marked improvement in the drinking habits and in the general conduct of the lower classes, since witness first engaged in business thirty-six years ago, ib. 6599-6609. 6615, 6616—Fallacy of the notion that the improved habits of the working classes and the decrease of drunkenness are owing in any way to restrictions on the sale of drink; other causes to which attributable, Waygood 7033-7048.

Improved education and habits of the people owing to which rather than to restriction, drunkenness has decreased, Segrave 7347-7352. 7370—Great improvement of the people generally, as well as in the matter of drunkenness, Wadhams 8029-8032—Great progress progress and improvement of the working classes during the last thirty years, Aitken 8170.

General and growing improvement in the habits of the people, owing to better education and moral influences of various kinds, Rep. iv, v.

5. Question as to the Expediency of increased Restriction as a Means towards further Improvement:

Great benefit to the working men, if there were a complete break on Sunday, Lupton 3057—Decided improvement of the working classes as regards drinking habits, it being desirable to expedite such improvement by legislation, Howard 4836. 4872, 4873.

Belief that improvement and temperance will be greatly expedited among the labouring classes by increased restrictions on Sunday drinking, Potter 5039. 5044-5048. 5050. 5061-5070. 5101—Admission that a large portion of the working classes are not intelligent; question as to restrictions being desirable for this class chiefly, ib. 5149-5160—More rapid improvement if the Bill be passed, Elliott 5329, 5330.

Improvement of the people under the present system, further restriction not being required, and being a great hardship to many, Henshall 8424-8433. 8451-8456. 8467-8470.

See also the Headings generally throughout the Index.

Wybergh, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.) Is clerk to the justices at Liverpool, 7543-7545—Considers that the Bill before the Committee would cause great inconvenience without any corresponding benefit, 7546-7549—Has no faith whatever in restrictive laws on the subject of the sale of liquors, and doubts very much whether existing restrictions have diminished drunkenness in Liverpool, 7549 et seq.

Statement relative to the sobriety in France and other countries in the absence of restrictive laws, 7563. 7589, 7590. 7598, 7599. 7608, 7609. 7662-7664—Advocacy by witness of free trade in the sale of liquors, 7568-7570. 7582-7585. 7610, 7611. 7669-7674—Evidence in explanation of the practice adopted by the Liverpool magistrates from 1862 to 1866, of granting licenses to all applicants of good character; abandonment of the practice in 1866, several memorials having been presented against the system, 7568-7571. 7612-7645.

Much larger number of offences on the part of beer sellers than of publicans, 7572—Increase of public-houses and decrease of beer shops since 1858, ib.—Much larger number of licensed public-houses in Liverpool than in Manchester, the drunken cases being also much more numerous in Liverpool, 7573-7576—Reference to a canvass in Liverpool on the question of restriction, witness having from the first taken an active part as an opponent of restrictive legislation, 7577-7585.

Approval of Sunday closing by a large number of publicans, 7586—Other causes than restriction to which diminution of drunkenness in the town is owing; an increase of restriction on Sunday is, in fact, no check upon intemperance, 7588 et seq.—Statement on the subject of the much larger proportion of drunkenness in Liverpool than in other seaport towns, 7646-7653. 7702, 7703—Doubt as to the Act of 1854 having produced any decrease of drunkenness, whilst it caused great dissatisfaction, 7655-7661.

Large amount of misery and crime produced by drunkenness, though the worst class of crimes do not proceed from this source, 7675-7680. 7696-7698. 7701. 7704-7707—Importance of improved dwellings for the lower places as a counter attraction to the public-houses; steps being taken in Liverpool towards this end, 7682. 7684-7687—Feeling of the municipality in favour of further restriction, 7688-7690—Further statement that restriction does not prevent drunkenness, 7692—Objection to restriction in order to remove temptation from drunkards, if at the same time the great mass of the people are to be put to serious inconvenience, 7692-7695. 7700.—Expediency of beer-houses being under the same license as public-houses, 7699.

MYLES WILLIAM O'REILLY, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. HENRY WIGHAM, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.] WHAT are you?—I am an founder, Gas Engineer, &c.
2. You are secretary to a certain association, you not?—I am one of the honorary secre-aries of the Irish Association for Closing Public-houses on Sunday in Ireland.
3. Will you state briefly to the Committee what was the state of the law before the Act of 1833, commonly called "Mr. Perrin's Act"?—
Previously to that time, I believe the public-houses were all closed by law, in common with other trades, on the Sunday.
4. What was the scope of that Act, and what its title?—It is called "An Act to amend the laws relating to the Sale of Wine, Spirits, Beer, & Cider by Retail in Ireland;" it is dated the 10th of August 1833.
5. 3rd & 4th Will. 4, c. 68?—Yes.
6. What change did that Act make as to the sale of liquors in Ireland on Sunday?—It legalized the sale of liquors on Sunday after two o'clock, and up to 11 at night.
7. Was a Committee appointed to inquire into the effects of that Act soon afterwards?—
Yes, there was.
8. In what year was that?—1834.
9. What was the Report of that Committee?—
I have not got the Report, but I have selections from the evidence. The date is the 5th of August 1834.
10. It was appointed to inquire into the working of the Act in consequence of the alleged evil consequences of the Act as to drinking on Sunday, was it not?—It was.
11. What Act was passed in consequence of the Report of that Committee?—The next Act which was passed (I do not know whether it was subsequent or not) was the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 38.
12. As a matter of fact, did not that Act diminish the number of hours up to which the sale of 0.55.

liquors on Sunday was allowed?—It did by two hours; they were then saleable from two to nine instead of 11; it limited the hour to nine o'clock.
That was in the year 1836.

13. What is the present state of the law?—
The present state of the law is the same as it was in 1833; it has gone back again to the hours of 2 and 11.

14. When was that change in the law made?
—It was done in the year 1860.

15. What was the Act of Parliament which made the change?—The Wine Licenses Act; I have information from the Dublin police to that effect.

16. Mr. Murphy.] The result of the operation of that Act was that the hours should be extended to 11 again?—Yes, they were altered.

17. That Act had merely reference to wine licenses, but under the operation of that Act it has been construed that spirits and so on can be sold till 11?—A clause in the Act allowing all the trade to remain open till 11.

18. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] That Act restored the Act of 1833 in fact?—Yes, so far as relates to the hours of sale.

19. Chairman.] Up to 1833 the law as to houses for the sale of liquors on Sunday, was the same as with regard to all other branches of the trade; the sale being prohibited on Sunday?
—I believe so.

20. Mr. Murphy.] Have you made inquiries into the state of the law before 1833?—Yes.

21. Can you say how long that state of law existed prior to 1833?—My belief is that it was part of the common law.

22. Are you aware whether the law extended to England as well as Ireland?—I am not aware.
In the report on the inquiry that was made in August 1834, some of the witnesses alluded to that subject, stating that previous to that time public-houses

public-houses were closed altogether on Sunday in Ireland.

23. Will you kindly read any evidence given before that Committee which bears out your view?—There is the evidence of Mr. G. W. Carr, folio 232, section 2763: "Have you had any opportunity of observing the effects of interference in England?—I have just stated that I was considerably shocked to find that there were two sources of intemperance worse in England than any I had witnessed of the same character in Ireland, namely, the legalized drinking of spirits on the Lord's day in England, which, till lately, had not been the case in Ireland; until Mr. Serjeant Perrin's Bill was brought in, the penalty in Ireland was 5*l.* for selling spirits on any part of the Lord's day. Then there is a Mr. White, who also gives evidence, at 3142: "What was the state of the law previous to the passing of Perrin's Act as respects the sale of spirits on the Sabbath day?—They were entirely prohibited selling on the Sabbath day. 3143. This Act afforded facilities for the sale of spirits on the Sabbath day which did not previously exist?—It did as far as I have heard; when this Bill was brought in it was proposed that there should be no sale of spirits on the Sabbath day; but I understand it is the case in England that they can sell on the Sabbath day at certain hours, and to assimilate with the Act for England this clause was introduced which has been the ruin of the Sabbath observance; there could not be a greater misfortune to the city of Dublin, inasmuch that the working classes too often upon that day spend nearly the whole of their last week's earnings, which leads to combination, vice, and wretchedness. 3144. Have there not been various petitions presented to the House of Commons against this Act?—I believe there have been several petitions presented for its repeal on account of its permitting the public-houses to be open on the Sabbath day, and at so late an hour on working days. 3145. Is the chief objection to the Act these regulations regarding the Sabbath day?—Yes, its permitting them to open at all on the Sabbath day." The date of the Report is 5th August 1834. There is also a petition from the Dublin Corporation, praying that that Act, as far as the hours were concerned, might be repealed. I have the petition here.

24. Will you briefly state what were the facts connected with the movement in favour of Sunday closing, taking the question up from the year 1866?—On the 29th of November 1866, a conference on the subject of closing public-houses on Sundays was held in Dublin, where a few of the leading citizens were present; they decided on forming the Irish Association for closing public-houses on Sunday. Their first act was to get up a requisition to the Lord Mayor of Dublin, to ask him to call a meeting of the citizens to consider the subject. That requisition was signed by 600 citizens, including the Archbishop of Dublin, Cardinal Cullen, a number of magistrates, clergymen, &c. A meeting was held in the Mansion-house on the 19th December 1866, the lord mayor in the chair. Resolutions in favour of the Sunday closing of public-houses were passed, petitions to Parliament adopted, and a committee appointed to carry on the movement. The committee then decided to send out circulars, with suggested forms of petition to any gentlemen whom they thought likely to be interested in the subject; to magistrates, clergymen, and others in different parts of Ireland, asking them to petition Parliament. The committee also wrote to Irish Members of Parliament, calling attention to the subject, and a deputation waited twice on the Chief Secretary for Ireland, to call the attention of the Government to the matter.

25. What was the number of the petitions presented in favour of closing public-houses on Sunday?—The number of petitions presented in favour of closing public-houses on Sunday was 560, with 61,342 signatures.

26. Of whom, how many were magistrates?—I believe about 500.

27. To the petition from Dublin, how many signatures were there?—Sixteen thousand five hundred and seventy-four.

28. There was one petition presented from Dublin representing the grocers and spirit-dealers, was there not?—Yes.

29. Signed by how many persons?—Two hundred and thirty-five.

30. What is the total number of grocers and spirit-dealers in Dublin?—More than 1,000.

31. There was rather a remarkable petition from Tullamore, was there not?—Yes, signed by 18 publicans out of 23 publicans in the town.

32. Will you tell the Committee whether any persons were paid for collecting signatures to those petitions in Dublin?—Yes.

33. Were they paid by the day, or by the number of names?—By the day, or by the week.

34. Were any parties paid for getting up petitions in any other part of Ireland?—No.

35. How many petitions with signatures were presented against the Bill?—Only three petitions, with 4,625 signatures, against the Bill.

36. Major Gavin.] Were any of those paid for?—I am not at all aware. There was a petition presented from the Wesleyan Conference assembled at Belfast in July 1867, signed by Mr. Arthur, president, and James Tobias, secretary.

37. Chairman.] A similar Bill to this was carried last year, without opposition to the second reading, and was referred to a Select Committee, was it not?—It was.

38. The proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee was opposed, and it was proposed that it should go into Committee of the House at once for the purpose of being passed; was not that so?—It was.

39. Have you any remark to make on the number of Irish Members who were in favour of referring the Bill to a Select Committee?—The number of Irish Members who voted with Major O'Reilly for immediately going into Committee of the House upon the Bill was 30 against 24 who voted for the referring of the Bill to the Select Committee.

40. Are you able to give the Committee any information with regard to any movement which took place in Dublin for the purpose of voluntarily closing public-houses on Sunday?—There was a movement among a number of publicans in the neighbourhood of Thomas-street and James-street.

41. And I believe that 11 of them agreed to close their houses on Sunday?—Eleven of them agreed to close their houses on Sunday, and five out of the number kept to that resolution, the rest having since given way.

42. Will you be kind enough to look at the return which I now hand you of cases of drunkenness cases made by the police commissioners of Dublin; is a return of the total number of cases of drunkenness in every year from 1862 up to the first half of 1867, is it not?—It is to the 31st of May 1867.

43. Showing the number of cases of drunkenness arrested by the police from Saturday night until Monday morning inclusive?—Yes, up to 0 o'clock Monday morning.

44. What is the total number of cases of drunkenness in the six years?—Seventy-three thousand one hundred and thirteen.

45. How many of those cases occurred on the Sunday, and were brought before the magistrates on the Monday morning?—The number of persons arrested for drunkenness from 7 p.m. on Saturdays to 10 a.m. on the Monday, was 28,353; that is for the five years and a half.

46. Will you have the goodness to refer to the last complete year in that list; namely, 1866, and state what is the total number of cases of drunkenness for that year?—The total number of cases of drunkenness for that year is 11,321.

47. How many of those were Sunday cases?—Four thousand six hundred and eighty-five.

48. What proportion is that?—Nearly half.

49. In that year nearly half the total number of the cases of drunkenness arose between the Saturday night and the Monday morning?—Very nearly half.

50. Is there a considerable diminution in the number of the cases of drunkenness shown in the last two years and a half?—Yes; in the year 1865 the number was 16,192; in the year 1866, 11,321; in the year 1867 (five months) 3,063.

51. That is in Dublin?—Yes, the Dublin police district.

52. Do the Police Commissioners give any explanation at the foot of that return, accounting for the apparent diminution in the number of cases of drunkenness?—Yes, they say that from September 1865, to the present time, owing to the disturbed state of the Metropolis, the police have been very much engaged with other duties, and that their employment in patrolling the streets in pairs would partially account for the lesser number of the prisoners taken up for drunkenness.

53. Mr. Dawson.] May we take that to mean that there is just as much drunkenness as there used to be, only that owing to the engagements of the police it is not so easily made amenable to the law?—I think it might also imply that there is not so much drunkenness, owing to the increased amount of police surveillance over public-houses.

54. Major Gavin.] Can you inform the Committee whether the population of Dublin has fallen off, or the reverse, within the last two years?—Up to the last census there is a considerable increase, but beyond that time, I have no knowledge.

55. Mr. Murphy.] You have stated that prior to the passing of what is called Perrin's Act, in the year 1833, the law restricted the sale of beer and spirits altogether on Sunday?—I believe so.

56. In 1833 Mr. Perrin's Act was passed, allowing the sale of beer and spirits between two o'clock, p.m. and 11 p.m.?—Between two and 11 o'clock.

57. And in 1834 the Committee to which you have referred was appointed, and made its report?—Yes.

0.55.

58. Was that Committee applied for and appointed in consequence of the passing of Perrin's Act?—Yes.

59. With a view to ascertain and report upon what was presumed to be the bad working of that Act?—It was.

60. Are you aware that in consequence of any report from that Committee, Mr. Perrin's Act was in any way altered?—I could not say whether any alteration was made in consequence, but there was a subsequent Act of Parliament.

61. I am referring now to the principle of the total closing on Sundays, and my question is directed to that point, and not to the restriction of the hours of sale; prior to Perrin's Act there was no legal right of sale at all on Sunday, was there?—None.

62. And the Committee of which we have spoken inquired into the operation of that Act and made a report?—Yes.

63. Can you state what was the nature of that report; have you seen it?—I have seen it.

64. Is there anything in that report condemning the operation of Perrin's Act?—I did not see anything of that kind, but I only saw the report incidentally yesterday.

65. The next Act of Parliament is 6 & 7 Will. 4, which limited the sale of liquors to not later than nine o'clock in the evening?—Yes.

66. But was there no proposal at that time to shut up public-houses altogether?—None at all in the Act.

67. Nor in any subsequent Act?—No.

68. You have stated that on the 29th of November 1866 a conference was held in Dublin by a few of the leading citizens upon a requisition signed, and that petitions were got up, and so on; what was the nature of the petition to which you referred?—It was merely a petition to ask the House of Commons to close public-houses during the whole of Sunday.

69. The total closing of public-houses was the object of that petition, was it?—Just so.

70. Did that petition state that no legislative Act would be of any use if it fell short of total closing on Sundays?—I will hand a copy of the petition to the honourable Member (handing in a Paper).

71. The object of the petition is total closing, is it not?—Yes.

72. You have considered this subject very attentively, I suppose?—I have.

73. You are aware of the Bill on which this Committee has been appointed?—Yes.

74. Is it your opinion that the provisions of this Bill as drawn, would have the effect of preventing intemperance on the part of those who were disposed to drink?—I think the Bill would decrease intemperance to a very great extent.

75. In what way?—By lessening the temptation of the people who go in to drink at public-houses, namely, by restricting the hours on which public-houses are opened.

76. Does not the Act permit the sale of liquors at certain hours?—Yes.

77. Do you not think that persons who were disposed to drink, and had opportunities of purchasing drink, would purchase it and consume it elsewhere, although they were not allowed to consume it on the premises?—I think that the great amount of drinking on the Sunday is on the premises; people go in to drink together, not for the sake of getting the drink so much as from convivial feelings; and when they meet in each other's company, they are only too apt to spend all their money.

78. Has it appeared to you at all likely, in the event of this Bill becoming law, that parties who would wish to drink, and might be allowed to drink in a place that would be subject to the supervision of the police, and where the owner of the house, having a license, would be morally bound, for his own sake, to see that no excesses took place, would be apt, if such a Bill as this were passed, to get their drink at the public-house and carry it to private houses; and if that were so, do you think that the temptation to commit excesses would be less than it is under the present system?—I think it would be less.

79. You do not think it would be likely that parties would club together and send out and get drink, and 10 or 20 of them meet in a private house to which the authorities could have no access, and that under those circumstances they would be more likely to commit excesses than in a place which was open to the supervision of the authorities?—Taking the aggregate of the people, I think the likelihood of excess would be decreased, because the facilities for getting the drink would be decreased.

80. The mere facilities for getting it would be exactly the same, would they not?—No; they would then have to send to the public-house for the drink and carry it to a private house, whereas now they have nothing to do but to go direct into the public-house and get the drink, so that there is no trouble whatever.

81. Do you think that it would be beneficial to the public morals, and to the general good of society and the public peace, with reference to that class of persons who will have drink, that those parties should not be subject to supervision while they are drinking?—I think there is greater danger to the public morals from the present system than there would be if the hours were restricted.

82. But if the operation of this Bill engendered the habit of drinking in private houses which are not subject to supervision, is it likely that such a state of things would improve the public morals?—I cannot say as to the morals of the persons themselves, but I think there would be less danger to the public safety.

83. How would the habit I have spoken of be related in your present view to the public safety?—These private drinkers might injure themselves, but in going into public-houses to drink they may meet together and combine, and very often commit acts contrary to law.

84. And could they not do all that in private houses?—Yes, but I do not think they would do it to the same extent that they do now.

85. In the event of their being restricted from consuming the liquor in any place but a private house, you think they would be less likely to commit any excess in such private house where there was no surveillance, than they would be in a public-house where there was surveillance?—I think so.

86. Mr. O'Neill.] Was the meeting held in November 1866, in Dublin, a public meeting?—The first meeting was private.

87. And that meeting adopted the petition which is before us?—No; that was at a public meeting called by the lord mayor.

88. Do you happen to know whether at that meeting there was any alternative proposal taken into consideration. The petition prays that public-houses and beerhouses may be closed throughout the whole of the day, but was there any alternative proposal of a further restriction in the hours?—There was not; the only subject considered was closing altogether on Sunday.

89. Lord Claud Hamilton.] Have you any evidence of the state of public opinion which led to the passing of Perrin's Act?—No, I have not.

90. You come over to give evidence to this Committee on behalf of a society in Dublin; do you not?—To give evidence.

91. You cannot give the Committee the history of what led to the passing of that Act?—No.

92. Have you any evidence, or was there any evidence presented to that conference which showed the deleterious operation of that Act?—There was evidence before the Committee of 1834.

93. But did not that evidence apply generally, and not to Ireland only?—I think it applied to Ireland only.

94. At this conference in Dublin there was a great deal of reference, was there not, to the Forbes Mackenzie Act, and its operation in Scotland?—There was some such reference, but not much.

95. In fact the subject was alluded to?—Yes.

96. Was there not a general expression of a wish to dissimilate the law in Ireland to the law which is established by that Act in Scotland?—Yes; it would come to the entire closing of public-houses on Sunday.

97. I think you spoke as if this movement had been of very recent origin; but in the north of Ireland the Presbyterian and Wesleyan bodies have for many years been agitating the question, have they not, and a great portion of your support came from that source?—A considerable portion, but not exclusively; the movement was quite as much in the south as in the north; the Roman Catholics are very much in favour of it.

98. But the movement in the south is a more recent movement, is it not?—Perhaps it is; in the north the Presbyterians have for many years taken it up as a Sabbath question.

99. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] Can you speak from what you recollect, or have you heard from others what was the state of things previously to the passing of the Act of 1833?—No; I did not live in Ireland at that time.

100. Have you ever heard others speak about it, and say whether there had been more drunkenness before 1833 than there had been since?—From the evidence which was given to that Committee, it would appear that drunkenness increased after that Act was passed; the petition of the corporation of Dublin in 1834 alludes to that fact.

101. Do you not think on the whole, that there is a much greater proportion of migratory labour going all round Ireland now than there was 30 years ago; I do not refer to tramps, but to people in search of employment going about from one place to another?—I could not say: but there has not been a great number of such people coming within my own knowledge.

102. The proportion of migratory labour in Ireland is not so great as it is in England, but persons do go from their native parishes to seek employment, and should you not say that more do so now than did so previously to 1836?—I have have no means of knowing; but for the last 10 or 12 years I think the number of such persons is small.

103. Should you not say the migratory population among the labouring classes was rather on the increase in Ireland itself?—I could not say so from my own observation.

104. But for the moment, supposing that to be so, would not the closing of public-houses on Sunday, at certain hours, be attended with very much greater inconvenience than it formerly would have been attended with?—I do not think it would.

105. If the public-houses are closed entirely on Sunday, how is a poor man going about in search of employment to get any refreshment?—He would have to go to an hotel and get it there.

106. Would not that be a much greater expense to him?—Yes, but it would be expensive for him to go to a public-house, for he would very likely get drunk there.

107. Would it be possible to frame an Act so that beer might be sold on the Sunday without spirits, do you think?—I think not in Ireland, for I believe people do not care much about beer there.

108. Chairman.] You have been asked whether the facilities for getting drink on the premises would not remain exactly the same if this Bill was passed, but they would, in fact, be diminished considerably with regard to the number of hours, would they not?—Yes, certainly.

109. Now, with regard to a question asked you as to whether people who desired drink would not obtain the drink at the public-house, and take it to a private house to consume it, would you agree with me in distinguishing the great body of the community into three classes for the purposes of this committee; first, those who will not drink, whether a public-house is open or not; secondly, those who will drink whether the public-house is closed or not, because they would certainly take the trouble to go and get the drink at the public-house, and take it somewhere else to drink; the third class being those who are not bent on drinking, and would not go far out of their way for it, but who do practise drinking because the temptation of a public-house is at hand?—Yes, I think that is a fair classification.

110. Would you say that whereas the change in the law is not wanted for the second class of determined drinkers, whom we must despair of making sober by law, or having any effect upon, a change in the law is wanted for the third and by far the largest class, namely, those who are not determined drinkers, but whose drinking or not drinking will depend very much on whether the temptation is close at hand or is removed far from them?—I consider that that is by far the largest class in Ireland; the working man is more at liberty on Sunday, and they go into public-houses to drink from social feelings, rather than from any love of drink; it is for the sake of having a little talk and convivial intercourse.

111. Will you be so kind as to inform the Committee in what districts the voluntary closing of public-houses has been carried out; is it not the fact, that in the Roman Catholic arch-diocese of Cashel, by a voluntary agreement, all the public-houses are closed on Sunday?—Yes.

112. The arch-diocese of Cashel embraces all the county of Tipperary, and some parts of other counties?—Yes.

113. And is it not the fact, that in the Roman Catholic diocese of Ferns the public-houses are closed on Sundays by voluntary agreement, in the same way?—Yes.

114. And in the diocese of Kilmore?—Yes.

115. The diocese of Ferns is mainly in the county of Wexford, is it not?—Yes.

116. And Kilmore embraces the county Cavan, and part of others?—Yes.

117. In that district also the population is very much divided between Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, and Church of England, is it not?—Yes.

118. The other two districts are mainly Roman Catholic, are they not?—Yes.

119. Do you know any other instances of towns or places where the public-houses are closed on Sunday?—In the town of Newry, I believe, all the respectable public-houses are voluntarily closed. In Tullamore there are several but not all.

120. Do you know that the public-houses have been closed by voluntary agreement in the town of Carlow?—I have heard that that is so.

121. Mr. Murphy.] You stated you believed that by far the largest class consisted of those who went to public-houses on Sunday for purposes of conviviality rather than for the mere purpose of getting drink, and because they could not go without it; and you distinguished between that class and those who will not drink at all, and again those who must have drink at any cost?—Yes.

122. You stated that the class, whom I will call the convivial class, was by far the largest, and that they went to public-houses because they happened to be open?—Yes.

123. Is it your impression that the convivialists, or those who are actuated by no other feeling than that of ordinary good fellowship, and the desire to spend a pleasant hour or two on Sundays when they are at their leisure, are a class of persons who are highly dangerous to society, or whose fair and natural enjoyments should be restricted by law?—No; but I think there is danger of their drifting into the other class.

124. Has it ever occurred to you that there was a class in another sphere of society, who may also be termed "convivialists," who are members of clubs, and so forth; do you think, abstractedly speaking, that the same kind of restriction should not also be placed upon those persons for fear they might also get into temptation?—I think that people ought not to be allowed to go into clubs from the streets; but if they live in the clubs as they do in hotels, of course a prohibitory law could not be made.

125. But taking the people who go to clubs occasionally on Sunday, do you not think, abstractedly speaking, the same principle ought to be applied to convivialists of that class?—Yes, I think so.

126. Lord Claud Hamilton.] Did you ever know of any case where habits of intoxication arose from the use of these clubs?—I think not.

Mr.
H. Wigham.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER DE GERNON, was called in; and Examined.

Mr. C.
De Gernon.

1868.

127. Chairman.] You are a resident magistrate in Ireland, at present stationed in the town of Tipperary, are you not?—Yes, I have been there for the last four years.

128. What does your district embrace?—A large portion of the county of Tipperary, together with a portion of the county of Limerick, all of which is situated within the Roman Catholic arch-diocese of Cashel.

129. Your district is entirely situated within that diocese, in fact?—Yes, entirely; or if there is any portion out of it, that portion must be very inconsiderable.

130. Since you have been in that district the system of the voluntary closing of public-houses owned by Roman Catholics has been in force the whole of the time, has it not?—It was in force when I went into the district first, and it has continued in force since then, and also some of the Protestant public-houses have acceded to the request to adopt the system.

131. Some of the public-houses which are owned by Protestants are however opened?—I know that some are closed, and I have not heard complaints of any being opened. I cannot, however say that they are all closed.

132. Will you be kind enough to give the Committee a statement of your experience of the working of this system of voluntary closing?—I have been stationed as a stipendiary magistrate in other parts of the country, and when I was sent down to Tipperary I was rather surprised travelling on Sunday, and particularly on Sunday night, to notice the freedom from drunkenness in the roads and villages. I immediately inquired the cause, and it was then I learnt of this ecclesiastical law of the archbishop, called the law against the sale or purchase of intoxicating drinks on Sunday, and to that I attribute a vast deal of suppression of immorality and crime of those kinds which so often take place among even friends in Ireland when they are returning from public-houses. I have known fatal results to occur when people have been coming from places of worship, they go into public-houses, and the slightest thing creates a quarrel when they are excited with drink.

133. Can you answer from your experience the question, whether, whenever a Roman Catholic church is built, some enterprising publican does not run up a public-house as close as he possibly can to the church in order to induce worshippers on leaving to look in at his bar?—If he can get the magistrates to grant him a certificate, he is sure to do it, but the magistrates are very cautious in granting licenses except there are police stations at hand.

134. From your experience as a magistrate, do you think that large numbers of people go into public-houses in Ireland on Sunday after Divine service; at Roman Catholic places of worship, for instance, and also at other places of worship, to which they would not care to resort if the opportunity were not thrown in their way?—I know that to be the fact. During that period of the year when the labourers get good wages (they congregate in towns for the purpose of getting employment), on Sundays there is more intoxication than at any other time of the year, from which the inference is natural that they spend a good deal of money in the public-houses which might be devoted to the support of their families.

135. Do you think from your experience that that class of men would, or would not go and try and get drink in any other way if the public-houses were closed entirely, or only kept open for a short period for the sale of liquors not to be consumed on the premises?—I think generally that they would not do so. The lower orders in Ireland are of a generous disposition, and when they meet a friend they think it only fair to ask him to go in and get some drink, intending to spend 6 d., but the temptation being there they very often manage to spend the whole of a week's hire.

136. Tipperary is a county which, during the late political excitement, has had some amount of disaffection in it, is not that so?—Yes; Fenianism was very general among the lower classes.

137. What effect has the closing of the public-houses had with regard to the entrapping of men into the conspiracy?—The public-house offers great facility for the envoys from America to entrap young men in the villages and towns, and for the concocting of their plots and conspiracies.

138. It has been suggested that there would be an increased danger of such results if the liquor was sold within limited hours, and not to be consumed on the premises, because men might then carry off the liquor to some other place where they would not be under the eye of the police, and would hatch their conspiracy in private more freely; but would you, as a magistrate, responsible for the peace of that district, prefer to take your risk of that result rather than that the public-houses should be open and take their chance of the supervision of the police?—I would; I consider that with the present police system in Ireland, if a conspiracy is carried on in private houses, there is a very fair chance of the police getting a clue to it; but if a conspiracy is carried on in public-houses where every one has a right to enter without being questioned, a conspiracy is much more difficult of detection.

139. Perhaps you would also add that there is far greater chance of entrapping young men into such conspiracies, when they only go into a public-house to have a glass of beer, than there would be of entrapping them if they went into a private house?—Yes.

140. Clonmel is in the diocese of Cashel, is it not?—A portion of it is, but that is not in my district, and I do not know much of it.

141. I have received a letter from a Mr. Burke, a grocer and spirit dealer in Clonmel, who states that he is deputed by the wholesale grocers and spirit dealers, who have also retail licenses in the town of Clonmel, to address me; can you state, from your knowledge of him, that he is a man of such position in the town that his statement on behalf of the trade, might be accepted as expressing their opinions?—I do not know him personally, but from what I have heard of him, I consider him to be a respectable tradesman. I know him by reputation in that capacity, and his uncle was for many years the parish priest of Clonmel, and a most respectable person.

142. Will you be kind enough to listen to his letter to me, which is as follows: "Sir, we have been been deputed by the wholesale grocers and spirit dealers (most of whom have also retail licenses) of this town to bring under your notice what they consider an unjust provision in the sale of liquors in Sunday Bill, which, in conjunction with two other Honourable Members, you have lately introduced in the House of Commons. The Bill proposes to make compulsory the closing of licensed houses, save for an hour or two on Good Friday, and days of public thanksgiving, as well as on Sundays and Christmas day. So far as it relates to the last-named days, the Bill has our hearty approval, for we think the Sabbath should be kept holy by the entire suspension of all unnecessary work, and that the privileges denied to other trades on that day should not be granted to licensed beer and spirit dealers; but it would be manifestly unjust, and opposed to the spirit of free trade, to extend the prohibition to Good Friday and days of thanksgiving, which are not regarded as holidays in Ireland, and have never been distinguished for rioting or dissipation; on the contrary, owing to the penitential season in which it falls, and the working classes being employed as usual, Good Friday has been always remarkable for quietness, and the police returns for that day show few, if any, cases of drunkenness." May we take it that that letter fairly expresses the feeling of the writer's trade in Clonmel, and do you agree in that expression of opinion?—I think that the peasantry of that part of Ireland are not disposed to indulge in liquors, particularly on Good Friday; but the ecclesiastical law in Tipperary, established by the archbishop, does not apply to the holidays of the Roman Catholic Church, and I will inform the Committee of the reason. It appears that a great many of the fairs and markets in the county of Tipperary, and in other parts of the arch-diocese, fall on holidays, and it would be a great hardship on persons necessarily attending fairs and markets to deprive them of refreshments on those days; and I understand that the archbishop who initiated the movement, and whose law it is, considered the hardship it would inflict on such persons, and also thought that it would be prudent to confine the ordinance to Sunday, being aware that it would be impracticable to carry it out on the holidays, and therefore that the whole thing might break down if he tried to do too much. I believe that when Sir Robert Peel was Chief Secretary of Ireland it was suggested to him, when he was about bringing in the Markets and Fairs Bill, that he should in a short clause say, that when a fair fell on one of those holidays (there are not nearly so many of them as there used to be), the fair should be put off to the next day, not being Sunday. Had that clause been introduced into the Bill, it would have enabled the archbishop to make further regulations with regard to the holidays.

143. Then you think it would be a great gain to morality and temperance in Ireland, if fairs which are now held on holidays were transferred to the next working day?—Most decidedly.

144. Can you say to the Committee that that system of voluntarily closing public-houses on Sunday is agreeable to the population of Tipperary themselves?—I am satisfied that it is agreeable to the great majority of them, and I am also satisfied that the very parties who would go into the public-houses and get drunk on Sunday, if the regulation did not exist, are glad to have this restraint placed upon them.

145. Do you think that this voluntary agreement which is enforced in Tipperary could be extended without the aid of the law generally throughout Ireland?—To carry that out, there should be a very harmonious working between the clergy of different denominations.

146. Do you think that, taking Ireland as it is, we could carry out that system by voluntary agreement?—I am not capable of giving sound opinion upon that question. In my own part of Ireland it has been done successfully, but whether it could be done in parts where different classes of clergy share the influence over the population, is a question which would require much consideration.

147. You are aware that the Bill in its present form proposes to allow public-houses to remain open two hours in the middle of the day, and one hour in the evening for the sale of beer and spirits, which are not to be consumed on the premises; which do you think would be the best law to make, taking the country districts into consideration first; do you think it would be better to have the Bill shaped, so as to enforce the total closing of public-houses on Sunday, or to allow them to be open for certain specified hours?—It would certainly be a convenience to many people to have them open for one or two hours in the day, but I think it would be more conducive to the public good to have the restriction made complete on Sundays, except in cases where a medical certificate was produced.

148. Mr. Dawson.] Have you been officially employed in your present capacity in other parts of Ireland?—Yes.

149. From your experience in the diocese of Cashel, there is less drunkenness than in any other portion of Ireland that you know?—On Sundays, much less; in fact, I was remarkably struck with the decrease I observed when I went into Tipperary first.

150. Mr. Chichester Fortescue.] Have you ascertained the fact of that decrease of drunkenness from the police returns?—More by personal observation of the comparative fewness of the number of persons brought up before me on Monday morning in Tipperary as contrasted with other counties, and the general appearance of the country; because I live in the open air as much as I can, and I have opportunities of observing the state of the different parts of the country that I happen to be stationed in.

151. You did not know that county before this system was introduced, did you?—Yes, very slightly; I was there in the disturbances of 1848.

152. But have you reason to know or believe that there has been a marked difference in the county before and since the introduction of this system of voluntary closing?—Yes; I know it from conversation, and from remarks that I have heard from many persons of all persuasions.

153. Does that difference extend beyond the Monday morning into the other days of the week?—On the contrary; I think they are as much addicted to drinking there as they are in any other place on the week-days and other days.

154. You think there is just as much drinking in Tipperary as in other parts of Ireland upon the other six days of the week?—Pretty much the same, I think.

155. Do you think there is more?—No, I would not say more.

156. But not less?—I do not think there is less.

less. It is a curious fact that at times drinking increases vastly for a short space, and that I attribute to wages becoming higher.

157. Eating and drinking both increase when wages are more plentiful, do they not?—We cannot form any opinion with regard to the eating, but we can judge of the drinking.

158. Have you fully considered the danger that might arise under this Bill, of parties assembling to drink in private houses?—I have considered the matter, and I have been consulted by parties on the subject; it has been a topic of conversation; and a person of very considerable experience remarked to me that if parties were prevented from drinking in public-houses on Sunday, they would buy their liquors, and take them home, and set a bad example to their wives and daughters; but my reply to that is, that I have seen wives and daughters go with the men, in order to convoy them home in safety from the public-house, and the result in many cases has been that the whole party have gone home under the influence of liquor from the public-house.

159. Of course, if the assembling of parties in private houses, to drink liquor procured from public-houses, during the open hours of Sunday, were to prevail to any extent, it would defeat the whole of our intentions in the present system of licensing and controlling public-houses, as far as Sunday is concerned?—To a certain extent; but the persons who drink in public-houses have, many of them, no imperative desire to drink at all; but it happens that they can easily show their hospitality by treating their neighbours and friends in public-houses; they do not care to drink in their own houses. The very man whom I have had up before me for drunkenness, when I have asked him, "Cannot you get your drink, and take it home with you?" has said, "We do not care to drink in our own houses."

160. But we will presume, now, that the power of showing hospitality in public-houses is put an end to?—I do not think the people would give their friends whiskey or beer in their own houses; but the restriction we are contemplating might have the same effect as shebeen-houses, though I think the system of police which we have in Ireland is a sufficient guarantee against that being carried on to any dangerous extent.

161. But that means the sale of liquors in unlicensed houses, does it not?—The system was very much carried on formerly, but it has been greatly suppressed by police precautions, though there will always be an occasional house of the kind, no doubt.

162. But the police would have no right to interfere with the drinking in private houses of drink procured from a public-house?—No.

163. And the assembling of parties drinking in the way suggested in private houses would surely have all the bad effect of a shebeen-house without any power of control or prevention existing on the part of the police, is not that so?—I do not think it has that bad effect, because in the shebeen-house they go in and pay for the liquor, while in a private house the individual who owns the house would be showing his hospitality by entertaining his friends; and, I believe, that would not extend to the spending of any great amount of money in general.

164. We are putting suppositious cases only, but supposing drink to be procured to any great extent by a person to entertain others, or by a number of men combining together to get their drink at the public-house and drink it somewhere else, would not all the evils of the shebeen-houses spring up without the police having any power of prevention?—No, I think not.

165. Not if the practice were to spring up to a great extent?—If that practice were to spring up in consequence of the closing of public-houses, the owner of the private house would have the control over his own liquor; the parties entertained would be much less likely to exceed inasmuch as they would be drinking another man's liquor, and not paying for it themselves; the lower class of the Irish, when they have money, are very much given to showing hospitality by drinking with their friends as much as they can.

166. But people might form little clubs to buy whiskey, might they not?—That is a thing that they do sometimes at present.

167. And if that practice were to spring up to any extent, do you not consider that it would be attended with very bad effects?—Decidedly.

168. You spoke of the great opportunities that public-houses had given for the propagation of Fenianism; but that applies to all days of the week, does it not?—Yes, no doubt.

169. While we are now only proposing to deal with public-houses on Sunday?—Yes; but the Sunday is the day on which persons from remote parts of the country come to the towns. Take Tipperary; it is in a central situation, with a wild mountainous district to the south, and another wild mountainous district to the west. People come down frequently from those places on Sundays; and if clever men from America come over and wish to have interviews with the mountaineers, they have more opportunities of doing so on Sunday than on any other day of the week.

170. You think that the closing of public-houses on Sunday would very much diminish the opportunities of which we are speaking?—Decidedly.

171. Have you noticed any perceptible difference in the way in which people spend their Sundays since the closing of the public-houses?—There are a few dance houses that the people go to; they keep a good deal in the hills and the mountains and the valleys; they are also very fond of sport, and they go out into the remote places with greyhounds and mongrels to catch hares.

172. You think that kind of sport has been promoted by the closing of the public-houses on Sunday, do you?—I do not think it has in any way decreased.

173. How do the men of the poorer classes pass their time on Sunday when they cannot go into the public-house?—I believe they pass their time, a good many of them, in walking about, and they get up little dances, and they are very much addicted to the reading of newspapers.

174. In their own houses?—Yes, or at the doors of their own houses; you may see three or four young men with the "Nation," and the papers generally taken in by the lower classes, one reading aloud to the others.

175. Do you think that the closing of the public-houses on Sunday has increased the reading of that kind of literature?—I do not know whether they would read quite so much, though, perhaps, they might if the public-houses were opened, because they can always see those papers.

176. Do

176. Do the streets appear fuller on Sundays than those towns and villages than they used to be?—I had not much experience in Tipperary before this law was introduced; but the streets are very full now of persons coming in and seeking employment; they assemble in the villages, and wait for persons to come in and hire them; the streets are generally full for a considerable portion of the day.

177. Are there any places of entertainment, other than public-houses, where such men can be in?—There are refreshment-houses where they can obtain bread and tea; but they do not pay much for that, particularly for tea.

178. Are refreshment-houses, or eating-houses, distinct from public-houses, very common in the small towns?—They are not as common as you could wish; in fact, they are uncommon.

179. Has there been any tendency to increase their number since this system was introduced?—I think I have observed that the number is increasing, and that there is a greater consumption of fresh meat than there used to be, which I attribute to the quantity I see hanging up in the butchers' stalls in the small villages.

180. From the small size and the badness of their houses generally, the poorer classes of the inhabitants in Irish towns would not be likely to spend their Sunday in their own houses, would they?—I do not think that able-bodied young men and young women would wish to spend the whole day in their own houses, and in fact they could not do it.

181. Have you heard any complaints of the want of places of public entertainment into which persons can go for a part of the day on Sunday?—No; on the contrary all those who have spoken to me on the subject have spoken of a change in terms of congratulation; they all appear to approve of it.

182. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] Do you think that the closing of public-houses on Sunday has led to any increase of card playing on Sunday afternoon?—I do not think it has; there is a good deal of card playing among the lower orders in public-houses, and in other parts of Ireland; there is also a good deal of card playing going

183. Of course the people play for money?—I dare say they do, when they have got it.

184. Would not that lead to a great deal of quarrelling?—Yes, no doubt.

185. Almost as much as taking moderate refreshments at a public-house, I suppose?—No, by no means; the comparison could not be made.

186. You stated that people very often turned to a public-house after coming from their places of worship; are there not a great many people who have to go long distances to their places of worship?—It depends upon where the places of worship are situated, of course; but they are very conveniently placed now; some people prefer going to a large town to chapel to going to a little country chapel.

187. But take four or five miles; are there not a great many people in your district who have to go at least four or five miles to their places of worship?—Perhaps I ought to mention with respect to the law established by the archbishop, that there is an exemption made in favour of those who are staying either in a public-house or in an hotel, and also in favour of travellers; but the distance necessary to constitute a traveller is seven miles, so that if a person travels seven miles to his place of worship he may get a glass of whiskey.

188. Do you think it would be possible to introduce any distinction of that kind into the Act of Parliament?—It would be found very difficult I am afraid.

189. A restriction which has worked very well when carried out voluntarily, might work exceedingly ill when embodied in an Act of Parliament, I suppose?—It is very true; the law has worked so uncommonly well in the county of Tipperary, and the archdiocese of Cashel, that if it could be got to work elsewhere, I think that would be more desirable than secular legislation.

190. There are, of course, many circumstances which apply to the working of the voluntary agreement, which could not apply to the working of an Act of Parliament?—No doubt, but I should say that a publican being a person who is supposed to be licensed by the Government, the law would have considerable power over him, and such a law as that would be supported, I think, by the influence of the clergy of every denomination.

191. Do you think it would be possible for the publicans to volunteer among themselves to sell nothing on Sunday afternoon but beer and provisions, and that such an arrangement could be carried out?—I am afraid not; I am afraid some of them would get to mix whiskey with the beer.

192. You think a voluntary arrangement among the publicans could be made not to give refreshments to anyone who did not come a distance of seven miles; but would it not be just as easy to work a voluntary agreement among publicans to supply no liquor except beer?—Yes, but they have done that in consequence of a very strongly expressed desire of their archbishop, and he has the ecclesiastical power of enforcing his law, and has, in fact, done so; for any persons who infringe the law cannot obtain the sacraments of their Church from the parish priest or curate; they must go before the archbishop himself to receive them.

193. Then if the archbishop was to express a very strong desire to limit the sale of one species of liquor, might not that have the same influence upon them in that respect?—I am afraid they would not draw that distinction.

194. I think you stated that great mischief accrued from people spending a great deal of money on Sundays when they came together, and that the same mischief arose on fair days and market days?—Yes, it is a great misfortune.

195. And yet you would not make the same reasons which apply to the closing of public-houses on Sunday apply to the closing of public-houses on fair days and market days?—It would not be possible to close the public-houses on market days and fair days; the result of that would be, to punish the industrious hard working farmers, in order to prevent certain persons from indulging in too much drink.

196. But does not the same objection apply to the closing of public-houses on Sunday?—It does not apply so much for this reason, namely, that fairs are necessary; the farmers come a long distance, and they require refreshment, while on Sundays such is not the case.

197. You stated, just now, that you believe that many young farmers' sons and labourers were entrapped into fenianism in public-houses on Sundays; do not you think that most of those persons are a very harmless class of Fenians, who take a glass of spirits and a small sum of money in that way?—Yes; but many of them have been led to join in Fenian schemes, and the result has been very deplorable.

198. You justify the closing of public-houses on Sunday, on the same principles as those on which you justify the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act then?—I referred to that topic in answer to a question put to me; I did not volunteer that observation.

199. There is another period at which public-houses are always open, and often do very great harm to the working population, namely, in harvest-time; have you not seen a great deal of money then spent at public-houses which would have been better spent for the household?—Yes; very often the police will have to arrest a man who is helplessly drunk, and when they have got him locked up they find a large sum of money about him. I have known it to be as much as 20 l. or 40 l.

200. Would not some sort of regulation of public-houses, at harvest-time, be justified on the same principle as the restrictions sought to be imposed on Sunday?—I think you could not bring legislation to bear to improve the morals of the people to that extent.

201. But you think it can be brought to bear to the extent of closing public-houses on Sunday?—I think so.

202. Lord Claud Hamilton.] How long has this law, or rule of the archbishop, been in force in your district?—I have been there nearly five years.

203. Did you arrive there when it was already in force, or did the change follow after you got there?—It was in force when I arrived in Tipperary.

204. And you state that you were at once struck with the difference which presented itself between the new district which you now have under your charge, and the one which you had had under your charge some time previously?—Very much so.

205. And you attributed that change to the law of which you have spoken?—I was not aware of the existence of the law at first. I made the remark what a well-ordered district Tipperary was; I saw it on Sundays, and there was less drunkenness and crime there than in any other part of Ireland that I knew; and then I was told that that was in consequence of the law in question.

206. And your experience of the district confirms what you were then told?—Quite so.

207. Do none of the public-houses resist this law, and secretly admit customers?—I know one public-house which is open in defiance of that rule, and I knew another; however, the man who keeps it went to the archbishop and promised to close it, and he has since kept his promise. There is one who keeps open still, but he is a very poor struggling person, who imagined that it was a favourable opportunity for realising a comfortable independence by having the only public-house open on Sunday in a large town. The other person had got his license but a short time before, and was from a part of the county of Limerick that was not within the archdiocese of Cashel; he set the law at defiance for some time, but he has now yielded to the archbishop.

208. Is the one house which is kept open much crowded on Sunday?—It was so during the most active period of the Fenian conspiracy, and the police were forced to have a very sharp eye upon it in consequence of the characters that were seen frequenting it.

209. Have you ever known any practical inconvenience to be suffered by respectable people from the closing of public-houses on Sunday?—Not in my district.

210. You never heard of a case of illness, for example, where stimulants were required, and any deprivation followed from the fact that the public-houses were closed?—No; I take it if a person became suddenly ill, that any respectable persons, clergymen or others, would at once give out whatever stimulants would be necessary upon application.

211. Your experience, in fact, is, that the law has been no injury or inconvenience arising from the rigid application of the archbishop's regulations?—Not in my experience.

212. And that is an experience of nearly fifty years?—Yes, it will be five years in May.

213. With regard to the supposed danger of driving drinking from public-houses into private families, do not you think that the influence of the families, namely, the wives and daughters, a great deterrent from excess of that kind?—At home, in particular, I am sure it is.

214. From the nature of the houses of the lower classes, too, it is scarcely possible for many people to get together for the purpose of drinking, is it?—I expect people would always find room for a sufficient number of people to drink, but I am satisfied of this, that when the wife and daughter accompany a man to the public house for the purpose of seeing him safe out, they often take a little drink, merely because it is offered them, when they would never take it if they were in their own houses. They do it at the public house from a sort of social feeling, and not likely to refuse a person who offers the treat; then a person who is treated wishes to offer a treat to the other, and all that conduces to intoxication. But of course that applies to every day in the week as well as Sunday.

215. You think that all that would not apply to drinking in private houses?—I think not much in private houses.

216. Sir Graham Montgomery.] I understand you to say that you are in favour of the legislation proposed by this Bill as far as it goes, but you would have the restriction carried as far as the total closing of public-houses on Sunday?—I should like to see the ecclesiastical law which exists in the archdiocese of Cashel extended that way.

217. Accommodation for travellers being allowed, of course?—Yes; I mentioned that order to show you that there is no inconvenience suffered by travellers, or by dwellers in hotels and public-houses.

218. Mr. Murphy.] I understand you to say that your opinion is decidedly in favour of the total closing of public-houses on Sunday?—Yes.

219. And that, for the purpose of enabling a good to be done in this particular, you think that is the best, or, rather, the only remedy?—I would recommend that public-houses should be closed entirely on Sundays; but I do not by any means set up my opinion as the best: if more practical men consider that it would be better to have the en for an hour or so, to enable people to fetch their beer home when it was wanted, be it so; at the same time my experience leads me to form an opinion that the total closing of public-houses on Sunday would be the best measure.

220. You mentioned, in a portion of your evidence, that you were aware that at present parties go to club together for the purpose of getting drunk occasionally?—For the last 20 years, in every part of Ireland where I have been, that has been the case.

221. May I ask exactly what you mean by clubbing together?—A number of persons subscribe, and perhaps buy a vessel of porter, containing five gallons, or some quarts of whiskey, and they meet in a house, to drink it, or, in summer, in the open air; and they have a pack of two of cards, and they smoke, and drink, and play. It is a practice that exists in different parts of the country; I do not say it is very prevalent, but I have observed it.

222. Supposing the Bill under consideration were passed into a law, the effect of it would be that parties would have every facility, during certain hours of the Sunday, for buying as much liquor as ever they chose, but they would be prevented from consuming that liquor in the public-house where they bought it. Now, having regard to the fact that, notwithstanding at the present time people are perfectly able to consume their liquors on the premises where they buy it, they do club together, to drink it elsewhere: do you, or not, think that the tendency of such an Act of Parliament would be to create a larger number of these clubs than otherwise?—I think no increase would be very small.

223. But do you not think that the Act would have that tendency?—It might have that tendency, but I think the increase would be very considerable.

224. Do you think, however, that it would not naturally have such a tendency?—The natural answer to that question is, that there must be some people who, not being able to take their drink in the public-house, would buy it, and bring it away, and drink it elsewhere.

225. The object of this Bill is to lessen what I may call the gregarious consumption of whiskey. Now, if under the provisions of the Bill, as it now stands, although the liquor is not allowed to be consumed on the premises, yet if next door to the public-house where it is bought there were a confectioner's shop set up, and a man went in and bought a penny biscuit, he would be allowed to sit there all day, and drink as much whiskey as he liked; do you think that that state of facts would improve the present state of affairs?—I do not think that would result.

226. Do you, or not, think it likely that, if persons were prevented from consuming the whiskey where they wished to consume it, they would resort to the place next door, if they could do it?—I think they would not do that to any great extent.

227. Will you allow me to ask you why that would not be the case?—A great many people who go to drink in public-houses go in to treat their friends, who look upon it as a generous act; they go in, perhaps, with the intention of spending 6 d. or 1 s., and before they come out they will spend all their money.

228. But supposing they have all that facility at a confectioner's shop, would they not go and do the same thing as a generous act?—They do not think so much of drinking at other places as they do of drinking at the public-houses; the public-house is the place where they like to entertain their friends, and they generally have a favourite public-house to which they resort, in the same way as one gentleman will ask another gentleman from the country to step into his club and have luncheon or a glass of wine.

229. But supposing all that to be the case, do you not think that if they could do the same thing next door that they have been accustomed to do at a public-house, they would be likely to do it still?—I dare say it might be occasionally done, but such a custom would not, in my opinion, be followed generally, or to any great extent, at all.

230. Then you are not of opinion that if confectioners were allowed to sell as much spirituous liquors as they pleased next door to a public-house, parties would resort to the confectioners instead of to the public-house?—Yes; if whiskey were allowed to be sold by the confectioners I think they would.

231. And you think that people would then go to the confectioners and treat their friends in the same way as they do at the public-house, on condition that they eat something first?—No doubt, as you say, the spending of a penny would be sufficient.

232. Would not that be substantially the same thing as a public-house, particularly if the confectioner's shop were next door to the public-house?—No, it would not be the same thing; and then again, the magistrates have considerable power over the confectioners' establishments, which are besides very few, and they must all get licenses.

233. That is under the present system?—Yes.

234. But suppose this Bill went to the extent of preventing consumption in public-houses, and left the power in those so-called confectioners' shops, do you not think that, substantially, the same practice would exist as now exists in the public-houses?—I think, to some extent it would, but that would be unavoidable; and I should say that if a law is made to tell against the public-houses, it would be imperfect if it did not embrace those confectioners' establishments also.

235. Is it your opinion that any law whatever to prevent people drinking on Sunday in the place where they had bought their liquor would be effectual, unless it were accompanied by a voluntary determination on the part of the people not to drink on Sundays, such as exists in the archdiocese of Cashel?—I think it would.

236. To any great extent?—I am sure it would.

237. Major Gavin.] With regard to those shebeen-houses, can you inform the Committee whether the number of shebeen-houses has increased in your district since the restriction on the opening of the public-houses on Sunday took place?—Not having been there previously to the existence of the restriction, I cannot make the comparison.

238. I suppose there are such things as shebeen-houses there?—I have obtained hints of them, and I have directed the attention of the police to them; in a very few cases parties have been brought up and convicted, but as far as I know there are not so many of the houses in the district as there used to be.

239. With regard to the dance-houses, are you aware

Mr. C.
De Gernon.

Mr. C.

aware whether liquor is sold in them on Sundays?—At some of those dance-houses I should say it is not consumed or sold on Sunday, but they sometimes come together and bring the beer to the dance-houses and drink it there.

240. But it is not done by the proprietors of the dance-houses themselves?—We generally find that some of the parties at the dance send for the beer, but if it was done by the owner of the dance-house, he would be liable to a prosecution unless he gave it gratuitously.

241. Are you aware of intoxication occurring in those houses to any extent?—I have not heard of any instances of the kind. With regard to the voluntary system too, it is as applicable to shebeen-houses and dance-houses as it is to public-houses; the law is that no person shall buy or sell intoxicating liquors, and without respect to the kind of houses.

242. Is there the same restriction enforced with regard to these dance-houses?—The clergy are on the look out, and they do not wish to see them increase.

243. But they do not put down those that do exist?—There are very few of them; they do not give themselves much trouble about them, but I often pass by those dance-houses and see a number of young men and young women there, and if there was anything going on wrong I would direct the attention of the police to the subject; but it appears to me a very innocent amusement if no mauvais sujets get among them; and, in fact, I rather like to see the young men and young women amusing themselves in that way.

244. Mr. Chichester Fortescue.] Do you mean on Sundays?—Yes, on Sundays.

245. Chairman.] You were asked whether card playing did not often lead to a great deal of quarrelling; would you not think that card playing was very much worse carried on in a public-house than card playing carried on elsewhere; in fact, that card playing with drinking is worse than card playing without?—Yes, of course.

246. You were asked whether it is not impossible to make a distinction with regard to travellers, but are you not aware that that distinction is actually made in an existing English Act of Parliament?—Yes.

247. With regard to the wants of travellers and the poorer classes in Ireland on Sunday, will you inform the Committee what they actually want in the way of refreshment (and not indulgence) on the Sunday. Suppose a labouring man, travelling and looking for work on any ordinary day, would he want beer with his dinner?—Such people scarcely ever drink beer at all as a necessary accompaniment to a meal; beer and whiskey are luxuries to them.

248. Then, as a matter of fact, a traveller of the labouring class in Ireland would not miss the beer or the whisky?—I wish to qualify my last answer; when a labourer dines with his family he scarcely ever takes beer with his dinner, but if he were going into a town he would find it more convenient to take a glass of porter to drink with his meal than anything else; in fact there is nothing else that he can get.

249. You think you cannot draw any distinction between different sorts of liquors to be sold on Sunday?—It would be possible no doubt, but very difficult.

250. You were asked whether the class of Fenians who were entrapped by being treated in public-houses were not a very harmless class now admitting that they are harmless with respect to the State, are they not often very dangerous to themselves, getting occasionally sentenced to penal servitude?—Yes, and I think that the consequence of the facility offered by public-houses for giving that class of men a glass of whiskey or so, is that they are much more easily entrapped into joining conspiracies.

251. And the consequence to themselves may be severe punishment, however little harm they may do to the State?—Just so; many Fenian who have been entrapped into Fenianism in public-houses have been taken with arms in their hands, and have been sentenced to imprisonment and some of them to transportation.

252. Your opinion, in fact, is in favour of total closing on Sunday; but there are two periods in this Bill at which public-houses are to be left open: one is for two hours in the middle of the day, and the second is for one hour in the evening of the day; what would you say with regard to those two periods; do you think that the hour in the evening is adapted for the purpose of supplying ordinary refreshment, such as the habits of the Irish people would lead them to require?—No doubt; it all depends upon the hour that is fixed.

253. The hours are from two to four in the afternoon, and from eight to nine in the evening. Now, first with regard to the eight to nine in the evening, do you think that will be necessary?—I think if you could leave that out it would be better, and I would suggest changing the morning hour for something later.

254. What hour would you suggest if any were to be given?—I would suggest opening at four and closing at five.

255. Or from three to five?—Yes, I think the middle of the day would be the best and the safe period; I mean the afternoon.

256. You were asked some questions with regard to the evil effects of allowing confectioners to sell intoxicating drinks; will you allow me to call your attention to the fact that there is nothing in this Bill allowing any confectioners to sell intoxicating drinks, so I presume you would be of opinion that the evils suggested by you could not arise under the Bill?—Those particular evils could not arise until such an enactment was passed.

257. The exception in this Bill is as follows:—“That, where any person bonâ fide carries on his ordinary daily trade the business of an eating-house keeper, nothing in this Act contained shall prevent such person from selling, or from suffering to be consumed, in the same manner as he might if this Act had not passed, any meat or other victuals for consumption on the premises or any fermented or distilled liquors for consumption on the premises with such victuals, by persons who bonâ fide have purchased such meat or other victuals.” Do you think that is a distinction that it would be possible practically to enforce; do you think, in fact, you can distinguish between bonâ fide eating-house keepers and publicans?—Yes, I think you can; but if the bonâ fide eating-house keeper becomes transformed and if the public-house is shut, it is natural to suppose that many people would go into the eating-house to drink rather than to eat.

258. But the eating house is only allowed to be open for a limited number of hours?—Yes.

259. M.

259. Mr. Dawson.] Did you ever hear any complaint, on the part of travellers, in this archdiocese of Cashel?—The regulation does not apply to travellers; a person who travels seven miles may purchase what refreshment he requires.

260. You have been asked, with regard to the consumption of beer and other liquors, which, I suppose, is very slight compared with the consumption of whiskey?—The consumption of porter and beer has very much increased of late years, and from what I can learn, it is still increasing, compared with the consumption of whiskey.

261. Mr. Chichester Fortescue.] Were you in the county of Tipperary at the time when this ecclesiastical law was first introduced by the archbishop?—No.

262. Are you aware whether there was any difficulty experienced at first in obtaining the compliance of all the publicans with this restriction?—I am not aware.

263. Do the publicans strictly and literally comply with the rule of not selling any liquors to any persons on Sunday?—I think so, except with regard to travellers.

264. And the distinction with regard to travellers is drawn, you say?—Yes; that distinction has been allowed by the archbishop.

265. Is the exception, to your knowledge, largely made use of?—I cannot tell. The exception extends to persons dwelling in a public-house.

266. Are there other exceptions to the rule that you know of?—None.

267. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] With reference to the question put to you upon the sale of beer and porter, compared with the sale of spirits, let me ask whether a man can get as quickly or as mischievously drunk off beer or porter as he can off spirits?—Not to the same extent, I should say.

268. Therefore, any Act of Parliament that will allow beer or porter to be sold when spirits were not allowed to be sold, would be fraught with much less danger to the morals of the people?—Decidedly.

269. Do your experiences of Ireland carry you back previously to 1833?—I was in Ireland previously to 1833, but I had very little acquaintance with it except by rambling, and going about and looking at the scenery.

270. You would have had opportunities of observing people on Sunday afternoons; do you not think that there was at least as much drunkenness on the Sunday afternoon previously to 1833 as there has been since?—My memory does not carry me back so far; but previously to 1840

I had observed as much drinking. Immediately before the time of Father Mathew, I observed more drunkenness than has existed since.

271. But you cannot speak to the time before 1833, when the Act which first allowed public-houses to be kept open on Sunday was passed?—I cannot say.

272. Sir Graham Montgomery.] How many classes of publicans' certificates are there in Ireland; is there but one class, or is there, first of all, a certificate for beerhouses, and then one for hotels, and then one for eating-houses?—The certificate for the sale of spirits is the same to all classes of houses; it is signed by two magistrates, in petty sessions, at one period of the year; and upon that certificate the excise officer grants a license to the publican.

273. A license to keep either one or the other?—A license to sell spirits or beer.

274. Without reference to the kind of house in which he exercises the permission?—Eating-houses, such as confectioners' shops, apply also for a license, and in some cases they get precisely the same license as the publican, on their making a representation that they are about keeping a confectioners' establishment, and the magistrates ascertaining that it is a respectable establishment, and likely to be conducted in a respectable manner, they grant the same license.

275. Mr. Murphy.] Has your official experience been founded by residence in cities or large towns, or has it been confined to country towns?—Chiefly to country towns.

276. You have never been stationed in Cork or Limerick, for instance?—I have been stopping officially in Cork and Limerick.

277. But not permanently stationed in any of those towns?—No.

278. Of course, then, you cannot speak with regard to the practical working of such a measure as this Bill would be in any large town?—No. I have been in Cork as long as for some months.

279. But not more than for a few months at a time?—No.

280. Mr. Stacpoole.] Would you make any distinction in the hours at which public-houses should be kept open on Sunday in the winter and the summer?—That point struck me at the moment when I was giving my answer to the Chairman; and he made up for my oversight by mentioning the hours of from three to five. I think four o'clock would be too late in the winter, and that from three to five would be the best hours that you could select for all the year round.

Mr. EDMUND FITZGERALD RYAN, called in; and Examined.

281. Chairman.] You are a Resident Magistrate in Ireland, at present stationed in the town of Wexford?—I am in a country station at present, but the town is part of my district.

282. Your district embraces the whole of the town, with the exception of the petty sessions district of New Ross?—Yes.

283. That is pretty nearly conterminous with the Roman Catholic diocese of Fernes?—Substantially it is.

284. The same system of voluntary closing of public-houses on Sunday by the Roman Catholics which we have heard described as existing in the 055.

Roman Catholic district of Cashel, exists too in the Roman Catholic diocese of Fernes, does it not?—It does.

285. Will you be so kind as to give the Committee the result of your experience of the working of that system?—The system is carried out very strictly, with a good deal of attention on the part of the Catholic party, and among Protestant publicans also very generally. There are a few exceptions among Protestants who do not follow the rule. However, my experience is that I do not believe that in all Ireland there is a better regulated or better ordered population than the people of Wexford. Since I have been there I never saw a drunken person or a person under the influence of drink in the slightest degree on Sunday. With regard to the habits generally, and the morality and religion of the people of Wexford, I have been in other counties and must say that there is an important difference in their favour.

286. Can you speak of what was the state of things previously to the establishment of this ecclesiastical law?—No; I have been only for a short time in Wexford.

287. But you have had experience in other parts of Ireland, I suppose?—Just so; that law has been in existence now about 10 years.

288. Do you think, from your experience in other parts of Ireland, that where the population is more mixed with regard to religion and other respects than it is in Wexford, it would be possible to carry out this system of the voluntary closing of public houses on Sunday?—I think not. I think it would be morally impossible in large towns and cities that any voluntary agreement of the kind should be come to. Independently of the difference of religion, you have differences in the character of the people, and you have low public-houses whose proprietors would not respect any private arrangements whatever.

288.* I suppose you think that if a small number of publicans were determined to open on Sunday, they would be able to force the others to open too by way of competition?—I do not know that but it would render the whole thing inoperative, because people could resort to the houses which were opened and get their liquor. In the diocese of Fernes the system is carried out on the Roman Catholic holidays as well as on Sundays.

289. Can you supplement that by saying whether or not (I believe it is the case) the practice has been carried out of changing all the fair days which fall on holidays to the next working day?—That has been carried out, and is quite general throughout the country. If a fair falls on one of those holidays of the Roman Catholic church, that fair is held on the subsequent; if a market day, it is held on the day prior; and the public-houses are closed, and the shops of ordinary dealers are also closed on the holidays as they are on Sundays.

290. And that is also due to the influence of the Roman Catholic bishop, is it?—Entirely.

291. It could not be done in any district which was less purely Roman Catholic than the diocese of Wexford; you think it would be impossible in more Protestant districts to fix fair days for the days succeeding the holidays?—Yes, I think so. The bishop had in Wexford a good soil to work upon, and acted with great zeal, and found the people entirely amenable to the influence of the clergy; but in other districts, I think a similar thing would not be practicable.

292. Do you think that change of which we have been speaking, is agreeable to the people themselves?—I can speak not only from observation, but from inquiry. They do not seem to suffer the slightest inconvenience. In place of resorting to the public-house, they are now simply walking about, and so on. I was astonished to see on Sundays the great number of them with their families as I rode through the country. They do not appear to undergo any inconvenience. The publicans themselves are very well pleased with the arrangement, because it gives them a day of recreation which they did not have before.

293. Can you express any opinion with regard to what might be the views of the mass of the people in other parts of Ireland as to closing on Sundays?—I could not venture to express an opinion. I should fancy that at the first stage it would not be agreeable. Until they became accustomed to it, they would find the restriction severe; and perhaps if they were canvassed just now, they would not be found in favour of it.

294. But do you think that if such a law was passed it would be to any large extent evaded, or to what extent do you think that it would be evaded?—I think not to any great extent. I do not think the character of the Irish peasant is one of premeditated drunkenness; I say that in reference to what has been bruited with regard to evasion of the law by buying the liquor and taking it into other houses. I think the law would not be generally evaded by any pre-arrangement for drinking on Sunday.

295. If the public-houses were open for part of the day, for the purchase of liquor to be drunk on the premises, you think people would not to any great extent make a practice of buying the liquor and taking it home for the purpose of drinking to excess?—I believe that if public-houses were open for any portion of the Sunday, it would do away with all the good which the total closing on Sunday has effected. I may add, that for a very considerable time I had formed a very strong contrary opinion. When this matter was mooted by the Association, I was one of those who declined to sign the memorial when it was sent round for the total closing on Sundays. I thought it fair that an opportunity should be given for a few hours on each day for the people at large to get refreshments. I had not then seen the working of the total closing system; but having now seen it as it operates in the county of Wexford, I have changed my opinion, and I have become a convert to the rule of total closing on Sundays.

296. Will you take from me a few facts, and give the Committee your opinion upon them. In the town of Tullaghmore there are 23 licensed publicans, and out of that number 18 are in favour of the total closing on Sunday, while five are unfavourable to it; do you think it would be possible for those 18 to close their houses on Sunday with any good effect on the habits of the people so long as there were five out of the 23 who persisted in keeping their houses open?—I think that if any number were allowed to stay open on Sunday it would not have the same effect.

297. You think that those 18 would say to themselves that they were needlessly losing their profits on that day, while the drinking would be going on as badly as ever, or nearly so?—I do; and it would be a great temptation to the 18 to open their doors again.

298. Do you think that that illustrates what might be an argument in favour of legislation on the subject?—I do.

299. With regard to the wants of travellers, do you think, from your experience in Wexford, that the travellers of the labouring class in Ireland would be exposed to any practical inconvenience in other parts, or that travellers are exposed to any inconvenience in Wexford from their not being able to buy beer or whisky, on Sunday?

Sunday?—I do not think that the travellers of the labouring class would be subject to any serious inconvenience. We have no great amount of travellers in the labouring class. I think, and perhaps I may follow that up, by stating my experience on another point which has been already referred to. I think that the travellers in the labouring class have diminished very much within the last few years. In the county of Galway, where I once served, there was a very large emigration at a certain season of people going to other counties and to England, but that has diminished very considerably.

300. In fact, you think that the class of migratory labourers in Ireland has diminished?—Considerably.

301. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] Since when do you think that the class of migratory labourers has diminished in Ireland?—For the last five or six years it has been steadily diminishing in my opinion, and I might even go back to the last 10 years. It has diminished in proportion to the decrease in the population, and increase in the rate of wages at home.

302. Chairman.] Supposing it was considered necessary to allow houses for the sale of liquors to be open on any part of Sunday, what do you think would be the best limitation to put?—I should say from two to four would be good hours.

303. Should you think that would be sufficient?—Quite. I know another hour has just been named, but the reason why I say from two to four is this,—mass in country districts is over about one o'clock, and any persons coming from a distance would be the only persons for whom I should have any sympathy, and in consideration for whom alone I should be disposed towards allowing the public-house to stand open; but if you keep those people in town until three you keep them too late, while if you say two o'clock they might get home by a reasonable hour.

304. Assuming that it were considered necessary to allow public-houses to be open at all on Sunday, would you consider that it would be more desirable that they should be open for two hours for the sale of drink to be consumed on or off the premises; or to draw the distinction which is drawn in the present Bill, and only allow them to be open for the sale of liquors not to be consumed on the premises?—I had not considered that point before I came into the room, but I should prefer that the liquor should be drunk on the premises rather than off, and my reason is this: I think if you leave the house open for two hours, or for a limited period in any part of the day, the liquor not to be drunk on the premises, you would have a great deal of elubbing together to buy the drink, and drinking it in other places. When parties came out from chapel they would say, "We have only an hour or two, but let us subscribe our money, and take our whiskey out to the fields or to the house, and there we can drink as much as we like." Whereas if they had only two hours in which they can drink on the premises, they would not be able to drink up to any very great amount.

305. Mr. Dawson.] Would you limit the number of licenses in any way with regard to the number of the population, or would you give a license to any one who asked for it?—I am very much in favour of limiting the number of public-houses altogether, instead of giving a license to any one who applies for it; I have been long of that opinion, and my reason for entertaining it is, that if you give a license to every one who asks for it, you make the license comparatively valueless; whereas if you limit it to a certain extent, the person who takes the license is then so much interested in it that he has a real concern in keeping his house orderly and well regulated.

306. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] I believe that the persons who voluntarily join this closing association consider themselves allowed to give refreshment to travellers?—That does not generally exist in the county of Wexford; it is occasionally done, but not generally.

307. Supposing that an Act of Parliament were drawn, would it not be possible to make an exception in favour of the bonâ fide traveller?—There would be a great deal of difficulty about it, but it would be possible; I should be very much in favour of recommending a provision for bonâ fide travellers, but the difficulty is in making it the subject of legislation, because unquestionably heretofore the law has been evaded to a great extent by people going in, pretending to be travellers, and so getting drink, and the police have no means of knowing who they are. Now, the police have the supervision of these houses, and it is their duty to look into them and to see that they are not open during prohibited hours for people who are not travellers; would it not be possible to make some arrangement with the constabulary, such as that they should give a certificate to parties calling themselves travellers, if they were satisfied that the parties were really so.

308. From your experience of Ireland, do you think some legislation of that sort might be worked out honestly?—I do; I think that there would be a greater chance in that way than any other.

309. Can you go back to the state of Ireland in 1833?—I was at school then.

310. But you had your eyes open, I dare say, on what was passing around you?—I could not attempt to offer an opinion.

311. Would you say that there were as many drunken people on the afternoons of Sundays, previously to 1833, as there have been since?—I should be afraid to offer an opinion, for I was not very observant at that time, but I think there was much more drunkenness at a much later period. I might perhaps add here, that I think under the present Act, the Beer Act of 1860, by which public-houses were allowed to remain open until 11 o'clock (before which, under the Act of William the Fourth, they were bound to be shut at nine), much harm has been done. I think those two hours have been very pernicious hours.

312. Mr. Pim.] Do you think that the habits of the people, with regard to drunkenness, or the contrary, have improved within your memory?—I think they have improved.

313. You stated that you thought there should be some limitation with regard to the granting of licenses; is there practically any such limitation in the county of Wexford?—Practically there is, but it is not limited as much as it ought to be.

314. Suppose a respectable man wishes to obtain a license, what is his course of proceeding?—There are different practices in different counties.

315. But take the county of Wexford?—In Wexford they go to the petty sessions, immediately preceding the quarter sessions, or one or two sessions preceding the day of the general quarter sessions, and the same practice prevails in the county of Cork; they apply to the local magistrates in the petty sessions district, and if they are known to be of good character, they get a certificate signed; the publican then issues his notice, and applies upon it to the general quarter sessions. In the county of Cork that certificate is looked upon as an essential matter, and the license is not given, unless a certificate from the magistrates at petty sessions is produced. The matter is considered by the chairman and the magistrates, and if the man is of good character, he gets the license.

Mr.
E. F. Ryan.

Mr.

316. The number of houses in the immediate neighbourhood is not taken into account, is it?—It is sometimes taken into account, but not so generally as I think it ought to be.

317. Do the magistrates look for any certificate from the neighbourhood, stating that a public-house is wanted, or anything of that kind?—That is not required, but the publicans generally get all the influence they can to bear upon the magistrates.

318. Mr. O'Neill.] Where the public-houses are closed completely on Sundays, where do the peasant classes obtain their beverages?—I think they generally go without them; in Wexford, I am aware that some of them are in the habit, on Saturday night, of buying a small quantity of drink and taking it home with them, but others do without it. I am quite of opinion that the Irish are not premeditated drunkards, and that they will not be at the trouble to buy the liquor a day or two beforehand. They are led a good deal by their social habits to go into public-houses, and there is a practice which prevails generally, and leads to a good deal of drunkenness: suppose six or eight, or 10 men met at the corner of a street, or on a bridge, one says to another, "Come in and have a pint of porter, or some whisky." Then they stay in the public-house, and as a man does not like to be treated without treating in return, the challenge goes round to everyone until they have all been drinking.

319. Do you not think that that which is to a certain extent a hardship, namely, that people should have to do without their Sunday beverage in cases where they are of too temperate a character to lay it up beforehand, would be very much obviated by the public-houses being allowed to remain open for two hours during the Sunday?—Of two evils I would choose the least, and I would much rather that the houses were closed altogether; but if it were thought desirable that the houses should be open at all, I would rather the beer should be drunk on the premises, for the reason I have already given, otherwise people might club together, and perhaps drink a great deal in some other place.

320. Do you not think they would probably settle upon a certain sum beforehand, and that they would send to the public-house to buy what they wanted, making only a limited expenditure, for the purpose of drinking at home?—I do not think the people would go into the niceties of calculation; I think they are led on and on to drink when they begin; it is not so much the limited expenditure that I address myself to, for I think it would be a very dangerous thing that they should get into the habit of clubbing together for drinking in houses which would be subject to no supervision. I think it would be a most dangerous thing if there were any conspiracies going on.

321. Mr. Murphy.] With regard to the question you have just been asked as to limiting the expenditure, do you not think that it is very likely that if by preventing the consumption of liquors on the premises, parties who would club together would very soon arrive at the knowledge of how much money each one would have to expend in order to arrive at the desired result?—I dare say.

322. Then they would generally lay in more than they would want, probably?—I dare say they would.

323. You know something about the county of Cork, do you not?—Yes, I was stationed in the county for nearly four years, and know the cities of Cork and Limerick.

324. Now presuming that a law was passed prohibiting the drinking of liquors on the premises, or supposing that a law was passed absolutely prohibiting drinking at all on the Sunday, let me ask you, having regard to your knowledge of the class of persons concerned, do you think they would like to submit to a law legislating for them and not legislating for other parties, who would have just as good a claim to be legislated for; or do you think that a feeling of dissatisfaction in that respect would be created?—In cities I think it would, and, in fact, such a law would be class legislation to some extent.

325. You think it would create uneasiness and dissatisfaction which otherwise would not be created?—I have no doubt that a very large class of people would feel it very keenly; they would say, "A gentleman can afford to go into his club and drink, and he is not prohibited, so why should we be prohibited?"

326. You have given a decided opinion, that if liquors are allowed at all to be purchased on Sunday, it would for every reason be much better that that liquor should be drunk on the premises, where it might be drunk under supervision in a licensed house, rather than in a private house where the authorities would have no power to enter?—I do, although I believe the supervision of public-houses is very limited, unless there are cases of rioting or disorder.

327. Does it not strike you that the fact of a publican having a license, and knowing, as a rule, that if there are two or three convictions against his house for disturbance, it is morally certain that on the next session for granting licenses he will not obtain a renewal of his license, would have a great deterring effect?—Convictions against public-houses are generally for having them open at prohibited hours, and it would be a very wholesome thing if we could get a conviction against a man for allowing people to get beastly drunk on his premises.

328. Do you think it would be a salutary enactment if some provision could be introduced into the Act whereby, to a certain extent, the licensed publican might be made answerable in some way for any excess that he might have been the means of preventing, and did not prevent, in his house?—I think that it would be very wholesome if such a thing could be devised, because we all know that if an unlucky man gets into a low class of public-house (of course there are exceptions), as long as that man has 1s. to pay with, he may go on getting drunk.

329. If it could be proved that a man came to a public-house being undeniably (I will not say drunk, drunk, but) so full of liquor that he did not want any more, and that the publican gave him more, would be very desirable that the publican should be visited with some penalty?—I think it would be a very excellent thing; but it would be said in such a case that the man had got drunk in some other house. We have tried to bring that to bear among the magistrates, but that excuse is made. Still the question has arisen whether it could not be brought under the provisions against keeping disorderly houses. The people always say that the man got drunk before he came into their house, where he had only had, perhaps, a pint of beer.

330. Major Gavin.] Do you think that a well-regulated public-house would do any harm if it were kept open for a certain time on Sundays?—I think it would be better if they were all closed; but if the Committee think it desirable to open all of them during any part of Sunday, I think the liquor should be drunk on the premises.

331. Since you have been in Wexford, I think you said that you had never seen a drunken man on Sundays?—Never, to my recollection.

332. You have been in other parts of Ireland?—Yes, in Middleton in county Cork, and in the county Galway for many years, and attached to my district there was a portion of the county Tipperary.

333. Are the Sundays generally the drunken days?—On week-days the men are at their ordinary occupations, but on Sundays they congregate at their different places of worship; and after that they are some of them liable, unless where this voluntary agreement holds, to go and pass the afternoon in public-houses; so that Sunday may be called the drinking day.

334. Have you ever heard the publicans at Wexford complaining of this rule for shutting up their houses on Sunday?—Never. All that I have spoken to approve of it; and I have heard one man rejoice that he had now a day's recreation which he never had before, himself and his family having been obliged to attend to the customers.

335. You were mayor of Limerick, were you not?—Yes.

336. And you had great experience in that capacity, with regard to public-houses?—Yes.

337. Do you think you could carry out the voluntary system there?—I think that it would be impossible.

338. In Wexford, have you found that dance-houses and shebbeen-houses have increased?—I cannot say that they have increased, because my own experience is limited; the number of shebbeen-houses is very limited; but there is a class of houses that do not come under that name, in Wexford, kept by fruit-women and small dealers, who buy a small quantity of whiskey, never exceeding half-a-gallon, and generally not more than a quart, on the Saturday evening, and on the Sunday they will give a glass of that to any one; they will retail it, in fact; but the shebbeen-house proper is a place where you may go in any day or night, and buy a glass of whiskey, and make a sitting. Still, selling without a license, in small quantities, is a practice which is, to some extent, in existence on Sundays.

339. There is no such thing, you say, as a dance-house in Wexford?—None that I know of.

340. But you have known of their existence in other places?—Yes.

0.55.

341. Have you ever known spirits to be drunk at dance-houses?—Yes; and the arrangement usually made to avoid payment and selling without a license is to sell the ticket for the dance, 1s. for a couple of people, and then they get a tumbler of punch, or a pint of porter each.

342. You are of opinion that the closing of the public-houses in Wexford has not induced people to open those dance or shebbeen-houses to any great extent?—I am not aware of any dance-houses being open at all, or of shebbeen-houses to any great extent; but I believe the closing on Sundays would naturally have a tendency to increase a limited sale among certain individuals, even if there were some shebbeen-houses open; my experience of shebbeen-houses is that their presence is very much to be deplored, but that even as to drunkenness it does not exist in them to the same extent as it does in public-houses; the public-houses can keep and sell any amount of drink, but in the shebbeen-houses the people are subject to a very heavy penalty if they are discovered, and the seller is very often deterred from giving drink from the fear of being found out if he gives too much.

343. Chairman.] You were asked whether legislation for closing public-houses entirely on Sundays would not excite in large towns a feeling of animosity on the part of the labouring classes, upon the ground that they might consider it a kind of class legislation; now clubs are open all day on Sunday; but do you think that the class of persons in whose interest public-houses are partly shut up on Sundays in London feel the law which shuts up the public-houses, and at the same time allows the clubs to be open, as class legislation?—I would not push that point very far. I have no doubt some people would make complaints, but I should not sympathise with that complaint, for the two classes of people are totally different; one of them has position in society and character to act as a check, whereas the others go into public-houses to drink, and we know what happens.

344. There is also this further distinction, is there not, that the primary object of the club is not drinking, the drink being indeed a mere accident, whereas the whole scope and primary intent of the public-house is the supplying of drink; do you not think that people would recognise that distinction?—Yes. I would not push the point at all; but the complaint would be made, no doubt.

345. Do you think that the people of Ireland would feel such a law as a grievance?—I do not think that they would feel that it was a grievance; they would complain of it, perhaps, and draw a contrast, saying that the gentleman could go to his club while the working man could not go to his public-house, but that is all.

346. It has been suggested to you, and you have agreed in it, that it would be very desirable that licensed publicans should be made liable for any excesses that they allowed to take place in their houses; but is it not now actually an offence in towns to supply drink to a person who is in a state of intoxication?—I do not know that there is any Act of Parliament which goes to that length.

347. At all events, there is a police regulation which goes to that length?—Perhaps so.

348. Would it not, in your opinion, be practically impossible to prove such a case unless there were a policeman in every public-house?

—I think I conveyed as much; but if that difficulty could be overcome, that would be very beneficial.

349. You have been asked whether you believe that any complaints have been made by publicans in the county of Wexford on account of this law; what is the position of the gentleman whose letter I hold in my hand, a respectable spirit dealer of the town of Clonevin, near Gorey?—I believe he is a very respectable man, and a man of considerable means.

350. And a man who might be taken to represent fairly the views of his class?—Yes; I should fancy so; he holds a very large farm, and he has got a drapery shop besides.

351. The letter is as follows: "In reply to your inquiry regarding the effect the closing of public-houses has had in my locality, it is now nine years since our respected bishop, the Right Reverend Doctor Furlong, assisted by his zealous clergy, and I must add by the cheerful and generous assistance of the trade in closing the houses on Sundays and holidays, have produced results beyond any man's expectation, at the time it was started. Instead of seeing flocks of young men and women making their way to the public-houses on Sunday evenings, you will now see them attending at vespers, and returning home like Christians, not as heretofore, going into public-houses and stopping till nine o'clock, and then getting home in twos and threes as best they might. I have no hesitation, as far as my opinion goes, of pronouncing the movement you have so much at heart to be the best measure ever contemplated for the benefit of the great bulk of our countrymen, and I must add that I have some little experience of both sides of the question. I was born and reared in a public-house kept by my father, who perhaps kept it as well as any country house; I have kept one on my own account for the last 27 years, and do so still; and every day's experience proves to me that there is nothing would tend to the comfort of the hard-working man so much as to shut up the occasion of temptation, for I know men in my own neighbourhood who spent their wages on Sunday evenings in drink, while the houses were open; and I assert, without fear of contradiction, that those very same men did not spend a shilling a month on whiskey since, and their families are happy and comfortable." May we take that as a fair representation of the opinions of a man who does not differ from the majority of his class in his views?—I do not know that I might go as far as that, but I should agree with it myself, for I know from reputation that the writer is a very respectable man, and I may add that I do not know any place where people attend their places of worship in such large numbers, and so regularly, as the county of Wexford.

352. Major Gavin.] It is a model county, in fact?—It is indeed.

353. Mr. Dawson.] You have said you thought it would be impossible to carry out this voluntary abstention from Sunday drinking in Limerick; on what grounds do you think so?—Where it has been carried out on the voluntary system, it has been carried out through the influence of the clergy of one denomination; that is to say, the Roman Catholic bishops and clergy, but in all large towns there are persons representing every sect; and, again, there are public-houses which are not as properly conducted as those in the rural districts, and the keepers of them would not be subject to the influence of any religious body whatever.

354. Your answer means, I suppose, that in very populous districts it would hardly be possible to carry out this voluntary abstention?—Yes.

355. Mr. Leader.] Would you extend that answer to towns in general?—Yes.

356. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] Are you aware whether the closing of public-houses on Sunday in Wexford has caused any discontent among the labouring classes?—None.

357. Do you think that there is any reason why this compulsory closing should create such discontent?—None; of course some of the people are more displeased than others with it.

358. But you do not think the labouring classes would suffer any inconvenience from such a rule if generally enforced?—I think not.

359. Do you think that any great evil might arise from allowing beer alone to be sold on Sundays?—That might be made a cover for the sale of whiskey.

360. But might it not be a great hardship for the labourer who would like a little beer on Sundays, not to be able to get it on the only day on which he had an opportunity of drinking it perhaps?—In Wexford those who care for beer on Sunday are in a great minority, and they provide it on Saturday.

361. But the beer deteriorates by being kept, does it not?—Yes, there is an inconvenience, no doubt.

362. And you think that if the distinction between the sale of spirits on Sunday were made, it would be very much abused?—Yes, I do; I know cases where a mere beer license has been made a cover for the sale of whisky.

363. And you think the police could not prevent the abuse?—I think it would be impossible; they find it exceedingly difficult as it is to exercise such supervision as they ought to exercise over public-houses.

364. Mr. Pim.] Are the public-houses in Wexford generally small places which would be served by the owners of the house and his family?—Yes, very generally.

365. And not in many cases with hired assistants?—No, except in the towns and larger houses in the county it is as you state.

366. In many cases it is the publican's daughter or wife who serves the customers?—In very many cases.

367. Mr. Murphy.] The bishop's recommendations in the diocese of Ferns are, of course, carried out by the voluntary adhesion of the people themselves?—Yes.

368. Is it your opinion, that if an attempt had been made by the civil authorities to carry out this object by permitting spirits to be sold during certain hours on Sunday, but not to be consumed on the premises (enforcing provisions like those in the Bill in fact), the same result would have taken place?—I do not think so; I think that if liquors were allowed to be sold at all on Sunday, it would do away with a great deal of the present good effects of the rule. If you permit the thin end of the wedge to be introduced, you will open a wide door.

369. You think that total closing is by far the best?—My opinion is, that total closing is the best, but the next best thing is the limiting of the time for sale to the hours of from two o'clock to four.

370. The

370. The liquor to be drunk on the premises, however?—That is my opinion.

371. Major Gavin.] Do you think if a law was passed closing public-houses on Sunday, that it could be carried out as easily at Wexford as it is now carried out by the voluntary agreement which exists?—I could not say, for I did not know Wexford before the voluntary agreement was introduced; but perhaps it would meet your question. I were to say that, as far as Wexford is concerned, I think legislation for closing public-houses wholly on Sunday would weaken the effect which is at present felt in Wexford, because you do not propose to extend your legislation to the holidays which are now regularly and similarly observed there. I fear that if the matter is taken out of the hands of the bishop, and permission is given to open public-houses on the holidays, people will avail themselves of it; still I think that the general benefit to the whole of Ireland would be so great that that should not be taken into the calculation.

372. Chairman.] Is there anything you wish to add to your evidence?—I may add one other ground for my anxiety to see public-houses closed wholly on Sunday, namely, my observation in another district, as to the very great amount of injury that was effected on Sundays in the Fenian movement; I have perhaps been much mixed up in investigating Fenian complaints as any other magistrate in Ireland, and the system which the "Centres," as they were called in Cork, adopted was generally carried out on Sunday. Before Fenianism developed itself fully, those men were furnished with money, they went into public-houses, and Sunday was almost invariably chosen as the day for their operations, because people could more easily be got together on that day; they treated their dupes one by one, then took them into the back yard and swore them, and in nine cases out of 10 they did this on Sunday in preference to any other day of the week. In Wexford, where this system of restraint has existed for 10 years, I believe that there is not, however, one particle of organised Fenianism; there may be sympathisers but there is no organisation, and it will be for the Committee to consider whether that would not be a result of the rule, that drinking on Sunday should not exist.

373. Is it not the fact that in the Rebellion of 1798, this very county of Wexford was more deeply implicated than any other, and that, from the history of that period, we should be led to expect that Wexford would be a more fruitful soil for Fenianism than in any other county in Ireland?—Yes.

374. And yet it is a county in which Fenianism does not exist to any appreciable extent?—Yes, in 1848 disaffection was very rife in particular portions of the county of Wexford, particularly around Enniscorthy.

375. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] Have you heard that absence of Fenianism accounted for by reminiscences and traditions of 1798, keeping alive the horrors of the rebellion in the memory of the people?—I have heard it said that they got so much of it in 1798, that they have not forgotten it since; but that was not stated with any degree of authority, nor do I believe that there was any ground for it.

376. You attribute the result in question more to the closing of public-houses on Sunday, do you?—Yes, and to the good disposition of the people; otherwise, I do not know how to account for it; there has been a great deal of Fenianism in the neighbouring county, which is only separated from Wexford by a river.

377. You believe that in 1848 a great deal of sympathy with rebellion did exist in Wexford, do you?—I have heard so.

378. Major Gavin.] From your experience of Ireland, does it strike you that in Wexford they are more strictly religious people than in any other place in which you have been quartered?—Yes, certainly; remarkably so.

379. Would you attribute the absence of Fenianism in Wexford to their being more religious than in any other part of Ireland?—I do think it is, to a very great extent, attributable to the religious sentiments of the people; who know that no sworn Fenian can be a practical Roman Catholic.

380. Sir Graham Montgomery.] Do you consider that the people have been more attentive to their religious duties since the closing of public-houses on Sunday?—I was not there before the closing of the public-houses on Sunday; but it is only just to the character of the people to mention one fact, that in the town of Enniscorthy, where I have been residing for some short time out of a population of 5,000, there is not one public prostitute to be seen on the streets; I have ascertained that from the clergy and the police, and it is a point which I have not noticed in any other town of the same size.

The Most Reverend Dr. PATRICK LEAHY, called in; and Examined.

Rev. Dr.
P. Leahy

1868.

381. Chairman.] You are the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Cashel?—I am.

382. Will you kindly state to the Committee the steps which you took in the district under your jurisdiction to put a stop to the sale of intoxicating drinks on a Sunday?—I became a bishop just about this time 11 years ago, and since that time till now I have devoted myself to the work of propagating temperance among the people by a variety of ways and means; sometimes by administering pledges of temperance for a long or a short time, according to the nature of the case, sometimes by exhortation as I went through the diocese performing the duty of visitation, but the principal means that I had recourse to for the purpose of enforcing temperance through the diocese, and especially on Sundays, was what we call in our diocese the Sunday temperance law.

383. Will you kindly state what that is?—The purport of that is, that nobody should buy or sell any spirituous liquor on a Sunday in ever so small a quantity.

384. How long has that been observed in Cashel?—I introduced it first by degrees, as I went from one parish to another in the visitations; it was a kind of experiment. I did not introduce it altogether, or at once, till I had felt my way, and made sure that I could induce the people to observe it. I tried it first in one parish, and then in another, until I had gone through the greater part of the diocese, and then I made it a general regulation. I had been trying it two or three years in that way, up to 1861, when I made it a rule for the entire diocese, so that it is now in full force throughout the whole of it, and has been since the year 1861.

385. What are the exceptions with regard to the rule; is there any exception with respect to travellers?—Yes, travellers are exempt from the observance of the rule; they may buy whatever they want, and the vendors of liquors may sell to them; they are perfectly free to sell, and travellers are free to buy. There is another exception, and that is a case of necessity of whatever nature it might be, but I made it a part of the rule that the clergy in their respective parishes should be the judges of the case of necessity. In some cases it would be impossible to refer to the clergy, but, generally speaking, left them to be the judges of the question of necessity.

386. But the public-houses are not kept open for the sale of drinks to travellers, are they?—No, but the keeper of the house is at full liberty to sell to any traveller who applies.

387. How does that work as to ascertain who are really travellers?—That became a practical question which I had to determine for the guidance of the clergy as well as the people. I laid it down as a practical rule that anybody should be considered a traveller who had gone seven Irish miles from home.

388. How is the publican supposed to ascertain that?—He can only take the word of the person who says he is a traveller.

389. Have you found that work satisfactorily?—Most satisfactorily. The law has wrought wonderful change in the moral condition of the people.

390. And you think that drunkenness has decreased in consequence?—Greatly; and principal object which I had in view from the first was not only to prevent drunkenness, but also to prevent the desecration of the Sunday because I must confess that in the towns throughout my diocese most disgraceful scenes used to take place on the Sunday; and it was a principal object with me to prevent that unchristian desecration of the Lord's Day and of the church holidays as well, though I did not annex the regulation to the holidays.

391. I believe I am right in saying that though you only became Bishop of Cashel 11 years ago you have resided all your life in that country?—Yes.

392. Can you state what is the feeling of the people themselves who are affected by this regulation with regard to it?—To my own knowledge the people reckon it the greatest possible blessing to the country, even those who may be injuriously affected by it. Many of the keepers of public-houses have often confessed to myself that it was the greatest blessing to the country at large.

393. What sized towns are comprised in the district?—There is no very large town within the diocese of Cashel and Emly; the principal towns are Thurles, Tipperary, Cashel, and Templemore.

Rev. Dr.
P. Leahy.
26 March

plemore; Clonmel is not in our diocese; the population of Tipperary is, I should say, somewhere about 6,000, that of Thurles about 5,000, that of Cashel between 4,000 and 5,000; the greatest population of any of those towns is about 6,000.

394. Is this law broken through or evaded to any great extent?—Very little indeed. I have had opportunities of finding out almost every individual instance of the violation of our Sunday temperance law; and such violations as came to knowledge were extremely venial, no more than a glass of beer, or something as small as that; but I must add that it is not so well observed in one town in particular. It is with great reluctance that I say anything that would not be to the credit of any one place in particular, but in the town of Tipperary it is not as scrupulously observed as it is in all the rest of the diocese; the cause of that is, that one or two persons open their houses there in defiance of our regulation; and when those houses were opened, there were people weak-minded enough to say, "Here is an opportunity; we will go and have a drink." But, generally speaking, it is very well observed indeed even in Tipperary.

395. What is the case with regard to the public-houses owned by Protestants?—I know of only two houses owned by Protestants throughout the entire diocese; there is one house in Cashel, and the owner of that house took advantage of our regulation when he found that the Catholic owners of public-houses kept their houses closed in compliance with this regulation. I dare say the good man thought it would be an opportunity for him to make some little gain, and from the very first he has kept his house open on Sundays, I must say, to the very great dissatisfaction of all the Protestants of the place, and especially the Protestant magistrates. I was informed the other day, that when in last October he sought a renewal of his license, he could not get any two Protestant magistrates to certify for him. He appealed to the barrister at the quarter sessions, who refused to renew the license, Mr. Rolleston being himself a Protestant. I am informed (I do not know whether correctly or not, but I think so) that Mr. Rolleston renewed his license only on condition that he would not continue to violate the Sunday temperance law. That is the only Protestant house throughout the diocese that I know of that was kept open against the regulation. There is another house where liquor was sometimes got, but so seldom that I do not think it worth while to speak of it.

396. Has the regulation led at all to the practice of people clubbing together and buying liquor on Saturday, for the purpose of having a carouse on the Sunday in private houses?—I think not in a single instance; scarcely anything could occur with respect to the working of the rule that I should not come to know; but in order to enforce it, in my own addresses to the people I have frequently said to them, "You have six days in the week to purchase any liquor you want; if you wish to have good cheer in your families on Sunday you had better purchase whatever you want on the Saturday, and be provided." A very common case of violation of the law was, that a friend would come and the family would have nothing to give him, and that was a venial transgression of the law; but I have often publicly said to the people what I have just now stated, that if they wished to anticipate the arrival of a friend they had better buy whatever they needed the Saturday before; at the same time I generally took occasion to say that they were too fond of laying out their money at fairs and markets, and cared too little about anything like good cheer or comfort in their own houses. I have said to them, "I recommend you, instead of wasting your substance at the fair or the market, to try and have a little good cheer on Sunday with your poor wife and family at home."

397. What is your feeling with regard to the possibility of extending that law throughout Ireland by means of voluntary effort, as in the diocese of Cashel?—I dare say it would be possible by great efforts to do in other dioceses what I have done, but not by any means in all.

398. In some only?—In some only. I am perfectly sure it would be an impossibility to enforce such a regulation as that in cities or large towns.

399. You mean by voluntary association?—Yes, in Cork, Dublin, or Limerick, it would be an impossibility. If I may venture to say what would be prudent or imprudent for another to do, I think it would be most imprudent for a Catholic bishop, or a priest, or a Protestant minister, to attempt to do in those places, by merely moral means, that which we have succeeded in doing in Cashel; and for this reason, that if even half or three-quarters of the keepers of public-houses in those large cities or towns were to come in to the views of the bishop, or the priest, or Protestant minister, and to close their houses on a Sunday, so long as one-fourth of the occupiers of public-houses opened, people would go to those houses, and the violations of the law would be as many as the observances, or perhaps more numerous, and in a very short time it would lose its hold, if it ever had one, on the minds of the people, and would fall to the ground.

400. Have you considered how far it would be possible to do the same thing by law as you do in Cashel; how far it would be observed, and how far it would be agreeable to the people?—Yes, I am perfectly sure that it would be observed if the authorities were only moderately vigilant; a law of the land, enforcing such a regulation as that, would accomplish a great amount of good. It would be powerful to do what could not be accomplished by the unaided efforts of ministers of religion of any denomination, in many cases; where the voice of the minister of religion would not be heeded either by the publican or by the man given to drink, the strong arm of the law would shut the door of the public-house in spite of both the publican and the drunkard. If the secular and the ecclesiastical authorities all through the country were to go hand-in-hand, each supplementing the work of the other, they would be irresistible.

401. Then you do not think that there would be any considerable amount of violation of the law in Ireland?—I think not.

402. Not even in great towns?—Not even in great towns; that is to say, if the authorities were duly vigilant.

403. With regard to the case of travellers and other exceptional cases, would it not be more difficult to provide for them by law than by any voluntary regulation or rule like your own in Cashel?—I dare say it would; you should, I think,

Rev. Dr.
P. Leahy.

think, leave such cases in a great measure to the travellers themselves and the occupiers of the houses.

404. But there is this difficulty, that if we passed a law forbidding the sale of intoxicating liquor to any person except a person who had come seven miles, and it was left to the man himself to say whether he was a traveller, any man almost who wanted to drink would say he had travelled seven miles?—I have not turned over in my mind how an Act of Parliament could be so framed as to touch that case, but this I would say, that what is now put forward is so trifling and exceptional a case, that even if the difficulty could not easily be got over, the prevention of intemperance in all other cases is a matter of such transcendent importance that I would scarcely consider the point of any moment.

405. Is there anything else that you would now like to state?—I do not think that questions and answers could bring out so satisfactorily the circumstances connected with our Sunday temperance regulation as a regular statement of what has been done, and with your permission, I will read a statement which I have drawn up.

406. Will you kindly read it to the Committee?—“While the people of Ireland are as religious and moral as any people in the world, remarkable for attachment to the religion of their conviction, for parental and filial affection, for female chastity and conjugal fidelity—while this is so, it is but too true that, although no worse than their neighbours, they have been too much addicted to habits of intemperance. Father Mathew, it is true, wrought a wonderful change in the people. The effects of his labours survive to this day, and are felt through the entire community. Still he lived to see numbers fall off from the pledge and the practice of temperance; with himself, the strict observance of both, in good measure, passed away, and the people relapsed into their former habits of intemperance, though not to the same extent. The intemperance of the people was aggravated by the unchristian desecration of the Lord's Day and the Church's holidays. Of the seven days of the week the Sunday or the holiday would be selected for indulging in the greatest excess. People would go straightway from the House of God to the public-house, spend the day there in carousals, oftentimes protract those carousals far into the night. Sometimes, too, all would end in very disgraceful scenes in the street or the highway, in drunken brawls, and riots, and blasphemies, not unfrequently in bloodshed. It grieved me to witness or know of such scenes. I felt that he would be a real benefactor to the people, who, like Father Mathew, would help to wean them from such habits of intemperance and their consequent evils, by propagating temperance among them, and, as far as possible, making it a public virtue. Deeply impressed with this conviction, almost from the first day I became a bishop, I gave myself in a special manner to the work of propagating temperance throughout the diocese committed to my care; and my efforts were crowned with success, thanks, under the Divine blessing, to the co-operation of a zealous clergy, who entered heart and soul into my views; thanks also to the people themselves, who hearkened with child-like docility to the voice of their pastor, even when it demanded at their hands self-denial and the sacrifice of a gainful trade. In describing what has been done, it is impossible to avoid alluding to my own share in the work, and that, I hope, will be an excuse for speaking of myself at all. I tried all the ways and means that seemed to me to be practical, both for the reclamation of individuals and for that of the bulk and body of the people. As I went the round of the diocese from parish to parish performing the duty of visitation, seldom, if ever, did I omit to make temperance a subject of exhortation; and I followed up exhortation with the practical work of administering a pledge, sometimes to individuals, generally to large groups of persons gathered around the Sanctuary rail. The pledge was, not to get drunk at any time, and not to drink in a public-house on Sunday. In every parish I sought out, and generally found, persons of intemperate habits, the confirmed drunkard, the habitual tipler, who would seldom or never go to fair or market without wasting his substance in the public-house, the young man just entering on the road to ruin; and I dealt with all according to the nature of the case. I often, too, gave a pledge to females, though not standing in need of it themselves, but because they wished to encourage the men of the family, a father, or a brother, or a husband, to take it and keep it. Thus, in a short time there was a good number of individuals in every parish of the diocese pledged to temperance in one form or another. Even that much was a great gain to public morality. But as the work went on my views became larger. Though the persons pledged for the most part kept their pledges faithfully, yet if any were weak-minded enough to think of breaking it they had the opportunity; the public-houses were open, and the opportunity was a temptation. Then, again, even if all kept their pledges, they were but so many individuals, and it was most desirable to reach the whole community, to bring the whole community under the wholesome discipline of temperance. But how was that to be done? how reach the whole community? Obviously by some rule or regulation of a large and comprehensive nature, that would take in every individual of the community, pledged and unpledged, and to which all would submit as to an authoritative rule of conduct. That was a regulation or law made by the bishop, prohibiting all who recognised his authority to purchase anything spirituous in ever so small a quantity, except in case of necessity. But that was not enough. If there should still be sellers there might be buyers; it was, therefore, necessary to stop the supplies, to shut up the public-house on Sunday; and so I published the regulation called with us ‘The Sunday Temperance Law,’ now for seven or eight years in force in the diocese committed to my care. The temperance law is this: ‘Whoever, unless in case of necessity, of which the clergy in their respective parishes are the judges, buys or sells anything spirituous on a Sunday, in a licensed or unlicensed house, is thereby deprived of the use of the sacraments, by the withdrawal of faculties from the clergy until the person transgressing presents himself or herself to the bishop of the diocese.’ Such is our Sunday temperance law. But it must be added that travellers are exempt, and that the law does not extend to the church's holidays, because public fairs are held on some of them; on which account it would be extremely difficult to enforce the law on those days. It would be most desirable to transfer those fairs to other days.

“What are the means by which we have been enabled enabled to enforce this Sunday temperance law? They are, the authority of the bishop, the co-operation of the clergy, the influence of religion, the people's respect for the ordinances of their church, their reverence for their clergy, their obedience to the word of their bishop; these are the means by which we have enforced the law, which is as well observed as any law of Church or State within the realm; scrupulously and willingly observed by those on whom it imposes the restraint of appetite, and those of whom it requires the sacrifice of a gainful trade. It is wonderful how the people observe it. I ascribe the exact observance of the law in some part, under the Divine blessing, to the constant vigilance with which myself and the clergy have watched over it, although it cost no small amount of care and trouble to do so. Every one transgressing the law had to come to me, even from the most distant parts of the diocese. I gave a personal interview to every one so sent, thinking it worth while to do so, both for the sake of upholding the law, and because that might be the only occasion when the bishop and that member of his flock would meet, and the bishop have the opportunity to say the good word to him, and make a little mission on him. As the interview had nothing of the nature of sacramental confession, I invariably induced the person to tell me in what public-house he had got liquor; and so, when any publican was beginning to take liberties with the Sunday temperance law, by selling, I found it out in limine, and immediately communicated with one of the priests of the parish, directing him to stop the publican at once, by calling upon him, and remonstrating with him. Holding the visitation, too, in every parish of the diocese, in presence of the assembled people, I inquired of the parish priest whether any publican or other person habitually sold liquor, in violation of the Sunday temperance law; and so discovered every transgressor, and brought him to order. These are the means by which the Sunday temperance law has been enforced in the archdiocese of Cashel and Emly."

407. Mr. Dawson.] May I ask you, my lord, what is the extent of your diocese with regard to population?—I could not answer the question with anything like exactness, but you may form some idea of the two dioceses of Cashel and Emly from this, that if you take it one way it is from 40 to 50 miles in extent, while, taken in another way, it is from 30 to 40 miles in extent.

408. Are there any other dioceses in Ireland which are similarly circumstanced with regard to the absence of large towns?—Yes, I am sure there are.

409. When you first made this Sunday temperance law, had you to make many examples of different people, for infringements of the law?—I have never publicly adverted to the name of any person transgressing this law, except on one occasion, though, certainly, on a few other occasions, in making visitations, I have inquired of the parish priest whether there was any publican in his parish who habitually kept his house open on a Sunday, and it sometimes happened that there were a few such persons in the congregation, perhaps two or three; and I generally found them out by saying, "All those persons who have violated the Sunday temperance law by drinking, will come together in this part of the chapel." Then they all came at once, and when I had got them altogether, I would say, "If there is any one among you who has violated the Sunday temperance law by selling liquor, let him put up his hand." The men did so at once, and in that way I found them out. They are really so submissive to anything that the bishop or priest says, and especially the bishop, that you can manage them without difficulty. But it never happened to me to speak of any one person's name, publicly, throughout the whole of the diocese, except once. I should wish to add a few words with respect to the effects of this temperance law: the effects are most happy. Instead of the drunken brawls we used to have in our towns before it came into operation, the carousals by day, and the drunken orgies by night, you have now closed shops on Sunday, and quiet streets; the places of worship are full on Sunday, and the public-houses empty. Any person walking through any of our towns, which used formerly be the scenes of most disgraceful and unchristian brawls, would now feel that Sunday was really the Lord's Day; such is the quiet that reigns in our towns, and rarely is a man ever seen drunk on the Sunday. Were I to look for a corroboration of what I am now saying, I might produce, as witnesses, every man, woman, and child, within the borders of the diocese of which I have charge. For, every one is cognisant of what I am now stating, and every person of every religious persuasion feels happier on account of the great moral change that has taken place in the people. I might also appeal to the returns of the various bridewells throughout the diocese of the committals for drunkenness, which, if they were accurately examined, would present what I would call a decreasing series year after year, marking a corresponding decrease in the amount of drunkenness.

410. How many years has the law now been in operation?—I have stated that I introduced it by degrees during a couple of years, and that then I made it general over the diocese since the year 1861. I have in my hand here, not a fully tabulated return of the committals for drunkenness during the years for which this law has been in operation, but yet a return which is sufficient to show that there has been a gradual decrease in the number of the committals for drunkenness, indicating a corresponding decrease in drunkenness itself. The return is a return of the total committals for drunkenness in the bridewells of Tipperary, Cashel, Thurles, New Birmingham, and Templemore for the years 1860 and 1866, as compared one with the other. In the year 1860 the committals for drunkenness in the town of Tipperary on Sunday were 791, while in the year 1866 they were 323 only, showing a decrease of 468. In Cashel the committals for drunkenness in 1860 were 453, while in 1866 they were 234, showing a decrease of 219. In Thurles the committals for drunkenness in 1860 were 230, while in 1866 they were 141, showing a decrease of 91. In New Birmingham the committals for 1860 were 58, while in 1866 they were only 28, showing a decrease there of 30. In Templemore the committals for 1860 were 133; in 1866 they were 82, showing a decrease of 51. All the figures I have given relate to committals for the Sunday only. I have another distinct return from the bridewell-keeper of Cashel, who from the very first paid great attention to the working of this Sunday temperance law, and has had an opportunity of doing so on account of observing the number of committals for drunkenness that he had every Sunday morning. I wish to state that he was in the bridewell of New Birmingham when first this regulation of ours was introduced; and that for the last three or four years he has been in Cashel. New Birmingham is the centre of a large area of many square miles in extent, the inhabitants of which were certainly remarkable for their habits of intemperance up to the time when this regulation was introduced. It is within the colliery district, and the poor colliers were very much addicted to habits of intemperance. This man told me that on every Monday morning he would have not less than 20 men at least who had been taken up the night before for being drunk, with sometimes the addition of cut heads and torn clothes; but he told me that after the introduction of the Sunday temperance law, things were altered altogether, and that those people became remarkable for their temperate habits as well as all the people around, and that he went so far as to say that he would be for three months without a committal for drunkenness, whereas he used to have 20 on every Monday.

411. Mr. Chichester Fortescue.] You are speaking only of the Sunday at the present time?—Only of the Sunday, and the Monday morning coming immediately after the Sunday.

412. Mr. Dawson.] The whole of those statistics refer, in fact, to the Sunday committals only?—Yes; he gave me the return, which I have in my hand, for Cashel, where he now is in the capacity of bridewell-keeper. The committals are for 1858 and 1867, that is to say, for all the Sundays in the year; and the same is true of the other returns which I have read out.

413. Mr. Murphy.] They are the aggregate of the year?—Yes; for 1858 the number was 522, and for 1867, 184, showing a decrease of 338. He gave me another distinct return for Cashel for 1867, as compared with 1866, and says that the committals were 50 less in 1867 than they were in 1866?—These returns make out very clearly that from the first introduction of the Sunday temperance law, there has been a decreasing series in the number of committals for drunkenness, and of course in the actual cases of drunkenness.

414. Mr. Dawson.] Has the rate of wages been increasing in that diocese?—Yes; a few years ago the working man would be very glad to get 6d. or 7d. a day, but now he may get 1s. 6d. or 2s. a day, according to the time of year, though there is by no means constant work.

415. What is the rate of wages for constant work?—I could not exactly say, but I should suppose that a man in constant work would be very glad to get 1s. a day all through the year.

416. Mr. Chichester Fortescue.] Does an ordinary labourer get more than 1s. a day at harvest time?—I have often had to pay wages myself, and for years I have never paid so little as 1s. a day to a man who was working for me at any time of the year.

417. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] But of course a labourer would be glad to come for 6s. a week, if he was promised work all the year round, would he not?—Yes, if you employed him all the year round.

418. Mr. Leader.] It appears from that return that drunkenness on Sundays has diminished by half, which shows a considerable amount of drunkenness remaining still on Sunday?—It is not considerable, if you take into account the fact that the return is for the whole year: if you divide that number of cases by 52, which is the number of Sundays in the year, it will give you very few cases for each Sunday.

419. Still the proportions are a little less than half what they used to be?—Were the amount of Sunday drunkenness only half what it was before the Sunday temperance law came into operation, I should say that that would be a matter of considerable moment; but the working of the Sunday temperance law is not confined to the number of persons who get drunk, but it extends to the absence of the disgraceful scenes which used to take place on Sunday; if a man gets drunk now he does so in private, and you do not see those exhibitions that we used to witness before in our streets; you seldom or never see a man drunk in the street now; and you have not the same desecration of the Sunday that you used to have.

420. I suppose other bishops in Ireland have communicated with you on the subject?—Yes; we have spoken together on the subject sometimes.

421. Can you give me any reason why they have not adopted the system which you have adopted in Cashel?—You may assume, I think, that what we have done was attended with a great deal of trouble; it required constant vigilance and exertion. If I could speak for my brother bishops, I think I should be pretty right in saying that their reason for not adopting the same plan was, that they were afraid it might prove a failure; and it is undoubtedly better not to attempt such a thing at all, unless it can be made to succeed; it was with me a kind of tentative process, as I passed (or in passing) from one parish to another, until I became sure from my experience of its working, that I could enforce the observance of the law throughout the whole diocese, and the event has proved that I was right in my calculation. I feel pretty sure that the reason why the other bishops have not done the same thing has been, that they apprehended the experiment might not succeed, or that if it succeeded for a short time, it could not be upheld; that, I suppose, was the reason why not more than two or three have made a similar attempt.

422. Do you think that if an Act of Parliament were passed to a similar effect, that that could be enforced by the secular authorities?—I think it would not cost any great difficulty to enforce it, if the authorities were at all vigilant; of course if they neglected their duty, there would be many breaches of the law, but I think such an Act of Parliament would be a great boon to the country.

423. Do you think that it could be carried out in large towns like Cork?—I am perfectly sure it could, if the authorities were only vigilant.

424. Have you ever inquired into the effect in Scotland of the law for closing public-houses on Sunday?—I have seen it stated (it has been stated to me in letters) that the closing of the public-houses in Scotland has led to even an increase of drunkenness, from people providing themselves with liquor beforehand, and then getting drunk in their own houses; but I think that there is a very great difference between the character of the Scotchman and the character of the Irishman. I do not venture to say on which side side the advantage lies, but I think there is this difference between them, that the Irishman is of much more social habits than the Scotchman, and is little inclined to excess, except when he meets a friend to give him, or to get, a treat. I have often spoken to countrymen and to townsmen, who have violated this Sunday law of ours, and have asked them, "Why do you not have a little good cheer in your own house? how is it that it is only when you go out to the fair and the market that you get drunk?" and the answer was that he would not care about drinking at all in his own house; that he has never in his life sat down to drink in his own house, and yet such men may get drunk every day when they go to the fairs or the markets; that is owing to the proverbial hospitality of the Irish character, and I believe that is not the character of the Scotchman, though I do not presume to say which is the better type of character.

425. With regard to the Irish population in Glasgow, which you know is very extensive, have you heard anything of the effect of the Forbes-Mackenzie Law on the morals of the inhabitants of that city?—No, it has never happened to me to hear anything about that.

426. Mr. Stacpoole.] Would it be your opinion that the licensing of public-houses should be regulated at all with regard to the number already existing in the place?—I think there are more public-houses in towns than there need be; if there is any mistake at all, it is that too many licenses are granted, although the magistrates are very circumspect; they are, perhaps, a little more indulgent than they ought to be.

427. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] Were you acquainted with Ireland previously to the year 1833, when the first Act was passed, allowing public-houses to be opened for any part of Sunday?—Yes.

428. Do you think, on the whole, that since 1833, there has been more drunkenness on Sunday afternoons?—I do not think that the Act which was passed closing public-houses up to two o'clock had any appreciable effect on the absolute amount of drinking and drunkenness in Ireland.

429. But previously to that, your public-houses were closed on the whole of Sunday, were they not?—I am not aware. I do not think they were ever closed for the whole of Sunday; but what I do think is, that if you close public-houses on Sunday, leaving them open from two o'clock to four or six o'clock, the same excesses and the same disorders, which I have attempted to describe, would still ensue.

430. But do you not think very great disorders used to ensue previously to 1833?—Yes, and since also. I do not think that the closing of public-houses only for certain hours in the day would have any appreciable effect.

431. Might not a difference arise from this; that in one place the closing on Sunday would be done by an Act of Parliament, and in the other it is the result of voluntary association?—Not at all; I certainly do not think so.

432. Do you think that the rule of abstinence would be as well observed in obedience to an Act of Parliament, as it is when it is done in obedience to a law imposed by the clergy of the people?—Much better, because if you had an Act of Parliament you would then have the law working in concert with the clergy. If we have done good by our unaided efforts, why should we not be able to do more good when we were helped by the law.

433. But you are aware that there are districts in which the religions of the people would be more mixed than in Cashel?—Yes; that is a reason why such an Act of Parliament would be most useful, because although we have been able to do this in our part of the country, yet the influence of the catholic bishops or priests might not in other parts of Ireland be of the same effect; therefore you want something else, and that something else is an Act of Parliament.

434. What should you say of large towns like Dublin and Belfast?—You could not do anything like what we have done—in Dublin, for instance; nothing could arrest intemperance in large towns but an Act of Parliament.

435. If the clergy of other denominations were to co-operate, do you think such results as you have arrived at in Cashel could be arrived at in Dublin, for instance; by voluntary association?—I do not think it would be possible without an Act of Parliament.

436. But if the clergy worked unanimously, and there were an Act of Parliament, you think that that Act of Parliament would, on the whole, be properly obeyed?—Certainly, if there was only a moderate amount of vigilance on the part of the authorities; it would be the duty of the police to enforce the observance of the Act.

437. A former witness, when he was asked with regard to the possibility of making an exception in favour of travellers, said he thought it might be done by means of the constabulary giving a certificate to the person who said that he was a traveller, if they were satisfied that he really was one; should you think such a regulation could be worked without being shirked or abused?—The police are very exact, as far as I can see, in the discharge of their duties. To do them common justice, I must say they are men of high moral principle, and in every way an admirable body; I should have no fear whatever of the result of committing to them to-morrow the performance of such a duty as you suggest.

438. Lord Claud Hamilton.] You stated that among other salutary effects of this Sunday trading law, the places of worship were full, the whisky places empty, and the shops shut; by that did you mean to convey to the Committee that the practice of Sunday trading had been in existence in your district?—There is no such thing with us; it is altogether at an end.

439. Was there such a thing before this Sunday trading law came into existence?—Yes.

440. And Sunday trading has now ceased?—It has ceased wholly.

441. And that you think a great public benefit?—I consider it a great public benefit.

442. You would have had opportunities of knowing whether, what has often been suggested has truth in it, namely, that when public-houses are closed on Sunday, the practice of drinking in private houses necessarily increases; have you any belief that that is the case in your diocese on Sundays?—It has not at all increased, and for the simple reason I gave a while ago, namely, that the Irish people are not in the habit of drinking at home, so that in fact there has been no increase of intemperance in private houses in consequence of the closing of the public-houses on Sunday.

443. You think there is no evidence to show that there is in some cases a store of whisky put by on Saturday for use on the Sunday?—None, and the fact could be easily traced if it were so. I have never met an instance of it in the operation of the Sunday temperance law; on the contrary, I have often and often, as I have already stated, said to the people publicly in the chapels, "I wish you would lay in your liquor on Saturday; you have six days in the week for obtaining what you want; lay it in on Saturday and have it on Sunday, so that if a friend comes to see you you may be prepared for it." It is usually the looking in of a friend that is the cause of any violation of the Sunday temperance law, when it occurs. I ask everyone who violates the law, "Why do you violate it?" and the answer is, "my friend," or "my brother," or "my uncle," or somebody else, "came to me unexpectedly, and I had nothing in the house to give him for a treat."

444. Your experience decidedly goes to show that the suggested danger of increasing habits of intoxication on Sunday at home is quite illusory?—Quite illusory as far as regards Ireland; there is not a shadow of a reason for anticipating any such thing.

445. Mr. Pim.] I think you have shown positively that drunkenness has very much diminished on Sunday in your diocese; can you, my Lord, add that it has been diminished on the other days of the week?—Yes, I am quite sure that the Sunday temperance law not only enforces the observance of temperance on Sundays, but it has had a large effect on the morals of the people; it has had the effect of making sobriety a public virtue on the other six days of the week as well as on the Sunday; it has induced habits of temperance among the people for every day of the week.

446. I take it that there is a corresponding diminution of crime too?—There is a very great corresponding diminution of crime; everybody who knows the habits of the people knows that a great part of whatever criminality can be fairly charged on our people, is traceable to drunkenness. I would say that three-fourths of the crimes they commit are committed under the influence of liquor. If you correct habits of intemperance, you do a good deal towards diminishing also crime of every kind in the country; if such people are addicted to intemperance, you cannot do much good with them. A man of intemperate habits is insensible to what his clergyman says, but wean him from those habits, and you may get them to do whatever you please. It is of the greatest consequence with regard to the public morality of the country to do whatever can be done to put a stop to intemperance.

447. Can you state what the publicans now think of the Sunday Temperance Law; whether they are better pleased with the restriction, or whether you think any of them would like to return to the old state of affairs?—The great mass of them are perfectly willing to make a sacrifice of what is to them rather a gainful trade: they are satisfied with the new state of things.

448. You stated that the trade in drinks on Sunday was at an end; was there, before this law was introduced, any trading in other branches of business, such as grocery and ironmongery?—There is no such thing in our diocese.

449. But was there before you began to apply this Sunday temperance law?—No; scarcely anything was sold in our towns but what you might eat and drink; perhaps something else which might be necessary, but I cannot say what.

450. You are aware that the Bill as it was brought into the House of Commons, does not propose the total closing of public-houses on a Sunday; it proposes, on the contrary, that the public-houses should be allowed to be kept open for two hours in the afternoon of Sunday, and one hour in the evening; do you think it would be better if the Act were to enforce the total closing of public-houses on Sunday?—I think the Bill would be in a great measure inoperative for producing any good if it remained as it now stands; my firm conviction is, nothing but closing public-houses for the whole of Sunday would be of much benefit.

451. Do you think that people would consider the total closing of public-houses on Sunday an undue restriction on their general liberty?—By no means.

452. Of course in that last reply of yours you principally refer to the opinions and feelings of people in the country, but would you say the same with regard to the large towns; might not the people in large towns consider such a law tyrannical?—I cannot say that I am acquainted, and indeed I am not acquainted, with the feelings of the people in large towns, such as Dublin and Cork; but judging of the people of those places from my knowledge of the people in the interior of the country, and I do not think there is any difference with regard to their moral qualities, or at all events, not much difference, I think I may say that although some persons might at first grumble a little, yet, after a while, when they were accustomed to the working of such an Act, all complaints would cease; as soon as ever they saw the beneficial effect of it they would be satisfied.

453. You stated that you did not think people would be likely to purchase drink beforehand for the purpose of carousing on Sunday?—I am perfectly sure they would not.

454. But even supposing they did so, would it not still be a great advantage to the persons employed in public-houses to have a day of rest to themselves?—Yes, surely it would; and even if a man were to purchase drink on the Saturday, in order to indulge in excess on the Sunday within his own doors, I think that drinking to excess at home is not worse than drinking to excess abroad; the person who goes into a public-house and drinks with the companions of his cups, is open to a great many inducements to indulge in excess, from which a man in his own house would be perfectly free; there is the influence of the family, of the virtuous wife or daughter; they would restrain him and say the good word; whereas the companionship, and everything he sees at the public-house, is a temptation to further indulgence. Although it might happen, which I do not, however, believe, that people would lay up liquor on Saturday for Sunday excess, I do not think that that would be at all so great an evil as indulgence in excess abroad, and in the public-house.

455. Sir Graham Montgomery.] I merely wish to ask your Grace whether the legislation against intemperance on Sunday in your diocese extends to the sale of liquors in eating-houses?—In all houses, even to the hotels; but if any one is stopping in an hotel it is his home for the day, and he can get anything he requires just as if he were a member of the family.

456. Mr

Rev. Dr.
P. Leahy.

1868.

456. Mr. Murphy.] You stated that, in your Grace's opinion, nothing but the total closing of public-houses on Sunday would be effectual for carrying out the object that almost every one of us has in view in relation to this question?—That is my profound conviction. I have had much experience in the working of this temperance law, and I think I am warranted by that experience in expressing a very decided opinion on the subject. Sure I am that nothing but the total closing of public-houses on Sunday would be attended with much benefit.

457. From that answer may I presume, having regard to the provisions of the Bill now before the House, which permits intoxicating liquors to be sold on the premises, but which provides that it shall not be consumed on the premises, that you would be of opinion that such a state of things would not carry out the object which your Grace would have in contemplation?—Decidedly not.

458. Has your Grace considered what the effect of permitting liquor to be sold on the premises, accompanied by a prohibition of its consumption on the premises, would have in large towns and cities?—I have not given much consideration to that point, but I should be very much afraid of such a permission; that is to say, I should be afraid that it would not have much effect in preventing intemperance.

459. Would it appear on reflection to your Grace a not improbable state of things that if the prohibition to consume these liquors on the premises were persevered in, you might in all probability, and particularly in large cities, have a practice spring up of men clubbing together, sending in to the public-houses, and buying the liquor, and resorting to some other place in the immediate neighbourhood of the public-house for the purpose of consuming it, that is to say, for those who will have drink?—I think that is natural to anticipate.

460. Under such a state of facts would it be your Grace's opinion that if the privilege of buying the liquor were continued as proposed by this Bill, it would be more advisable for public morals and prevention of excesses, that the parties who were so permitted to purchase the liquor should not be prevented from consuming the liquor on the premises of the owner who would have a license and be accountable for the conduct of the people in his house, into which the police would have a perfect right to enter at any time; do you think that would be a better state of things than that which might arise if the liquor were allowed to be bought but not consumed on the premises, when the people who bought it might resort to houses where they would be under no supervision for the purpose of drinking?—I should say that it would be impossible to carry out the idea of the police exercising such a constant supervision as your question points to; you cannot make people drink by measure or by Act of Parliament; in order that the police should carry out effectually such a supervision, there should be a policeman in every public-house, and that policeman should stay there the whole day; I need not say that for such a purpose as that you would require a very large body of police indeed.

461. But what I wanted to ask of your Grace is this; do you or do you not think that excess would be more likely to be prevented if the persons who were consuming the liquor were aware that they were liable to police supervision at any moment, rather than if they were shut up in a house in which they knew they were not liable to police supervision?—I do not think that a comparison of the two cases arises at all, because if people might purchase the liquor and consume it on the premises, they might also congregate together, and then you would have the two evils together.

462. But do you not think that parties would be much less likely to commit excess when they know they might be watched over at any moment than when they were congregated together in a place where no person had permission to enter?—I suppose the knowledge you speak of might have some little effect in restraining them, but for the working of such an Act of Parliament I would give very little indeed.

463. In fact your Grace's opinion is this, that if the public-houses are to be kept open at all no practical effect would be produced by this proposed change in the law, so far as preventing abuse in drinking on Sunday goes, supposing the liquors are permitted to be sold at all?—I think every measure, short of the total closing of public-houses on Sunday, would be altogether inefficacious, or at least in a great measure inefficacious.

464. Bearing that in mind, and taking it practically, that the operation of this Bill would not tend to prevent abuse (which of course is the object), would you conceive that under that state of things considerable hardships might be inflicted upon those who have embarked capital in these houses, and who would be prevented from selling liquors on the Sunday, or restricted in the sale of liquors on the Sunday, while the Bill which inflicted this hardship would do no good whatever in arresting intemperance?—Of course the Bill would affect their trade, but they must be prepared to make a sacrifice, for a sacrifice there would be to some extent.

465. Major Gavin.] Does your Grace know whether, in your district, there is such a thing as a shebeen house?—I have now and then come to know that there are a few, but they are very few indeed, because I ask every one who is sent to me for having violated the Sunday Temperance Law, "Where did you get the liquor?" and the reply, of course, is in such and such a house; then I ask whether it was licensed or unlicensed, and if it was a shebeen, the fact comes out. I have come to the knowledge, I should say, of not more than three or four of such houses throughout the diocese, certainly, of not more than half a dozen.

466. Your Grace has not found that since the total closing of public-houses on Sunday, these shebeen houses have increased?—They have not; there were just as many before as there are now. I am quite sure of that.

467. Has your Grace ever heard whether such things, as dancing-houses, exist in your diocese?—Very few indeed.

468. Has your Grace ever heard that drinking goes on at any of those dancing-houses?—I have found two or three instances of the kind within the last six or seven years.

469. And there has been no increase of those dancing-houses since you first made your prohibition?—No, indeed; that is owing to the vigilance of the clergy, for they know that they are very bad things, and so strict are they in the prevention of them that they almost invariably subject the person, who goes to a dancing-house, to the painful necessity of making a journey all the way to the bishop, which may be 20 or 30 miles; that is by way of punishment for having gone to these places, and with a view, of course, to getting them shut up.

470. Chairman.] It was pointed out with regard to the returns of committals for drunkenness on Sundays, which you have quoted, that it appeared there were still cases of the kind on Sundays; is it not the fact that many men who get drunk on the Saturday night might be arrested on the Sunday, so that the number of arrests on the Sunday would not actually prove that the cases of drunkenness took place on the Sunday?—I suppose that some of the arrests made on Sunday for drunkenness are the arrests of persons who got drunk on the Saturday.

471. A question has been asked with regard to the injury which might accrue to persons who have invested their capital in public-houses; can you state whether the owners of similar houses generally in Tipperary are less prosperous than they used to be, since the introduction of your Sunday temperance law?—No, indeed; of course they have had to make a sacrifice of some gain; but upon the whole, they do not feel it, and they do not complain of it; they see that the good accomplished is so great, that whatever the sacrifice is, they are perfectly willing to submit to it for the public good.

472. But you have not heard of publicans in Tipperary being ruined on an extensive scale?—Never. I know of no instance of anybody's condition being made sensibly worse by the restriction.

473. Mr. Chichester Fortescue.] I suppose your Grace would say that if the closing of public-houses on Sunday were to lead to any extensive practice of drinking by parties of men in private houses, entirely removed from the inspection and control of the police, that would be a bad consequence of the Bill?—I do not think even that would be so bad as getting drunk abroad, for the reasons I have already stated.

474. Would it not be in effect evading the law under which public-houses are now licensed and now controlled?—An evasion it would be; but even that evil is not at all comparable in magnitude to the evil of getting drunk out of one's own house abroad or in the public-house. Sure I am that the amount of excess committed in people's own houses, if public-houses were shut, would not at all equal what it is where the public-houses are left open; there is, as I have already said, the influence of the wife and daughter at home, while there are no such restraining influences in the public-house.

475. I do not speak of what may be called domestic drinking, but of drinking carried on by a party of persons who may get together in private. Suppose that result were to follow to any considerable extent, would it not be a very unfortunate consequence?—I should not be afraid that that would form an evil of any great magnitude, or an evil that could not be controlled by the authorities.

476. Under our present law the authorities could take no notice of that kind of drinking, because it would be withdrawn from the observation and power of the police, would not that be so?—I should say that it would be very well if it were possible to introduce into the Bill some clause to prevent drinking clubs, such as you speak of.

477. Since the introduction of this regulation in your diocese, has there been a perceptible difference in the appearance of the towns and villages on Sunday?—Yes, a most important difference.

478. How do the people appear to pass the day?—In perfect quietude; anyone would feel now that it was the Lord's day; whereas formerly there was nothing but disorder, drunken brawls, and blasphemy.

479. Do the people appear to pass the day more in the open air than they did formerly?—Yes, they walk about, and go to church.

480. Supposing, then, for a moment, that such an Act, as it is now proposed to pass, were to be made permissive with regard to its introduction into any particular district, so that it could be only made operative in any town or parish by the votes of the majority of that town or parish, would you have any doubt with regard to the course which the majority of the ratepayers in your own diocese would take?—I should have scarcely any doubt; if the introduction of the law were merely permissive it would never be introduced anywhere; nothing but a compulsory law would do.

481. You think that the majority of the ratepayers in the towns and parishes of your diocese would vote against the introduction of such a law?—I do.

482. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] Does your Grace think that the rule might be so far relaxed as to permit beer to be sold on Sunday to be drunk away from the premises?—I should be afraid of opening the public-houses on Sunday; I am altogether opposed to any relaxation.

483. Do you not think that the use of beer is a species of conviviality which might not be likely to lead to much mischief?—I know it would not be so bad as to permit the purchase and drinking of whisky, because the latter inflames people's passions.

484. People could not very well lay in on Saturday the beer they wanted on Sunday, could they, because the beer would spoil by keeping?—No doubt.

485. Would it, in your opinion, be wise to make a relaxation so far as to enable beer to be sold on Sunday to be drunk at home, or do you think it would be possible to enforce a rule like that without abuse?—If permission were given to buy and sell beer, people would buy and sell whisky.

486. Mr. O'Neill.] Does your Grace think that if the closing of public-houses on Sunday were to become the law of the land, your clergy, with the help of the police, would be able to put down the shebeen drinking?—Certainly; we are able to do it as it is, and of course we should be better able to do it with the help of the law of the land.

487. With regard to other dioceses in Ireland, if the clergy used the same influence as is used in your own diocese, you think intemperance could be put down in the same way?—Yes, with the assistance of the law of the land.

488. Mr. Chichester Fortescue.] Will you allow me to ask you this question: considering the perfect success which has attended your efforts to establish this regulation in your diocese, why do you anticipate that the majority of the ratepayers, if it were left to them to decide upon the introduction introduction of the law, would be sure to vote against it?—It is very easy to say why; the people of the country will willingly submit to the influence, and much more the authority, of their religion and their bishop than they would to a mere law of the land.

489. But would not the influence of the bishops and clergy be brought to bear upon the ratepayers to induce them to vote for the introduction of the law?—No; I think the people would be jealous enough of that. If a bishop comes forward and does the thing on his own responsibility, entirely of himself, the people will acquiesce in any rule of conduct that he makes; but if he comes forward simply as the helper of the law of the land, they will be to a degree jealous, I should say.

490. But supposing the case to arise in your diocese, the only question for the ratepayers would be this: shall we make that a law of the land which is already a law voluntarily submitted to by ourselves?—That would be only in my diocese, for the thing is already done there; but in all the rest of Ireland, except two or three dioceses, you would have to address yourself to the work from the beginning.

491. Lord Claud Hamilton.] I understand you to attribute the success of your regulation to your having introduced it by degrees; did I correctly understand your evidence?—No, it is not to that I ascribe the success of it; but I stated that not being quite sure that I should be able to enforce the law, I proceeded tentatively and felt my way: still, it was not to that that I ascribed the success of the movement.

492. Mr. Cubitt.] You said that with regard to this law of yours, you had the support of the magistrates and others, who are members of different communions?—Yes; they have publicly expressed sympathy with, and approval of, this temperance law; and whenever it may lie in their path, in the exercise of their magisterial authority, they sustain it.

493. In your part of Ireland, opinion is more unanimous in favour of Sunday closing than in other parts of Ireland?—Public opinion is undivided, without any distinction of religion, in my part of Ireland. Protestant gentlemen think as much of the rule as Roman Catholic gentlemen, and are as anxious to uphold it, and as publicly avow their conviction of its usefulness.

494. Mr. Pim.] You stated that nothing but the total closing of public-houses on Sunday would be effectual; now supposing that instead of the total closing of public-houses on Sunday, they were prevented from being open after five in the afternoon, do you not think that a considerable advantage would be gained by the removal of temptation in the evening of the day; the whole of the evening being thus secured as a period of rest for the persons employed in public-houses?—Do I understand you to speak of the closing of public-houses after five o'clock, but leaving them open during the previous part of the day?

495. From two o'clock till five, being shut during the previous part of the day. Would you on that supposition in any degree qualify your previous answer, to the effect that nothing but total closing of the public-houses on Sunday would, in your opinion, be effectual; do you not think that some benefit would result from such a degree of restriction as I have spoken of?—The short time in which people would have to drink and get drunk might sensibly affect the total amount of excess committed, but I do not think it would so far affect the amount of excess committed, but that very great evil would still remain untouched by such an Act of Parliament. It might diminish to some extent the total amount of excess on Sunday, but it would still leave such an amount of intemperance that I think such an Act of Parliament would prove to a great degree ineffectual as a means for preventing drunkenness.

Mr. JAMES SULLIVAN, called in; and Examined.

496. Chairman.] WILL you inform the Committee what you are?—I am a Silk Weaver by trade.

497. And foreman to Messrs. Pim Brothers, are you not?—Yes.

498. How long have you been an operative workman yourself in Dublin?—For 27 years.

499. I suppose you are pretty well acquainted with the feelings and customs of the people of which you have raised yourself to be one of the heads?—Yes.

500. Are you a teetotalter?—No.

501. What is your opinion with regard to the desirableness or undesirableness of closing public-houses on the Sunday?—I believe it would effect a great deal of good. I have had the management of a number of men for the last 17 years, and scarcely a Monday passes but a number of them are absent from their work, and sometimes they are absent the following day too; indeed it often occurs for the entire week; the drinking in public-houses with these men generally commencing on the Saturday evening, and I believe if they had not the opportunity of returning to it on the Sunday they would settle down steadily to their work on the Monday morning, but if they get drunk on the Sunday night they are not able to work on the following day; then they have the public-houses to return to again, and on the next day, and sometimes for the whole of the week.

502. Major Gavin.] As long as the money lasts, in fact?—Yes, or as long as the credit lasts; that, of course, leaves their families destitute or in want.

503. Chairman.] Of course there are some sober, steady men, who will not drink whether the public-houses are open or not?—Many.

504. And there are some determined drunkards?—There are some, but that class are the fewest in number.

505. Supposing the public-houses were closed, what do you think would be the result with regard to determined drunkards; do you think they would lay in a stock of drink on the Saturday?—I think not.

506. Is there not a large class of people who are not determined drinkers, and who do not particularly want drink, but who, if the public-house is open, are not strong enough to resist the temptation which is presented to them?—There are a large number of people who would not go into a public-house under any circumstances, and there are others who would not go in at all, only that perhaps they meet a friend who induces them to go in and have a glass of beer or something else; and then there is another glass and so on, till they all get intoxicated. I feel that if the temptations were not put in their way those men would not drink.

507. What is your opinion of the wishes, generally, of working men in Dublin; do you think they would rather the public-houses were shut or open?—I believe that the general opinion on the matter is that to shut them up would be a sort of class legislation; still I think that if the public-houses were shut up that feeling would pass away, and that the working classes would be perfectly satisfied after a time.

508. Do you think that the working men want the public-houses open on Sunday, in order that they may obtain drink for their meals; do they generally take beer with their meals?—Yes; generally on Sunday at dinner.

509. What would they do if the public-houses were shut on Sunday?—They could provide themselves on Saturday with half a dozen bottles of porter if they wish it.

510. You do not think that they would find that inconvenient?—No, I should think not.

511. You say that they generally take beer with their dinner on Sunday; do they want it again for supper on Sunday?—It is not customary to take suppers in Dublin.

512. In your opinion is drinking increasing, or diminishing, among the working men of Dublin?—I think it is increasing.

513. What makes you think so?—It is my own observation from my youth. I think there is a vast difference between what there was 20 or 30 years ago, and what there is now; it was then a rare thing to see boys frequenting public-houses, and now it is a common thing with boys, from 15 years old upwards; you find them in different parts of the city on Sunday morning, particularly in the Earl of Meath's Liberties where I reside, and you find them in the public-houses spending what they get from their parents out of their small wages for the week's work; if there were no public-houses to go to they would spend their Sundays in a different manner.

514. Where do you think the working men and boys would pass their Sundays if the public-houses were not open?—In fine weather there is the Phoenix Park, and there are several other nice places, where they can enjoy themselves, and walk and sit.

515. And in the winter, I suppose, they might stop at home?—In the winter they might stop at home, or go to their places of worship, then come home and sit for an hour or two, and then go to bed.

516. Do you, or do you not, think that the working men, as a class, would feel that the only comfortable place for passing the Sunday was shut up, if the public-houses were closed?—A portion of them would think so, but some would think otherwise.

517. Do you think that any inconvenience would be felt by young men and others living in Dublin away from their families, if all the eating-houses were closed on Sunday for the sale of drink?—I think they would be very little inconvenienced, and that the amount of good to be effected would counterbalance the inconvenience that a few people might suffer from the closing of those places.

518. You do not think there is a large class of working men, or men just above the working class, who are dependent upon public-houses and eating-houses for their meals on Sunday?—Certainly not.

519. Do you think that any great inconvenience would be felt by the people who might be considered travellers, coming from a distance, and being able to get nothing to drink?—There would be great inconvenience, of course, if a man came in from Liverpool, for instance, and wished some refreshment; no doubt he would think it a great hardship if he could not get it.

520. But that is not a large class, I suppose?—No, not on Sundays, certainly.

521. Is it much the practice for the working classes and the middling classes to go out into the country, on Sundays, to Bray or to Kingstown, when the weather is fine?—Yes, what I call the respectable portion of the working classes very often take a run to Kingstown or Bray, on a fine Sunday evening.

522. Do such parties take provisions with them?—If they go to Bray, and such places, they take provisions with them generally; say a man and his wife, and a portion of his family.

523. What do they have to drink on those occasions?—Very often they bring a little drink with them.

524. Would a party who was spending a Sunday at Bray be inconvenienced by finding the public-houses closed?—They might feel it a little inconvenient if they have brought no drink with them.

525. But you do not think that would be a great hardship?—No.

526. Supposing it was not considered possible to close the public-houses altogether in towns on Sundays, and they were kept open for a certain number of hours, what, in your opinion, would be the best hours to select for that purpose?—The best hours would, in my opinion, be from two to four, if the public-houses were kept open at all.

527. Do you think it would do any good to keep up the restriction which exists in the Bill for allowing drink to be sold for consumption off the premises?—I think if you allowed it to be sold on the premises, the evil would be just as bad as it is now, for in those two hours many men would take as much drink as would put them in the way of getting more in the best way they could.

528. But do you think there would be an advantage in forbidding the sale of drink to be consumed on the premises, if they were allowed to sell the drink to be taken away?—Yes, I think it would be a great advantage not to have the drink consumed on the premises.

529. Why do you think that?—Because I believe if the drink was allowed to be drunk on the premises, some men would take so much in those two hours, that they would get nearly intoxicated; they would desire to take more, and I believe that if public-houses were allowed to be open for a portion of the day, there would be opportunities of getting more, and bringing it home.

530. But suppose that the drink was not allowed to be consumed on the premises, do you think that working men would club together and buy, say a gallon of whisky, and go somewhere else to have a carouse?—Very few of them.

531. A good many, perhaps, would buy some porter to take home to their families?—Yes, but I think very few would club together in the way you speak of.

532. You do not think that houses in connection with the public-houses would be opened for the

the purpose of letting men in to drink; say a house near a public-house into which men might fetch a gallon of whisky and drink it?—There might be some.

533. But do you think that would be common?—No, I do not think that it would be common.

534. Mr. Dawson.] What is the usual beverage of the working classes in Dublin?—Porter, or ale.

535. Mr. Stacpoole.] Do they drink much whisky?—They do.

536. Mr. Leader.]—You said you thought that Bill of this kind might be felt as class legislation by the working people in Dublin?—By many of them.

537. Do you think that feeling would be strong?—I think it is pretty strong at present, but I believe that after a short time it would pass away.

538. Do you not think it would be very undesirable in these times to give any excuse for any feeling of that kind?—I think the better portion of the working classes would feel satisfied after the Bill became law, because they would see the good effects of it.

539. Mr. Stacpoole.] Do the working people of Dublin drink more whisky or more ale, do you think?—I could not say; some drink porter, some drink ale, others drink whisky.

540. Mr. Dawson.] Did I understand you to say that you thought if the time for which the public-houses were open was confined within a short space, people would drink just as much, and that the mischief would be as great as it ever was?—The evil would be nearly as great if they were allowed to consume the drink on the premises, I think.

541. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] Suppose the act allowed beer or porter to be sold for consumption off the premises on Sunday, but not spirits, do you think that could be enforced, or that it would be abused?—I think whisky would be sold directly.

542. You stated that the working classes drink porter and ale on Sunday; is that generally draught porter?—Draught porter.

543. Draught porter laid in on Saturday would of course spoil, but people could lay in bottled porter, could they not?—Yes.

544. But the expense of having bottled porter or ale would be much greater than that of having draught porter or ale, would it not?—The difference would be trifling.

545. Mr. Pim.] What is the usual dinner-hour for the working classes?—From two to three.

546. What meal do they take after dinner?—Tea between six and seven.

547. Do you know of any working man who is in the habit of taking supper?—I cannot say I do.

548. It is not usual, at all events?—It is not usual, but some may do it.

549. You do not think it would be needful to keep public-houses open in the evening of Sunday for the purpose of supplying drink for those few who take supper?—No; and I think it would be a very great evil in other respects.

550. In England it is very much the habit of working people to take supper?—No doubt.

551. But it is not customary in Ireland?—It is not at all customary in Dublin.

552. Are there a large number of persons employed in the public-houses?—Yes; large numbers of young men are employed, and the tendency of our times is to shorten the hours of labour, and that is a class that is very much overlooked; for six days in the week their hours are 17 hours a day, and eight or nine hours on Sunday; they are an intelligent class of young men.

553. And you think it would be a great advantage to those young persons to have a weekly day of rest, I suppose?—A very great advantage indeed.

554. Would not the advantage be considerable if they even had to attend on business from two to four, and had the remainder of the day to themselves?—No doubt.

555. Do you think their time would be spent well if they had it?—I do; they are a very intelligent well-conducted class of young men.

556. Sir Graham Montgomery.] What proportion of the working men in Dublin do you think take supper, would you say one in 10?—No, not so many as that.

557. Then you think the proportion is so very small that it would not be desirable to keep the public-houses open, say from eight to nine, even if it were for the purpose of selling liquors to be drunk off the premises?—I think not; I think there would be more whisky than porter sold in that hour.

558. Mr. Murphy.] You stated that your opinion was that if the public-houses were kept open for two hours on the Sunday, men would have an opportunity of taking such a quantity of liquors as would induce them to go and look for more wherever they could get it?—Yes.

559. Even if they were not allowed to consume it on the premises; did I understand you to say that?—No, my meaning was the contrary of that.

560. But what difference would it make if they were allowed to buy the drink and consume it next door?—I think they would not lay it in for the purpose of making an evening of it; but that they would only get what drink was necessary for their dinner, or perhaps a little more. I do not believe they would think of getting in a quantity for the purpose of intoxicating themselves.

561. But suppose in a very large number of instances the middle class or lower class of public-houses, the proprietors found it to their advantage to hire a house next door to their own house, and the public-house was kept open for the sale of liquor, for, say, two hours on Sunday, and people could go and drink it in this unlicensed house under the name of an eating house or any other name, would not exactly the same effect be produced as if the people who came to this unlicensed house to drink were in a tap-room?—No; I think it would only be the lowest class that would avail themselves of a house of that kind.

562. But would not the same class avail themselves of a house of that kind as now avail themselves of the taproom?—Suppose a public-house is open for two hours on a Sunday, the liquor to be drunk on the premises, half-a-dozen tradesmen meet on the Saturday and ask others in as friends to have a treat. Number one is asked what he would take, and he says he will take a glass of ale. Number two returns the treat of number one, and so on, till they have had half-a-dozen glasses of ale. Now the custom of this country is very different; half-a-dozen men will go in and call for a glass of ale each man, and they will be satisfied,

Mr.
J. Sullivan.

satisfied, and will go away; but in Ireland a man will not take a treat from another without returning it; so that if they take six or eight treats they go away under the influence of drink, and very much disposed to get more wherever they can.

563. But supposing they have all the opportunities which you describe, and all the tendencies to treat each other, which are shown in tap-rooms, and suppose they have similar opportunities in a house next door, do you not think the custom would spring up of buying the liquor at the public-house to be drunk next door; and would not that be likely to occur in the very same class of people as would use the tap-room?—No, not in the same class of people; half-a-dozen people may go into a public-house of a respectable class, but they would not go to a house set apart for evading the law.

564. But there would be no evasion of the law in that case?—Yes, to some extent it would be driving a coach and six through an Act of Parliament.

565. The present Bill proposes that you may buy any amount of liquor you wish, but that you may not consume it on the premises, within the precincts of the place where it is bought; but I understand you to express the opinion that nothing but the total closing of public-houses on Sunday would effect any real substantial good?—I think that the total closing of public-houses would be the best plan.

566. Do you think the plan proposed by this Bill of allowing any quantity of drink to be bought within restricted hours, but not to be consumed on the premises, will produce any appreciable effect?—Very little, I think.

567. Major Gavin.] Do I understand you to say that there are young men in Dublin who are worked 17 hours a day?—Yes, the assistants in the public-houses are worked from six in the morning till half-past 11 at night.

568. Your opinion is decidedly that if this Bill is to have any effect it should go for the total closing of public-houses on Sunday?—Yes.

569. Mr. Stacpoole.] Your plan would be closing public-houses from half-past 11 on Saturday till six on Monday morning?—It would.

570. Major Gavin.] Do you think that if the public-houses were open for two hours a day the frequenters of public-houses, knowing they had only those two hours before them, would drink whisky instead of porter, because it was the stronger liquor?—No, I think that would not induce a man to change his favourite drink for the purpose of getting drunk.

571. I think you stated that people would drink as much in the two hours as would do them a great deal of mischief?—I was asked whether if houses were left open for the sale of beer and porter only, what I thought the result would be, and I said that whisky would be sold as well as beer; and where whisky is consumed, there is more drunkenness and irregularity and noise, than if there was nothing but beer sold.

572. Chairman.] Do you think it would be worth the while of a publican of the lower class, in order to evade a law against drinking on the premises, to take a house next door into which people might go and drink what they have bought in his public-house; do you think it would be worth his while to pay a rent for that house next door, and keep it up for the use of a few people on Sunday only, that is to say, for 52 days in the year?—I do not.

573. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] Are there such things as working men's clubs or institutes getting up around Dublin?—There are trade societies.

574. But I mean places of resort for reading the papers and things of that kind?—Not that I am aware of.

Mr. MICHAEL JOHN RALPH, called in; and Examined.

Mr.
M. J. Ralph.

575. Chairman.] ARE you President of the Association of Spirit Grocers of the city of Dublin?—I am a member of it.

576. And you attend here to give evidence at their request?—Yes.

577. How many spirit grocers are there enrolled in that association in Dublin?—There are between 200 and 300 spirit grocers in the city of Dublin, but I cannot say how many there are in the association.

578. Are the greater number of the spirit grocers members of your association?—Yes.

579. So that we may take what you say as representing their opinions?—Decidedly.

580. Have you read the Bill now before this Committee?—Yes, I know the tenor of it.

581. Is it your opinion that it would be desirable to diminish the facilities for the sale of drink on Sundays?—I think if it could be done it would be desirable.

582. Do you think it could be done?—I think not, without first altering the licensing system of Ireland.

583. But assuming for a moment that the licensing system were regulated in any way you please, you think it would be possible, and, if possible, desirable to diminish the number of hours for the sale of intoxicating drinks in Ireland on Sunday?—I think so.

584. Do you think it would be possible to prohibit the sale of intoxicating drink in Ireland altogether on Sunday?—I think it would be very difficult.

585. But would it be desirable?—I think it would be desirable if it could be accomplished.

586. I do not mean theoretically but practically desirable on the whole?—I think it could be done.

587. Do you think that it would be desirable as well as practicable?—Yes.

588. Then do I understand you to say, that you would be an advocate for the total closing of public-houses on Sunday?—Yes, I would if the licensing system was altered.

589. I am assuming that everybody who sells drink in every possible way is to be prohibited from selling it on Sunday; would you be an advocate for that prohibition?—I would.

590. Do you think everybody else would be in favour of it?—I have been for 24 years a spirit grocer, and I do not think people generally would be in favour of it.

591. Do you think they would generally be in favour of some amount of restriction?—I think that

Mr.
M. J. Ralph.

that the working classes seem to be displeased at being interfered with at all.

592. That of course applies to the City of Dublin, to which your experience is confined?—Yes.

593. Supposing it was desirable to diminish the hours for the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday, do you think a distinction could be kept up between selling drink to be consumed on the premises, and selling drink not to be consumed on the premises?—Quite easily.

594. If a publican were allowed to sell drink not to be consumed on the premises you think that would not lead to drinking on the premises?—Certainly not; that practice exists in our own trade.

595. And the law is enforced against you?—Decidedly.

596. So that you think it could be done against any one else?—It is quite possible.

597. Suppose it were considered desirable that shops of all sorts for the sale of intoxicating drinks should be kept open for a limited extent on Sunday, only for the sale of liquors not to be consumed on the premises, what would be the hours for which you would think it most necessary to keep them open; would it be in the middle of the day?—Yes, I should say from three to six.

598. Is there any necessity, do you think, for leaving them open for the purpose of getting drink for supper at a later hour of the day?—Generally speaking the working classes do not want supper; but there is a class above them who would be very much inconvenienced if they were unable to send out for drink for their supper.

599. What class is that?—The class of mercantile clerks, who have servants of their own to send out for their drink.

600. Could they not send out before six o'clock?—They send out for it according as they want it.

601. Do you think that it would be a serious inconvenience if they were unable to get it; it is an inconvenience, no doubt, if a man has not a shop from which he wants something always open, or open next door; but would you consider it a sensible inconvenience that that class should not be able to get drink after six o'clock in the evening?—I should not say so.

602. You agree that the working classes of Dublin do not habitually take supper?—Generally they do not, but some do.

603. They do not take beer with their supper generally, do they?—I could not tell you; they send out for a great deal at night some of them, and bring it to their own place in bottles.

604. Do you think the best thing would be to forbid the sale of intoxicating drinks altogether on Sunday, and that the next best thing would be to forbid the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday for consumption on the premises; and thirdly, if the public-houses should be kept open for a certain number of hours for the sale of liquors not to be drunk on the premises, that the best hours would be from three to six?—I think so.

605. Now will you kindly inform the Committee what are your views with regard to the distinctions that you think at present exist, and which ought not, in your opinion, to exist between the different classes of shops that are licensed?—We ourselves pay a higher license, and do not get the same privileges as those who pay the smallest license; the opinion of our trade is that there should be a uniform license granted, putting all classes on the same footing, and then it would be quite possible to pass the present Sunday Closing Bill, and there would be no inconvenience; but if you pass it now, the parties who do not get those privileges would take pains to break the law.

606. You propose, in fact, that there should be only one license?—Yes.

607. And that that license should authorise a man to sell wine, beer, and spirits, and every species of drink?—Yes.

608. And that it should authorise him to sell it for consumption on or off the premises?—Exactly.

609. How would you propose that the amount of that license should be regulated?—According to the valuation of the premises.

610. And that is what you wish to bring before the Committee?—Yes.

611. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] You stated just now that you thought it would be inconvenient to some classes of people if they were not able to send to the public-house for spirits or beer in the evening of Sunday; but on the other hand, might not it be an advantage to them not to be able to gratify their craving for more?—Yes, in some cases.

612. The probability is, that a person, knowing that his friends would come to supper at a certain time, would send out for as much as would be good for him and them, if he knew he could not get it after a certain time?—No doubt; I think if a person had liberty to get what he required he would get what would suit him.

613. But if he has had as much as is good for him and his friends he possibly might have a craving for more?—If the house was closed he could not get it.

614. Might it not be an advantage on the whole if he were not able to get it?—Yes.

615. Mr. Pim.] Your attention has been called to the subject of beerhouses, and with regard to licenses you stated you thought there ought only to be one system of licensing, do you mean that no one should be permitted to sell beer without the same license as is required for the sale of whiskey?—I would have a general licensing system, and charge it pretty high, according to the valuation of the premises, which would keep the trade respectable.

616. Would your suggestion with regard to licenses interfere with the beerhouses?—Yes, it would do away with them.

617. What objection do you make to the consumption of beer?—The present class of beerhouses in Dublin are a very low class, and the authorities and all parties are very much against the present beerhouses.

618. Do you think there is any other description of drink sold there under the pretence of selling beer?—There is no doubt about it; they are a very low class of houses.

619. Mr. Murphy.] You were saying that you would wish to make the licenses of all persons who sell intoxicating liquors the same?—Yes.

620. That is to say, to have the licenses on the same principle, according to the valuation of the houses?—Yes.

621. What is the class of customers that you generally serve, and what is the smallest quantity of liquor that you are allowed to sell?—Half a glass of spirits.

E

622. Does

Mr. 622. Does your trade extend to anything but
M. J. Ralph. merely selling liquors?—Teas, sugar, and gro— ceries of every kind.

26 March 623. Are you allowed to sell beer?—Yes.

1868. 624. And any kind of liquor?—There are nearly half-a-dozen licenses, and it is confusing.

625. But are you allowed to sell everything that a publican is allowed to sell?—Yes.

626. Then what is the difference between him and you?—We are not allowed to have it consumed on the premises.

627. But you may sell as small a quantity as half a glass, may you?—Any quantity under two quarts of spirits.

628. When a man comes into your place and buys a glass of whiskey, what does he sometimes do with it?—He takes it away in a bottle, or he would drink it if I would allow him to do so.

629. Has it ever occurred that a man has drunk it?—Very often.

630. And is there, in fact, any possibility of preventing that?—There is only a chance of preventing it.

631. Sir Graham Montgomery.] Are you under penalty for allowing liquors to be drunk on the premises?—Yes, a very heavy penalty, 50*l.*, and our license is cancelled.

632. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] But you cannot always prevent it, I suppose?—It is very hard to turn a good customer out of the shop.

633. Besides, a man might toss off the whiskey before you could stop him?—Yes.

634. Sir Graham Montgomery.] Are your licenses under the same regulations as publicans' licenses on Sundays?—We are compelled to shut up half an hour before them on Sundays, and every other evening.

635. Major Gavin.] Are you a teetotalter yourself?—I am not.

636. You stated that you thought it would be better to have the public-houses closed altogether on Sundays, I think?—That is my opinion.

637. Do you think that it would be approved of by the public in general?—I do not think it would.

638. Do you think that it would give general dissatisfaction?—I think the people generally would be dissatisfied if they were debarred from getting refreshments.

639. Chairman.] The only check that you have to prevent consumption on the premises is, that you would not give a man your utensil to drink the liquor out of; but if a man brings his own bottle, and gets half way to the door, unless you ran after him you could not prevent his drinking off what he had bought?—No; I could not, and I might be fined, and if a man came in under the influence of liquor, and got that drink, the serjeant might summon me and fine me, and arrest the man, and all persons found on the premises.

640. Your only check is, that you do not give the man your glass?—Just so.

641. Major Gavin.] When a man brings a bottle for the liquor that he buys, do you take the bottle from him and pour it in yourself?—He often brings in a bottle and pours it in himself, and when he does that he may drink it on the premises in spite of all I can do.

642. Mr. Stacpoole.] Does a man often drink it on the premises, or does he generally take it away?—He generally takes it away.

643. Mr. Murphy.] What proportion of customers have you coming in to ask for glasses of whiskey, as compared with the customers who come in to ask for quarts of whiskey?—A quart is a large quantity; generally, we have bottles ready for noggins.

644. How many glasses does a noggin hold?
 —Two.

645. What proportion have you been in the habit of selling of noggins, as against pints?
 Twenty to one I suppose.

646. Mr. Pim.] How many spirit grocers do you say there are in Dublin?—Between 200 and 300; over 200 at all events.

647. You employ a considerable number of young men as assistants?—I employ two, and a couple of porters.

648. Are there any of your own family employed besides that?—No.

649. Your business is managed by yourself, and four assistants?—Yes.

650. I suppose it may be taken as a fair type of the class on the average; four assistants would be employed, generally, in each establishment?—Yes.

651. What are your hours of work?—We generally open between seven and eight in the morning.

652. And shut when?—At 11 to a moment.

653. On Sunday you open at two and close at 11?—Yes.

654. Then your people are employed for 16 hours a-day for six days in the week, and nine hours on the Sunday?—Yes.

655. Do you not think that very hard work?
 —I have to do it myself.

656. Then would it not be a great comfort to yourself, and a great advantage to the people in your employ, if you had a weekly day of rest?
 —It would.

657. A comfort worth some pecuniary sacrifice?—We should sacrifice a good deal by it; but our trade would be willing to do it if it were satisfactorily dealt with in other ways.

658. Do you think that the persons employed in the trade would spend their time of rest well if they got it?—I think, generally, they would;
 they are a very good class of young men; if they were not we should not keep them.

659. Major Gavin.] I suppose you know pretty well all about the public-houses in Dublin?
 —Yes, very well.

660. Is it the case that public-houses are open for 17 hours a-day, and during that time the servants are kept at work?—There are very few of them open for that length of time.

661. Do you believe that men and boys are kept at work for 17 hours in any instance?—
 Their time is occupied from the time they get up till they go to bed, except when they are taking their meals.

662. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] It would be more correct to say that they are in attendance for those hours than that they are at work for those hours?
 Yes, they are weighing tea, and serving whisky, and so on.

Mr. PATRICK PILLSWORTH, called in; and Examined.

663. Chairman.] WHAT are you?—A Grocer and Spirit Merchant in Dublin.

664. You are also the owner of at least one public-house?—I am the owner of three public-houses, with retail licenses for consumption on the premises.

665. You sell for consumption on the premises, as well as for consumption off the premises?—Yes.

666. Where are those houses of yours?—One is in Thomas-street, and two where I reside, in James's-street; one is a house which I have lately built.

667. And both of them are, I believe, in a district of the town which is greatly inhabited by working men?—Yes; at least, James's street is; Thomas-street is more of a thoroughfare, but there are working people there too.

668. How long have you been in the trade now?—Twenty-five years.

669. So that you have had a good deal of experience of it?—Yes.

670. What is your opinion with regard to the evil of drinking on Sunday: do you think there is more or worse drinking on Sunday than there is on other days of the week, in the case of working men?—I do not open my own house on Sundays, but I think the class that chiefly frequent those houses on Sundays are more inclined to get drunk on Sundays than on other days.

671. How long have you been in the habit of closing your house on Sunday?—The house I live in I have not opened for three years, but the other houses I closed on January 1867. I succeeded in getting 12 houses in Thomas-street closed, but out of the 12 there are only five that have kept to it.

672. What is the reason of that; I suppose they found there was no use in shutting up as long as one or two of the houses kept open?—There were 21 licensed houses in Thomas-street; out of the 21 four were to my knowledge open for business for years; and one of those parties, when the other houses were closed, except the five that did not close; one of those houses that had not opened from the time he was in business, which was a short time opened when the others closed, and thought he should do a large business, at the same moment his neighbour opened. I went to them and thought to get them to give their promise, and got them to sign a requisition which I advertised in the "Freeman," but it was of no use.

673. In the town of Dublin, your experience shows that it is impossible to shut the public-houses by any voluntary agreement, because some people out of the number are sure to break the promise?—Yes.

674. We have heard some complaints of the injury which might be done to people who have invested capital in public-houses by closing them on Sundays; you have a good deal of capital invested in public-houses yourself, have you not?—Yes.

675. Have you lost heavily by closing your houses on Sunday?—I am not aware that I have; I have a retail license, but my business is more in the grocery and wine way.

676. Mr. Murphy.] You do not depend on small consumption?—To some extent; I can sell a puncheon the same as a distiller; but mine 0.55.

does not depend upon small gains so much as the others.

677. The business of an ordinary public-house depends altogether on small consumption?—Yes.

678. And you do not?—Not exactly.

679. Chairman.] Do you think it would be a good thing if all the houses for the sale of intoxicating liquors were shut up in Dublin on Sunday?—I would rather not express an opinion.

680. Suppose it were considered desirable to limit very much the sale of intoxicating liquors, do you think that it would be practicable to allow the public-houses to be open for a certain number of hours for the sale of drinks not to be consumed on the premises, or would such a law, in your opinion, always be broken through?—I do not know what law you could make; no doubt many houses would not break the law, but there are things to be got in Dublin at two o'clock.

681. Would there be any practical use in making a distinction between the sale of drink to be consumed on the premises, and drink not to be consumed on the premises?—I would not have it drunk on the premises, even if the houses were open; my opinion about the beerhouses is, that it was the greatest mistake ever made; that it was an injustice to us, and has done a great deal of harm in Dublin to my own knowledge.

682. Supposing it was considered necessary to leave public-houses open for a certain number of hours in the course of the day, what do you think would be the best hours for leaving them open?—From two to four, or from three to five.

683. Would there be any sensible inconvenience, do you think, from people not being able to get drink for their supper after five o'clock?—I think not.

684. What do you think would be the best plan with respect to licenses; would you agree with the last witness that it would be the best thing to have only one license for everything?—I think that it would be the best thing to have only one license for everything, but I think you should do away with the license which he has, because it can be so violated by people coming in and drinking on the premises against his will, but I think if you have only one general license, you do the retailer an injustice.

685. Why do you do him an injustice?—Because you give him the same privileges as the man who pays a heavy fine for his house.

686. But suppose both the men pay the same license?—You put him on the same footing as the man who has property invested in a business.

687. But every man pays for his house?—Yes, but every man cannot get that license; there is no such thing as getting a new retail license.

688. That is in consequence of the opinion held by the recorder, and I think very properly?—Yes.

689. But your view is that in consequence of the limitation of the retail licenses, high prices have been given for a house which has got a retail license attached to it, and that if you allow a man in another house to get a retail license by paying for it, you would do an injustice?—There is no want of retail licenses in Dublin; on the contrary, I think there are too many.

690. Mr. Murphy.] Are you aware whether you get much custom between eight and nine on Sunday, or whether respectable tradesmen or mercantile mercantile clerks might wish for something to drink with their supper on week evenings?—I cannot answer that question.

691. Do you generally have much custom in the way of liquor between eight and nine in the evening, or as much as at other times of the day. I mean, for liquor to be drunk off the premises?—I cannot say.

692. You have a great deal of practical knowledge of the working of your own trade, and possibly with regard to the habits of those people who go into taprooms and sit down to drink on the Sunday?—Yes.

693. Do you think that the class of men who would commit an excess on Sunday by taking more than was good for them, could be prevented from doing it if they had the power of buying the liquor, whether it was to be drunk on the premises or not?—It would be a check to some extent.

694. Do you think it would make any appreciable difference in a place like Dublin among that class of people who are determined to drink?—There would not be so much temptation.

695. Do you think it is likely that those parties would get together in houses near the public-houses which would gradually grow up into places of private resort on Sunday, for the drinking of liquor which was bought to be consumed off the premises?—I think not; I think the Dublin people would not club together in that way.

696. I am speaking of people who are in the habit of going to taprooms?—I could hardly express an opinion.

697. Major Gavin.] Are you a teetotaller?—I am not.

698. Chairman.] It has been suggested that if liquors were allowed to be sold for consumption off the premises on Sunday, it might be worth the while of a publican to get an empty room or a house next door where he could arrange so that people who wanted to drink what they had bought of him might take it into this place and drink it; do you think it would be worth a publican's while to pay the rent of a house or a room for the whole year in order to arrange this plan of dodging the law for only 52 days out of the year?—I cannot say.

699. Do you really think it would be worth his while?—It might be done in some cases. Reading over the Act, I see something about eating-houses, and I think if you leave that loophole you will defeat your own object; if the Bill passes with that clause you would have in every business street of Dublin within a month after the Act passed, at least a dozen bonâ fide eating-houses that would supply a little food and a good deal of drink; with regard to hotels, unless there were something else in the way of supervision than there is, a number of hotels would spring up, and I believe it is the case.

700. Mr. Murphy.] You think the establishment of eating-houses under the proposed Act would have the same effect as the taproom system has now?—Worse; I know from experience of the beerhouses that they have done a great deal of harm in Dublin.

MYLES WILLIAM O'REILLY, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. FRANCIS LYONS, called in; and Examined.

701. Chairman.] You are a Merchant, and the Mayor of Cork?—I am.

702. Have you considered the question of sitting, or prohibiting altogether, the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday in Ireland?—Yes.

703. And especially with regard to your own town?—Yes.

704. Do you consider that if it was practicable, the total closing of public-houses on Sunday would be desirable?—The only objection in my mind is the fact that the article which would be the least intoxicating is perishable, and that which is most intoxicating is not perishable; so that the total closing of public-houses on Sunday might induce people to supply themselves with spirits rather than porter or ale beforehand.

705. Do the working men and that class of people in the town of Cork consume a good deal of porter and beer?—Yes.

706. Before their meals or afterwards?—I am rather inclined to think afterwards; I think there is a want of sociality among the working classes, much in a desultory manner sitting here or there; I think they do not get any spirits or porter at their meals.

707. Do they ever drink beer or spirits with their families at home?—Not to any extent; at least the cases of drunkenness seem to be such that we might argue that they are entirely owing to drinking in public-houses.

708. But do they often, as an enjoyment on Sundays, get a quart of beer in their own houses?—You think?—I think not.

709. Is there much Sunday drunkenness in the town of Cork?—Not very much lately.

710. But compared with the other days, is the drunkenness on Sunday considerable?—The dock is always heavier on Monday than for any other days, but a great deal of that arises from Saturday night drunkenness rather than from Sunday morning drunkenness; people who have not been sober since the night before.

711. You know the purport of this Bill, I presume?—I do.

712. In the first place, would you consider it possible to stop the sale of drinks altogether in country districts?—I think it might be done in the country districts; it has been done in fact.

0.55.

713. Do you think it would be advantageous if it were practicable?—I think so.

714. What do you imagine would be the opinion of the country people in general; would they consider it an injustice or a hardship?—It would not be much of a hardship on the country people, because my experience leads me to this opinion, that it is after attending service on Sunday that they go to the nearest house and drink; when they leave it they have no facility for getting drunk afterwards, and if the temptation were taken away by closing the parish public-houses, I believe the agricultural population would not suffer any inconvenience at all.

715. You do not think that the public-houses in the country districts supply places of reasonable amusement and social intercourse to the country people?—I think not, indeed.

716. To come to the towns, and taking Cork as an example, do you think it would be practicable to stop the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday altogether in Cork?—I do not think it would. I think it would be utterly impossible.

717. You think it would lead to breaches of the law?—Yes, certainly, even with the present law the breaches of it on Sunday morning are on a large average in Cork.

718. You think the people would feel such a law a hardship?—Yes; I think they would.

719. Do you think it would be possible or desirable to limit further than at present the times for the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday?—Yes, I think it would be very beneficial.

720. What hours would you suggest?—I think 11 o'clock is too late, and there is no use in it. I believe the consumption within public-houses after nine o'clock is very undesirable, and that people who frequent public-houses after that hour are of a bad class.

721. You think that none but real drunkards are to be found in the public-houses late at night?—As a rule.

722. What hour do you think would be the earliest at which, without hardship to the working classes, the public-houses might be closed on Sundays?—I think eight o'clock.

Mr.

1868.

Mr.
F. Lyons.
1868.

723. Do you think that they might be closed then, or even earlier than that?—It is very hard to form an opinion, a little experience would be the only guide. We closed them at six for a fortnight during last March, but I think it was a great hardship on many people.

724. Did you hear many people complain?—Yes.

725. What class of people?—Not the poorer sort of people, but parties more in the middle class.

726. But as to the hour at which public-houses open on Sunday, do you think it might be made later with good results?—Yes, I think it might be made three o'clock with advantage, in order to give those people who are so disposed an opportunity of returning home after they leave church without the temptation being put in their way.

727. The greatest temptation to the working people is from the public-houses being open close to their places of worship, just as they leave on Sundays, is it not?—Yes.

728. Great numbers of them, if the public-houses were closed at that time, would go home to their families, and if, on the other hand, they find the house open just as they come out after mass, they are likely to go in to get some drink, and stay there?—Yes, it is a great temptation.

729. You think it would be an advantage to delay the opening till three o'clock?—I think so.

730. Do you think that those proposed changes would lead to any more violations of the law than at present exist?—No, because the principal breaches of the law on Sunday morning occur before 10 or 11 o'clock or earlier.

731. You consider that while there is a considerable amount of breaches of the law now, it would not be induced by the change suggested?—I think not. At the present time, although breaches of the law are rather frequent, they are confined to a small number of publicans; the great body of the publicans of Cork are very respectable.

732. And to a small number of customers comparatively, I suppose?—Yes; people who are "thirsty" after their Saturday evening drink.

733. What would be the effect of closing public-houses on Saturday evening earlier than they are now closed?—It would diminish the Sunday drunkenness, and lighten the dock on Monday morning.

734. Would it be better for the working classes that the public-houses should be closed at an earlier hour on Saturdays?—Yes, because wages are paid on Saturdays, and if they had no temptation thrown in their way, they would take more home to their wives and families, instead of spending their money in the tap-rooms.

735. But do you think that a man who had not had the chance of getting drunk on Saturday evening, would be less inclined perhaps to get drunk on the Sunday morning?—He would be in a much better state certainly for going to his prayers on Sunday morning.

736. Do you think in fact, with regard to a purely agricultural district, there would be no difficulty or hardship in the total closing of the public-houses on Sunday?—I cannot speak very practically with regard to rural districts, but with regard to towns I may say that I think there is no parity whatever.

737. With regard to large towns like Cork you think that the only practicable course would be to diminish the number of hours for which public-houses were to be opened?—Yes, I think it would be impossible to close them altogether.

738. Could you offer to the Committee an opinion as to the point where the limit between town and country would have to be drawn?—It would be very hard to draw that limit; we have towns of 6,000 inhabitants where they close the public-houses altogether on Sundays.

739. What is the population of Cork?—About 90,000.

740. How do you think that the case would stand with regard to a place like Queenstown?—At Queenstown there is a large seafaring population, and a pilot arriving from his cruise, and coming ashore from his vessel, would find it very hard if he could get nothing in the shape of refreshments.

741. The case would be analogous to that of Cork, you think?—I think so.

742. Are you aware that there is a provision in the Bill before this Committee, distinguishing between the sale of liquors to be consumed on the premises, and the sale of liquors to be consumed off the premises; do you think that is a distinction which could practically be well worked?—My opinion is that wherever liquor is sold it should be as much as possible consumed in the place of sale, where the character of the people who hold the house is responsible for the good conduct of the consumer while drinking it.

743. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] You stated, I think just now, that you feared such restrictions as are proposed by this Bill might lead to the drinking of more whisky and less beer on Sunday, because beer would spoil if it were kept, whereas whisky would not?—I said I thought that the total closing of the public-houses on Sunday would have that effect.

744. Then, taking it from that point of view do you think that if beer is allowed to be sold during certain hours of the day, and drank off the premises, the permission would be abused?—I think the restriction to consumption off the premises would tend to drive people into houses over which the law would have no control, and for the good management of which nobody would be responsible.

745. But do you think that if beer were allowed to be sold for consumption off the premises whisky would be surreptitiously sold instead of beer?—I think so; I think that if there were any illicit sale, it would be of spirits, and not of beer.

746. I am supposing that the sale of beer was not illicit; do you think that people would tend to buy beer, and carry away spirits instead?—I think the tendency would be that way.

747. You stated you thought the middle class in Cork would feel the total closing of public houses on Sunday a great hardship; do you mean the better order of mechanics, or do you mean shopkeepers?—I mean the better order of mechanics and shopkeepers, and their assistants.

748. You appear to think that the selling of beer to be drunk off the premises would lead to more mischief than the selling of beer to be drunk upon the premises; but, on the other hand, might not a man who had bought beer to be consumed of

the premises have a little conviviality with his friends or his family without getting drunk, whereas if he drank his beer at the public-house might get dangerously drunk?—Yes; but if beer was allowed to be sold on the premises as well as off, he would have the option; while in the case of the consumption being only allowed on the premises he would have no option; in the case where he could only drink the beer off the premises he might be drawn into worse company than he would find at the public house.

749. But people do not get drunk when they are sitting with their families as a general rule?—No.

750. If liquors were allowed to be sold to be drunk off the premises, do you think it would be more generally sold for the purpose of being drunk at home by a man with his family, or do you think people would go to illicit houses to drink it?—I fear that illicit houses would start up in large numbers, and that the consumption at such places would increase in larger proportion than the consumption which would take place at home among people's families.

751. You think that the drinking in illicit houses would do more harm than would be counterbalanced by the good which might arise from the increased consumption at home with the family?—I do.

752. Mr. Murphy.] You are aware that until the passing of the Act of 1860, commonly called Gladstone's Act, all public-houses were compulsorily closed at nine o'clock on Sunday evening?—Yes.

753. I believe it was not in consequence of any intention of Gladstone's Act, but the result of the extension of the hours to 11 o'clock to a certain class of houses mentioned in that Act, has been that the law has been construed to mean that public-houses might now have that privilege which they previously did not have?—Yes.

754. Are you of opinion that if the practice which prevailed before the passing of Gladstone's Act was now had recourse to, namely, the limitation of the hours to nine o'clock in the evening, it would be much more beneficial than the present state of things?—A great deal.

755. Do you, or not, think that a kind of vicious distinction might be created if houses under Gladstone's Act were allowed to remain open to 11 o'clock, while public-houses were compulsorily closed at nine o'clock?—I certainly think so.

756. Would you then think that in order to get rid of any such grievance, and to create a uniformity, if a new Act was to be passed the limitation of hours should extend to all places where liquors were sold?—Yes, certainly.

757. I think you said that eight o'clock would be, in your opinion, a good hour to fix for the total closing of public-houses on Sunday?—Certainly in winter.

758. Would you extend that restriction in winter to the houses which I have mentioned under Mr. Gladstone's Act?—Yes; I believe they do more mischief than the public-houses.

759. You think that a uniform law with regard to the limitation of the hours ought to extend to all places where liquor is sold in any shape?—Certainly.

760. Major Gavin.] You stated you thought that the closing of public-houses early on Saturday night, would have a good effect in reducing the amount of drunkenness on Sunday?—I think so.

761. What hour on Saturday evening would you recommend for the closing of public-houses?—I should say nine o'clock on Saturday evening would be a good hour.

762. But if the merchants and leading men in Cork were to pay their men their wages on Friday instead of Saturday, do you not think that would tend to diminish drunkenness?—In a good measure, I think it would, but the practice has not been usual; an employer likes to have the very last day he can get for paying a large amount of wages.

763. But would it not be a great benefit to the working man if it lessened the temptations thrown in his way?—Certainly it would; our public bodies, such as the Corporation, and the Harbour Board, do pay the wages on Friday.

764. What should you say to the idea of paying wages on Monday in the beginning of the week?—I am afraid if that plan were adopted the men would be like the animal in La Fontaine's first fable; they would be very depourvus at the end of the week, and Sunday would find them famishing, because they would have spent all their wages.

765. Are you aware that we have evidence before this Committee to this effect: that in Wexford and Tipperary, through the influence of the Roman Catholic clergy, all the public-houses are closed on Sundays, and that such a thing as a person being drunk on Sunday is unknown?—I am aware of that.

766. Do you think it would be possible, by the passing of an Act for closing public-houses on Sunday, to carry out the idea in Cork with the assistance of the Roman Catholic clergy?—I do not think it would; and furthermore, I think it would be an injustice, because if you close the public-houses and the poorer classes see those who are better off than themselves going into their clubs and getting what they want to eat or drink, I think it would prove a source of discontent and a great cause of grievance.

767. But we have evidence before us that there is no grumbling in these counties on account of the closing of public-houses on Sunday?—It is very different in a small country town from what it is in a large city.

768. Take Gorey, with a population of 5,000 inhabitants; you can hardly call that a very small town, and the people might all be pretty familiar one with another?—But, I am afraid, in Cork the system would not work at all.

769. Do you think that if the Catholic clergyman took the matter up with a strong hand, and if they were supported by the law, the total closing of public houses on Sunday could be carried out without giving great annoyance to the people?—I think the total closing of the public-houses on Sunday would lead to a worse state of affairs by the creation of shebbeen houses to a very large extent.

770. Do shebbeen houses exist at all in Cork?—There have been cases recently of one or two; I remember the time when they were rather frequent, but they are dying out at present.

771. Mr. Leader.] Do you remember the time when whisky was cheaper than it is now?—Yes.

772. Do you think that, compared with the population, there is less drunkenness now than there used to be?—I think in Cork drunkenness has diminished; there used to be, I think, about 80 people brought up on Monday morning, and certainly for the last three years there have not been that number; and last March, when public houses were closed at six in the evening there was not a case at all in the dock.

773. You think, in fact, that the increase in the price of spirits has diminished intoxication?—I should be inclined to think so, because people do not get so dangerously drunk even when they get a little tipsy from beer as they do upon whisky.

774. You think there is a great difference between the advisability of applying the law of closing to the country and to towns?—Yes; it has proved to be practicable in the country, and it has proved to be equally impracticable in the towns.

775. Chairman.] I think you advocate one uniform system of licensing applied to all dealers in intoxicating liquors?—Yes, the same license.

776. And also the same hours for opening and closing?—Yes, certainly.

777. That would not apply, of course, at all to hotels, and to people stopping in them?—Not at all.

778. Taking the case of travellers; not travellers stopping at hotels, but passing travellers that come from a distance; do you think they would feel any grievance if the hours for which public-houses opened were very much restricted?—If there were reasonable hours allowed on Sunday, there would be no cause of complaint.

779. Probably you observe that by the Bill it is intended to provide for that case, and also to provide for those who are dependent upon eating houses, and similar places, for their meals on Sundays; is there in Cork any large class of persons who are dependent on eating houses, and similar places, for their meals on Sunday, who would feel it a grievance if such places were closed?—The largest eating houses which we have do not allow liquor to be brought in at all; they belong to a company recently established.

780. You do not think the exception with respect to getting meals at eating-houses is necessary in Cork?—I think it is necessary for this reason, that there are eating-houses where people would call for beer.

781. But you think no more hours would be necessary for that purpose than for other purposes?—Just so.

782. Perhaps you observe another clause in the Bill intended to apply to the case of people who might want what the working classes in London would call "supper beer;" do you think the inability to obtain supper beer at the public-house would be felt as a want in Ireland?—I should be most inclined to keep public-houses open for one continuous period. In Cork there are nearly 500 public-houses, and the closing of them is a matter that requires the constant supervision of the police. Once a day, I think, would be quite enough to ask the force to look after that, and there would be great difficulty in getting them to do it oftener.

783. Opening the public-houses twice in the course of the day would increase the need of the presence of the assistants also, would it not?—No doubt.

784. Do you think the young men employed in those establishments in Cork, feel it a hardship that they are called upon to work so long on Sundays, besides having long hours all the rest of the week?—I am not aware. I know of public-houses which are shut altogether, and suspect it is where they employ largely, and where besides the public-house business there is a retail business outside.

785. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] Is it a habit among the working classes and shopkeepers in Cork to go to Queenstown, or some place of the kind, to spend their Sundays?—In summer they go down by the steamer for trips.

786. Would those people who wished to spend their Sundays innocently in making excursion of that kind, experience great practical inconvenience from the total closing of public-houses on Sunday?—I think they might.

787. Do you think they would experience any practical inconvenience from the partial closing proposed by the Bill before the Committee?—I do not think so; my idea would be to leave the public-houses open for a continuous period which would suit the particular case you are putting, very well, for the steamers leave, perhaps, at one o'clock, and come back at about six.

788. Mr. Cubitt.] Do you think there would be any necessity for keeping open after six o'clock?—I think, perhaps, six o'clock is too early.

789. A suggestion was lately made with regard to an English Bill, that six-day licenses might be granted with general advantage. Now, supposing a six-day license were obtainable in Ireland, do you think the public-houses would avail themselves of it to any great extent?—The public houses are quite numerous enough as it is, I think.

790. But do you think publicans would avail themselves willingly of a license so restricted?—No, I think not.

791. Mr. Murphy.] You are aware that on Sunday the recreation of the artisan class particularly, and of other well-to-do people, is not exclusively confined to going in a steamer to Queenstown?—Just so.

792. You know that there is not a suburb, or a road leading to the country, where working men with their wives, daughters, and families are not to be found on Sunday walking out, or taking their provision with them in the neighbourhood of some public-house or other; if they could not get beer or spirits on Sunday at all owing to the closing of the public-houses, do you think the closing would prove a very great inconvenience to that particular class?—I think so.

793. Major Gavin.] I think you stated that there were about 500 public-houses in Cork?—Yes.

794. How long are they open on the weekday?—From 7 to 11.

795. For every day in the week?—For every day in the week.

796. How long are they open on Sundays?—From 2 o'clock to 11.

797. Have you heard any complaints from the people working in those houses of the number of hours for which they work?—No; but I should imagine their case is rather a hard one.

798. Mr. Monsell.] Do I understand you to say that the majority of people in Cork are, in your opinion, opposed to the measure recommended by this Bill?—I think the hours fixed in the Bill are too short.

799. Hav

Mr.

799. Have any petitions come from Cork on the subject to your knowledge?—I am not aware.

800. Was there not a petition last Session?—I am not aware.

801. I have understood that there was a petition, and that it was signed only by publicans, but you cannot say?—I should imagine that the publicans would be the persons most interested in the getting up of such a petition.

802. Do you really think that the majority of the working population of Cork would be opposed to a Bill of this kind?—Not to certain restrictions.

803. But you think they would be totally opposed to the total closing of public-houses on Sunday?—Certainly.

804. Mr. Murphy.] You are quite of opinion that it would be inconvenient, both for the purposes of the police, and for the purposes of enforcing any restriction intended to be enforced by this Bill, that intermittent hours of opening should be permitted on the Sunday?—Yes.

805. You think continuous hours would be better?—Yes; and I am speaking from a magisterial point of view.

Mr. ROBERT LINDSAY, called in; and Examined.

806. Chairman.] WILL you kindly inform the Committee what you are?—I am a Merchant and Manufacturer of Belfast.

807. You are also an alderman and magistrate of the borough, are you not?—I am.

808. Have you considered the question, either of the total or the partial closing of public-houses on the Sunday?—I have given the question a good deal of consideration.

809. What is your opinion upon the subject generally?—My opinion is that nothing short of the total closing of the public-houses on Sunday would be the right thing.

810. Are you also of opinion that that would be practicable?—I am of opinion that it is quite practicable.

811. Will you be kind enough to state your reasons?—Before I came away, I took the opportunity of obtaining from the police authorities every information which they could give me, both with regard to the effect of Sunday drinking generally, on crime, and on the peace of the community, and also with regard to the means whereby a restraining law if passed, could be carried out. I should think it would be well if the Committee would allow me to read, for their information, what certain members of the Belfast police force have conveyed to me.

812. Will you be kind enough to do so?—In the first place I would hand in a verified report, for the years 1865 and 1866, showing the number of parties arrested for drunkenness in the borough, and the number of parties arrested in the borough for being drunk and disorderly, and the number of parties arrested for all other offences put together. The general result of that report is this, that for the year 1865, there were 3,900 persons arrested for drunkenness, 5,044 persons arrested for being drunk and disorderly, and 1,339 persons arrested for all other offences put together. For the year 1866, there were 4,173 persons taken into custody for being drunk, 5,733 for being drunk and disorderly, 1,378 for all other offences. As there was not time to get this return made strictly accurate, it was taken on the principle of the weeks in each month, multiplying them into a total. Some of the weeks happen to be a little larger on the average, and hence the number of persons here quoted somewhat exceed the actual number, in one case by 862, and in the other case by 860; but practically speaking the tables show a precise result, making a necessary allowance for those reduced figures. As regards the effect on crime generally in the town, I would adduce another instance. It will be in the recollection of the Committee that in 1864 very extensive riots occurred in Belfast; after they had gone on for a number of days the resident magistrates and the mayor together, issued an order for the total closing of the public-houses for two days, and they closed them at six o'clock for about a week on the other days. I have the mayor's testimony that the immediate effect of the closing for the two days on the rioting was very marked. I have here a return showing first the ordinary commitments for the week previous to that date, and then the commitments for the week in which the public-houses were thus closed; in the one case the total number of persons committed for drunkenness was 95, and for other offences 74. That was when the public-houses were opened. In the other case the total number of persons arrested for drunkenness was only 25, and for other offences 109; the latter being unduly large owing to riots not having ceased. I have also to state to the Committee that the total number of public-houses in Belfast with retail licenses attached is 535.

813. Mr. Monsell.] What is the population of Belfast?—About 150,000; the population is much larger than that of Cork.

814. Mr. Murphy.] What is the extent of area of the borough of Belfast?—It used to be about 1,200 acres, but when the borough was enlarged it was enlarged to something like 5,000 acres.

815. What is the distance from the centre of the town to the boundary of the borough?—The extreme distance would be a mile and a quarter.

816. Mr. Monsell.] Is that the Parliamentary boundary?—No, that is the municipal boundary; the Parliamentary boundary is much smaller. I have to state that of those 535 public-houses 146 are voluntarily closed the entire Sunday. Before I came away I had this document presented to me: "Sir, Understanding that you have been summoned to give evidence before a Committee of the House of Commons on the Sunday Closing Bill, we, the undersigned owners of public-houses in Belfast, beg to express our approval of a Bill for the total closing of public-houses on Sunday." I left yesterday about three o'clock, and this is signed by 23 or 24 people, and would have been signed by four times the number if time had permitted. In addition to these public-houses in Belfast there are 102 spirit grocers, and which, so far as drinking is concerned, are considered by the police authorities as more injurious than the public-houses.

817. Chairman.] Why so?—In the first place, they are entitled to keep open day and night for the entire week; they are called in Belfast night-houses, as distinguished from the regular public-houses. Their principal sale of drink commences after the public-houses are closed. They have the power by law of selling for consumption off the premises, but in fact what they do sell is mostly for consumption on the premises; and inasmuch as they are empowered under their license to keep spirits on the premises, unless the police succeed in discovering them in the very act of selling there can be no conviction. These night-houses keep a regular watch on the police, and by means of back doors opening frequently into open yards, if a policeman comes to the front door, whoever is inside is turned out into the common ground, and it is impossible to get proof. The police might bring up the parties thus turned out to give evidence, but they find, as a rule, that their evidence would not be reliable. I will hand in the resolutions agreed to at a very large public meeting held in the Ulster Hall on the 12th of March 1867. The meeting was one of the most influential that I have ever seen assembled in Belfast. The hall contains something like three thousand, and it was full to excess. There were at that meeting 19 ministers of various denominations, seven magistrates, with a very large representation of the corporation, and most of the leading merchants were more or less represented.

818. How many magistrates are there in Belfast altogether?—I suppose there are nearly 30, but very few of them reside in the town

819. How many ministers of religion are there?—I should say about 50; I gather that number from the published report; there might be others in the body of the meeting, and I have no doubt that there were, but those were on the platform. The first resolution was as follows: "Moved by the Rev. Doctor Cooke, and seconded by Rev. Robt. Hannay, that the common sale of intoxicating drinks on Sundays is unnecessary, opposed to the interests of morality and social order, and in direct opposition to the requirements of Christianity." Moved by Robert Lindsay, Esq.; seconded by W. L. Finlay, Esq.: "That this meeting hails with lively satisfaction the efforts now making for the removal of so great an abuse, and earnestly desiring they may be speedily crowned with success, pledges itself to accord to the movement an energetic and hearty support." The next resolution was appointing Alderman Lytle, J.P., James P. Corry, Esq., J.P., and the Honorary Secretary to form a deputation to London to wait on the Secretary of State with regard to the Bill then before Parliament on the subject. I hold in my hand another return showing the number of public-houses in the principal streets and thoroughfares of Belfast, as compared with the number of dwelling-houses in the same streets; in about 50 streets there are 364 public-houses opposite 3,199 dwelling-houses, or showing a public-house for every eight dwelling-houses and a fraction; these houses are in the leading streets and thoroughfares; there are altogether in Belfast 26,000 dwelling and other houses. Belfast is remarkable for the number of small separate houses which it contains; there are about 18,000 of such houses in Belfast under the annual value of 87. I may mention in addition that there is a public meeting held annually by what is called the Temperance League; it was held this year in the Ulster Hall, where the meeting was enormously large, and similar resolutions to those which I have read were brought before the meeting and confirmed.

820. Mr. Monsell.] But the temperance people go further than you do, do they not?—The temperance people go further; I was listening to a question put to the last witness with reference to public opinion, and I would say this, that more than three-fourths of the inhabitants of Belfast would go for a measure to prevent the sale of drinks in any way on the Sabbath.

821. What data have you for giving that opinion?—My data for that is from general intercourse, and also from the numerous public meetings that I have attended, and from petitions presented, and in fact from the general feeling of the town.

822. Mr. Murphy.] You mean now the total closing of public-houses on Sundays?—Yes, the vast number would go for the total closing of the public-houses on Sunday altogether.

823. What portion?—That I cannot exactly state.

824. But a vast number?—Yes, a vast number. I will now give the testimony of Sub-Inspector Harvey, of the police, a most intelligent gentleman.

825. Chairman.] Is he the head of the police in Belfast?—He is second, but he, as I understand, takes charge of a special department, and is the head of that department.

826. Mr. Monsell.] How long has he been in this position?—He has been in Belfast from three to four years, but he has also been at Athlone and elsewhere, and knows the country districts well. He says, "By the extension of the open hours for drinking, from 9 till 11 o'clock p.m. on Sundays, drunkenness and immorality have been considerably increased. For example, numbers of young men from the surrounding towns, such as Lisburn, Carrickfergus, Newtownards, &c., come into Belfast on Sunday, intending to return by train, but by being induced or tempted to continue drinking till 11 o'clock, miss their train, and not getting home, are tempted to spend their night at improper houses, whereby their morals are hopelessly vitiated. The increase of these two hours has caused a great increase of disturbance; prior to the extension till 11 o'clock a man drinking was turned out at nine o'clock, and though half drunk would most probably go to his home, and so going would be ready for his work on Monday morning, but by being allowed the opportunity of drinking till 11 o'clock, would become quite intoxicated, and thus even if he went home, became quite unfitted for Monday's work. Young men entrapped into a public-house find it harder to leave at the later hour, and thus by degrees imbibe a fixed taste for drink. While I was on duty at Athlone, I found this to be the result."

827. Chairman.] That means that he was on duty at Athlone when the change occurred?—Yes. "When the police on Sunday evenings cleared out public-houses at nine o'clock, they found them much easier to be persuaded to go home than at 11 o'clock." I give further the testimony of Head Constable Porter, who says, "I consider intemperance has been largely increased by Sunday selling. A vast number would never drink at all were it not for their being idle on Sunday, and but for the temptation of going to the public-house to meet their neighbours, and to talk over the news of the week. The public-house, so far this latter feature is concerned, may be called a poor man's news-room. Sunday closing would have the best possible effect on the working community. A great many of the public-houses (40) keep their houses closed all Sunday, and otherwise conduct themselves respectably. Three-fourths, however, of the entire number keep open the whole of the legal hours, and this class, as a rule, take every opportunity of making a sale during the prohibited hours. Many of these have back entrances made apparently for the purpose of enabling them to sell without detection; and where such entrances open out on common yards detection is impossible. Drinking on Sunday is largely the result of Saturday evening excess, the regular drunkard seeking on Sunday to continue his debauch. If public-houses were obliged to close at 6 to 8 o'clock on Saturday evening, it would greatly lessen the demand for drink on Sunday." He further goes on to say, that if public-houses were closed earlier on Saturday, it would lead to a much earlier closing of the smaller butchers, bakers, and grocers who now remain open till nearly 12 o'clock at night, and who find it to their profit to do so, from the increased facility which it gives them to sell inferior provisions and meat; he states that his experience is, that Sunday evening is the great time of sale for drink both in Belfast and country towns, the sale being quite as much as on the Saturday evenings; he states that the class who are taken into custody on Saturday and Sunday are mostly tradesmen, and in the case of women, prostitutes; when other women are taken into custody, they do not put them into the police cells to degrade them for ever, but take them to their homes; he also gives as a fact within his experience, that when the wages of working men are wasted by Saturday and Sunday drinking, the families are forced to buy their food on credit at much higher prices, and when they cannot get credit, it leads to begging and sometimes to stealing. He adds, that the spirit grocers and the beer houses exercise a most deplorable effect. I may say on my own account that, as employers, our firm have found great difficulty in restraining young men and other employés from drunkenness; we have found by experience that young men now getting free at 2 or 3 o'clock on Saturday, and having all their Sunday to themselves, their leisure time has proved a very great temptation to get into wrong habits.

828. Chairman.] You stated that in your judgment, three-fourths of the people in Belfast would be in favour of the total closing of public-houses on Sunday?—I think so.

829. Now what kind of statistical proof have you to produce to the Committee of that statement?—I could not give you any statistical proof of it; there has not been a house to house canvass made as yet; the only proof I could give you would be from personal communications and from the meetings to which I have referred, at which in no one case has there ever arisen any opposition.

830. There has been no meeting held in Belfast against the total closing of public-houses on Sunday?—No; there was an attempt made last year among the publicans to get up an opposition, but it broke down, for they were not able to agree among themselves.

831. And there was no meeting held?—No, none.

0.55.

832. Was that meeting in the the Ulster Hall an open meeting?—Yes.

833. Was it attended by large numbers of working people?—Yes; and there was no amendment, and no dissent whatever.

834. I believe that the Belfast people, when there is a difference of opinion, and they meet in the Ulster Hall, are apt to express that difference of opinion very plainly?—It would be rather a dangerous thing to hold such a meeting if there was a difference of opinion to any marked extent.

835. There have been petitions in favour of the total closing of public-houses on Sunday largely signed, from Belfast?—Yes, last year.

836. Has there been any petition against it, or against this Bill?—I never heard of any; if any, they were too trivial to attract public notice.

837. Not even the publicans have petitioned against it?—No.

838. I am right in saying you are not a Roman Catholic, I believe?—I am a Wesleyan.

839. Then can you certainly state that the feeling in favour of the closing of public-houses on Sunday is not confined to the Roman Catholic population of the north of Ireland?—I should say that a great many of the Roman Catholic population would regard Sunday closing as a boon, but that the feeling is not really so universal among them as it is among other religious bodies.

840. You think it is almost universal among the other religious bodies in the north?—Yes, they regard it as a violation of the Sabbath as well as with reference to the evil of drinking.

841. Do you think no inconvenience would be felt by the working classes from the total closing of public-houses on the Sunday, seeing that it would prevent their getting liquor to consume with their meals?—Not so far as I could imagine; in Ireland the population are altogether different in their habits from the similar class in England; beer or ale to dinner or supper is a very rare thing; I should say it is not so used by the middle or lower classes, except to a very infinitesimal extent; spirituous liquors are not used, or very rarely, at meals; in fact, I cannot conceive that any inconvenience would arise from the total closing of public-houses on Sunday.

842. Are there any classes of travellers, not people who are staying at hotels, but travellers from short distances, who would be inconvenienced by not getting refreshment on Sunday. I mean, do you think there is any considerable number of such persons?—I think not, and indeed I do not regard spirits as any refreshment.

843. But we are now speaking of beer as well as of spirits?—Beer is mostly used by the better classes as a dinner beverage, and of course they do not send to the public-houses on Sunday.

844. Then another objection has been raised to the effect, that it is the practice of the lower and lower middle classes of the inhabitants of Belfast to go out in the summer to the neighbourhood of Bangor to enjoy their Sundays, and that they would be inconvenienced by the closing of the public-houses?—There is always a class of young men who go out for pleasure on Sundays, but it amounts to certainly less than five per cent. on the whole population, perhaps not one per cent.

845. And you think that any people who do go out on Sundays to enjoy themselves with their families,

Mr.
R. Lindsay.
1868.

Mr. R. Lindsay. families, would not feel it as a sensible grievance if the public-houses were not open?—I think not; but if they did, the number of such persons must be infinitesimally small. There may be one or two trains that go out on excursions in the morning, but as compared with the number of the population, they are so few as to be scarcely worth taking into account.

1868.

846. I suppose you are pretty well acquainted with the country districts?—Yes.

847. Would your evidence apply more strongly to the country part than to the town?—In the country they are more sober than they are in the towns, and they are more in favour of the temperance movement.

848. Mr. Monzell. Do you think that there are great numbers of people who are not in practice very sober, but who are still anxious to have temptation removed out of their way?—Yes, and I think the duty of the Legislature would be to remove their temptation.

849. But, as a matter of fact, you think that there are many people who do not feel strong enough to resist temptation, and yet would be glad to see the public-houses closed, so that it is not only sober people, but people who were very much other than sober, who desire a Bill of this kind?—I can scarcely say what a confirmed drunkard would desire, but the sober and moderately sober would, as a rule, go for such a measure.

850. How does it come to pass that there are such a number of public-houses in Belfast; is there no kind of supervision exercised by the magistrates as to their numbers?—I should say that at one period the number of public-houses, even when the population was much smaller, was greater than it is now, but there was a public movement got up and persevered in for a number of years, which led the magistrates to limit very much the number of licenses issued.

851. And you say that there are fewer public-houses in Belfast now as compared with the population, than there used to be?—Fewer.

852. Mr. Stacpoole. Is the population of Belfast increasing more than the population of Dublin?—Yes; in ten times the ratio.

853. Mr. Monzell. Did you ask the opinion of Mr. Harvey with regard to the practical working of the closing of the public-houses on Sunday?—Yes; I asked both Mr. Harvey and Mr. Porter.

854. And what opinion did they return to you?—The law at present gives the police very great authority over the regularly licensed public-houses; they can enter them at any time, but the law is entirely defective with regard to the spirit grocers; these men can bear a fine, and they are seldom caught, and one night's sale of drink will make up the fine even if they are caught; the suggestion has been made by Mr. Harvey and Mr. Porter, that instead of a fine they should be imprisoned, for, say the second offence.

855. Do I understand you to say that Mr. Harvey is not in favour of the total closing of public-houses on Sunday?—He is entirely in favour of it.

856. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart. Is there any very considerable itinerant labouring population in Belfast and its vicinity?—I think not; the working men are mostly employed in the town.

857. For instance, people going to Lisburn and back again about their work?—No; if they exist at all it must be to a very inappreciable extent; they could not afford to pay the railway fare to Lisburn.

858. But they might walk, might they not?—No, the distance is about eight English miles.

859. But taking the labouring population which goes from town to town in search of work, is that numerous?—It is quite the reverse; the attraction is all to the large towns, and not to the small ones.

860. Mr. Cubitt. You consider that if public-houses were closed in the evening, it would be a great improvement on the present system?—Any lessening of the hours for which public-houses are open, would be a great improvement.

861. But you would prefer the total closing of public-houses on Sunday?—Certainly.

862. Mr. Stacpoole. Would you, in fact, close the public-houses from eleven on Saturday night till six on Monday morning?—If I had the power, I would close them from eight on Saturday night till the Monday morning.

863. Mr. Murphy. You gave a very practical proof of the evasion of the law which that portion of the community called "spirit grocers" practise, and you gave us some very strong evidence to show how, notwithstanding the stringency, or the supposed stringency of the law, they nevertheless find means to evade it by means of back yards and common yards?—Yes.

864. That is a matter of fact; but now, supposing that, instead of what you conceive to be the best thing, namely, the total closing of the public-houses on Sunday, was not to be enacted by the Legislature, but that (as this Bill proposes) spirits were allowed to be sold on Sundays at certain hour, and that they should not be consumed on the premises, do you think that such an enactment would be totally inoperative to prevent excess in drinking where parties were determined to do it?—I think if you continue the power which the spirit grocers now possess, and do not put them under the same surveillance as the public-houses, the certain result of allowing them to sell for consumption off the premises would be practically carried out by sale for consumption upon the premises. After every inquiry, my own feeling is, that these spirit grocers licenses should be withdrawn; they are a mistake; if there are any public-houses allowed to be open at all, I would have them, on the present model, subject to the strict surveillance of the police.

865. The present law is this, that public-houses may be open on Sunday, not alone for the sale, but also for the consumption, of spirits on the premises?—Yes.

866. Do I understand you to say that you are of opinion that the surveillance of the police, under those circumstances, is a better safeguard than we should get by merely allowing the liquor to be sold for consumption off the premises?—I could conceive the spirit grocers being restricted to one or two hours of sale, and that if anybody for any purpose whatever was found on the premises at any other hour, it would greatly lessen the evil if we made that penal; but they are now under no restriction of a practical character, and they are enabled to carry out the sale of liquor to a most injurious extent. I am not prepared to state that they could not be put under proper surveillance and kept in order; I dare say they could.

867. Bu

867. But supposing spirits were allowed to be sold at all on the Sunday, do you think it could be practically so ordered that the drink so sold should be prevented from being consumed, either on the premises or somewhere near the premises?—I think not entirely during the hours for which the public-houses would be opened. I think there would be an evasion of the law by all parties concerned.

868. You think that a Bill enacting that publicans should be allowed to sell spirits, but that the spirits so sold should not be consumed on the premises, could not practically be carried into effect?—I think it would be worthless for Ireland, and I do not think it would pay the public-houses to keep open for a couple of hours on Sunday for the mere purpose of selling liquor to be carried away.

869. I think you stated that three-fourths of the public-houses in Belfast were, in your opinion, in favour of total closing on Sunday?—Yes; and that out of 535 public-houses 146 were closed. That return was taken last Sunday by the police.

870. Does it strike you that whereas three-fourths of the people in Belfast are in favour of total closing on Sunday, so strong an amount of public opinion ought to have produced a greater effect?—I think the temptation to make money demoralises the publican, and that therefore he is not amenable to public opinion like other people, and hence many of them keep open who ought not to keep open.

871. The public meeting which you mention as having been held at the Ulster Hall was attended, I presume, only by parties who were in favour of the object of that meeting?—I should say that was the case, but still everybody had had an opportunity of attending, and moving an amendment.

872. But in fact nobody went there who did not agree with the purpose of the meeting, I suppose?—It was perfectly and enthusiastically unanimous. If there were any persons who did not agree with the object of the meeting they did not make it known.

873. Mr. Stacpoole.] It was a public meeting, was it?—Yes.

874. People were not admitted by tickets?—No; the mayor was to have been in the chair, but a sudden Parliamentary call brought him to London, and his place was supplied by a magistrate.

875. Mr. Murphy.] Is it your opinion that if persons were permitted for a limited time on Sunday to consume the liquor they had bought in a place where the police could enter at all hours, that would be a better state of things than would result from the prevention of consumption on the premises, because that might possibly lead to the establishment of private places of resort for consuming the liquor bought at the public-house, into which places of private resort the police could not enter; do you think it likely that a custom of that kind would grow up?—I have no doubt that no law would altogether prevent shebeen-houses, but I think that if the Legislature were to award imprisonment for offences of that character, the town would soon become too hot to hold the offenders.

876. But I am presuming that no offence against the law would be committed; that the liquor would be bought at the public-house for consumption off the premises, and then taken to some other place near, or adjoining the public-house for consumption in a way over which the police would have no surveillance whatever?—I do not think that would follow as a result; I do not think that there would be separate and private houses got up for drinking spirits bought at the public-house during the open hours.

877. Suppose the proprietor of a public-house who would by this Bill be permitted to sell any quantity of spirituous liquor during certain hours, took a house next door, and got back the rent of the house by setting it out in lodgings by the year, or by the week, but reserved one room into which persons could go for the purpose of drinking liquors bought at his place on Sunday, would not that lead to exactly the same results as drinking in the tap-room would under the present system?—I think that would be illegal; that would not be a club.

878. But suppose that it was not illegal?—I have not a doubt but that if it was permitted by law, and that the publican's house was closed against the consumer, and the buyer could carry out the consumption next door, he would do so; I have not the slightest doubt that that would be the case.

879. Major Gavin.] May I ask you whether the spirit grocers do not sell tea and coffee and sugar?—As a rule, perhaps, 5 per cent. of the whole of them do it; parties do sell tea and coffee, but it is more as a blind than anything else, for the shops are really public-houses; persons who cannot get a regular license owing to their character, or the character of the premises, go to the Excise, and there, without any reference to character, they can command a license by paying 10 l.

880. In my town the grocers are generally men of high position?—Yes, but men of high position with us take out a retail license, not a spirit grocer's license, such as respectable grocers, for example, do.

881. Do they sell on Sundays?—Oh dear no; I do not at all include that class of men or of firms of respectability and position in what I said.

882. Your evidence would go to this, that spirit grocers generally are much inferior as a class to the class of publicans?—Yes, quite inferior in standing and in character.

883. Are you a teetotaler?—I am not a practical teetotaler, but I am pretty near to it.

884. Mr. Murphy.] Did I understand you to say that the spirit grocers have the power of keeping open at all hours of the night?—Yes, that is what has been stated to me by the police authorities.

885. Major Gavin.] I think you stated that there were 535 public-houses in Belfast?—Yes.

886. And that 146 voluntarily closed their houses on Sunday?—Yes, that was the case last Sunday.

887. Do you suppose that that 146 sacrifice a good deal of money and trade by so closing?—I have not the least doubt that they do sacrifice a good deal by closing.

888. I suppose that those 146 that voluntarily close on Sunday are a higher class of men than the rest?—They are men who have a moral objection to keeping open on the Sabbath day.

889. You stated afterwards that in a certain part of the town there was one public-house to every eight dwelling houses?—Yes, eight and a fraction, in the main thoroughfares of the town.

Mr.
R. Lindsay.
1868.

890. Is the trade in general a thriving trade in Belfast?—Yes, the trade is a thriving one, which is proved by the fact that a person when he puts up his license to sale always commands a large price.

891. More than the original price?—Twenty times the original price; a public-house with a license may bring 200*l.* premium; sometimes much more.

892. Do you mean to say that the magistrates would allow a publican to transfer his license to any one?—They insist on a house having a certain character, possessing certain accommodation, and being in a locality which they think reasonably requires a house; they look at the man's personal character, and if there are not sufficient public-houses in the neighbourhood they give him a license; if a man sells his license to another man of good character they will transfer it.

893. They look into the character of the second man, in fact?—Yes; at present the principal licenses are granted by the Recorder; the magistrates for the borough have no voice so far as the Recorder's Court is concerned; at the quarter sessions for the county they have the right; but as the court of the Recorder sits three times as often, the principal licenses are granted by him.

894. In the event of a publican selling his license, have the borough magistrates no power over it?—The borough magistrates have no power over it at all; the sole power lies in the Recorder's hands; under the Act of Parliament he is the sole judge; I may say practically that the sale is not prevented; it does not form any hindrance, provided the party buying is of equally good character with the party selling.

895. Suppose a man came from Cork to Belfast with plenty of money in his pocket, do you think he could obtain a license in Belfast at once?—As far as I know, the Recorder takes great pains in visiting the premises and making inquiries with regard to the character of the new man, and if it is not good he refuses the license.

896. Suppose such a man as I have spoken of came from Cork and went to the Recorder, do you suppose that he would get a license?—It is the duty of the police to make inquiries about each applicant; on the licensing day the report is handed to the Bench, and the Bench are more or less guided by what the police say. The buyer buys at his own risk; these licenses are very often sold by auction; there is no certainty that the buyer will get the license, for it is all at the option of the Recorder or of the magistrates.

897. Do you mean to say that the buyer buys the license whether he will be able to make use of it or not?—Certainly, and yet they bring these premium prices.

898. You think that if the total closing of public-houses on Sunday were carried out, three-fourths of the people in Belfast would not be discontented?—I feel satisfied that I might give even a larger number, but I do not want to appear to overstate the case.

899. Mr. Cubitt.] I suppose all the large warehouses and manufactories are closed on Sunday in Belfast?—Yes, all of them, all the trades but this one of the public-houses and the medical establishments.

900. Are those public-houses which are closed on the Sunday many of them in the immediate neighbourhood of large places of business, which are also shut up on Sunday?—I think they are fairly scattered throughout the town. I do not think that the fact arises from any such proximity. I think it is of the purely personal choice of the owners.

901. Do you know public-houses which are closed in the immediate neighbourhood of the dwellings of the labouring classes?—I know one in particular on the quay where the Sunday trade would naturally be valuable, and the man closes from principle.

902. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] Suppose an Act of Parliament were passed for the total closing of public-houses from eight on Saturday evening till Monday morning, do you think it would be possible to relax that Act in favour of travellers?—The only mode of relaxation that could be worked would, I think, be this, namely, that if the public-houses were to close on the Sunday, that would give rise to the opening of refreshment places where people could get tea and coffee. We have a very large concern or two of that kind in Belfast, where a vast number of people go, and where there are no intoxicating liquors whatever sold; and I could conceive that if the sale of intoxicating liquors were restricted on Sunday it would lead to the establishment of this other class of house.

903. It has been suggested by another Witness that if a restrictive Bill were passed, the owner of a public-house might give refreshment to a person calling himself a traveller if he produced a certificate from the constabulary that he was a bonâ fide traveller; do you think such a relaxation as that would be liable in working to such abuse?—I have noticed that clause of the Act, and have read discussions upon it, and I fear that it would be evaded unless it were made more definite; I mean the clause which relates to the taking a bonâ fide meal.

904. But is there any clause in the Bill enacting that the bonâ fide traveller should obtain a certificate from the police; there is no such clause, is there?—No.

905. But suppose such a clause were inserted, do you think it would be possible to work it without the risk of a considerable amount of imposition being practised?—I do not think it could.

906. Mr. Stacpoole.] Do you know of any person having applied to the Recorder for a license, and on his being refused by the Recorder applying to the magistrates, and the magistrates granting him one?—No; but I know this, that the same parties apply very often four or five times, court day after court day; they go to the Recorder, and if he refuses, they go to the quarter sessions; then if they are refused there they go to the Recorder again, and in most instances they succeed at last.

907. Do you know of any cases in which persons have applied for a license for the purpose of selling it afterwards?—No, that might occur, but I am not cognizant of the fact.

908. Mr. Murphy.] You say that the owners of these 146 houses which are closed on Sunday have closed them, you think, out of principle?—Yes.

909. Not with reference to any particular locality?—Just so.

910. Are you prepared to tell me, as a matter of fact, whether those 146 houses are principally situated in the immediate neighbourhood of manufactories and such large concerns, or whether they are in the midst of the neighbourhoods of the lower classes of the population?—I should say they were scattered all over the town, we have not any great great locality where our manufactories are alone situated; the large manufactories are pretty evenly scattered over the town.

911. But can you, or can you not, say as a matter of fact, whether these closed houses are in the immediate vicinity of any of those manufactories which you say are scattered over the town?—Yes, some of them are, because the manufactories are everywhere.

912. But of those 146 public-houses which are closed on Sunday, is it the larger or the smaller proportion which is in the immediate vicinity of those manufactories?—I should say that the closing was utterly irrespective of the locality.

913. But my question relates to a matter of fact; are those houses near or not near to the manufactories?—I think a great many of them would be near, and a great many of them would not be near.

914. You have stated that in your opinion it would be very difficult indeed to enforce the observance of the non-consumption of drink on Sunday in eating-houses?—Yes; I think the clause in the Bill which I have read is indefinite and capable of being evaded.

915. As a matter of fact, if the eating-houses were open, would people not have the same facilities for drinking liquor there that they have in tap-rooms now?—Yes, they would; in some oyster shops where they have not a license, they are in the habit of sending out for liquor and consuming it in the oyster house, and I can well conceive that the same thing might occur in an eating-house.

916. But I am assuming that the eating houses are permitted to sell any quantity of liquor they like for the entire day; do you think that if that is done, the mere restriction upon the consumption of liquor in the public-house will be of any use whatever?—It is to me rather a new question; we have no eating-houses of that character in Belfast; we have not eating-houses which possess a license to sell spirits.

917. But I presume that you have some eating-houses; what would be your opinion?—I am inclined to think that drunkards will always do their best to get whisky when they can manage it.

918. Mr. Stacpoole.] Do you think it would be better to have the power of granting licenses in one court, instead of its being in the power of both the Recorder and the magistrates?—I think it would be better to have it in one court; in Dublin there is only one court, but in Belfast we are a separate borough.

919. What court would you prefer for the purpose in question; the court of the assisting barrister or the court of the Recorder?—The court of the Recorder, I think, on the whole; I know as a matter of fact, that in the case of the magistrates, both direct and indirect influence are brought to bear upon them for the purpose of influencing the granting of licenses to certain parties.

920. Sir Graham Montgomery.] With respect to eating-houses being licensed for the purpose of drink, do you think that if they had a license to sell beer and not spirituous liquors, that that would work well on Sundays?—The sale of beer would be quite harmless as compared with the sale of whisky.

921. But do you not think that if they were allowed to sell beer, they would sell whisky clandestinely under cover of selling beer?—I do not think that if the police gave proper surveillance they could sell whisky to any extent, because if it were drunk on the premises, the keepers of the houses would be fineable.

922. Do you think that it would be to any extent felt to be a hardship among the mechanics and labourers in Belfast, that they should be deprived of a pleasant and cheering beverage on Sunday?—I think it would be the greatest possible boon to them to be so deprived; any one worth a thought among the labouring classes who desired to use a stimulant on Sunday would get it in during the week for family use, where it would always be used to a very infinitesimal extent under the moral safeguards of family life.

923. Are you in favour rather of the total closing of all public-houses on Sunday than of the permission to sell anything in the shape of intoxicating drink?—I am in favour of the total closing of public-houses on Sunday; I cannot conceive why a baker or a butcher should not be permitted to keep open his shop, seeing that he sells what may be wanted by the working classes; if the whisky house is to be kept open I think it is a great practical inconsistency.

924. Chairman.] If a man had a license for every day in the week for both beer and whisky, would it not be very difficult for the police to find him out, if on Sunday he sold whisky under cover of the beer?—I would not allow a class of houses to best up for the sale of liquors under the name of refreshment houses.

925. Mr. Stacpoole.] Do you think that the working people would set up Sunday clubs for the purpose of drinking if the public-houses were closed?—I do not.

Mr. JOHN CHARLES O'DONNELL, called in; and Examined.

926. Chairman.] You are a resident magistrate in Belfast, are you not?—I am.

927. How long have you been stationed as a resident magistrate in Belfast?—About three and-a-half years, since August 1864.

928. Have you seen a good deal of the results of drinking on Sunday night?—I have had a great deal of experience during that time.

929. Can you confirm what the other witnesses have stated, namely, that the drinking cases on Monday morning are more numerous than for any other two days of the week?—I have not had the advantage of hearing what other witnesses have stated, but I will give my own experience. On Monday morning it is generally my lot in court to discharge the dock as it is called; on that day, certainly, the number of persons taken up for street offences and drunkenness is at least treble what it would be on any other day; and the greater number of persons taken up for drunkenness or disorderly conduct are generally made prisoners after nine o'clock on Saturday night, and from that until six on the morning of Sunday.

930. Are there large numbers arrested on Sunday evening?—Not nearly so many as on the Saturday evenings. On Saturday evenings the working people are paid, and they go about the streets to make their purchases, and they generally wind up the evening in the public-house. On Sunday they have no purchases to make, and besides, perhaps the money may be exhausted.

931. But many people who drink hard on the Saturday night, go again to the public-house on Sunday to drink, do they not?—Yes, as a rule, that is the case, perhaps, but they have not the same facilities on the Sunday mornings as they had on Saturday, because the houses are not open till two o'clock.

932. Have you considered the question of stopping the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday?—Not very particularly, but I have considered it as a matter of general interest.

933. Have you heard the subject a good deal discussed in Belfast?—Yes.

934. What is your opinion as to its desirability and practicability?—I am of opinion that it would be very desirable at all events to shorten the hours for which the public-houses are at present open; at present they are open up to 11 o'clock on Sunday, whereas my opinion would be that it should be shortened to one hour, and then that the sale should be confined to liquors not to be consumed on the premises.

935. What hours would you be inclined to fix as the best?—Of course, it should be after divine service, say from two to three, or from three to four.

936. The greatest temptation to the working man on Sunday, is from finding a public-house open just after he comes out of his place of worship, so that two to three would perhaps be an objectionable hour?—But I would not allow the drink to be consumed on the premises. I would have them open for an hour so that families could send and fetch away their beer for consumption at home.

937. But would it not be better to have the time fixed at from three to four, or from two to three, and that for the reason which I have given?—I do not think it would make much difference whether it was from two to three, from three to four, or from four to five.

938. From your experience of Belfast, do you think that one hour would suffice for the reasonable wants and wishes of the population?—Yes, but I would suggest a further restriction, namely, that the public-houses should be closed at nine o'clock on Saturday evening, for in my experience it is after that hour that the greatest number of cases of drunkenness occur.

939. You know that in the Bill which we are now considering, it is proposed to open the public-houses for the sale of liquors, not to be consumed on the premises, from two until four, and from seven until eight in the evening; do you think there is any necessity for that second opening of the public-houses in the evening?—I do not think there is.

940. I believe this Bill as it is drawn, follows the example of the English Bill, which provides for the sale of beer for the supper of the working men, but owing to the difference in the habits of the people in the two countries, such a provision is not needed for the people in Ireland, is it?—No, but I should be afraid that to close the public-houses altogether would create some dissatisfaction among the lower classes of the people.

941. Do you think that there would be any practical difficulty in carrying out that distinction of consumption on the premises, and consumption off the premises?—It would require great vigilance on the part of the police; the proof of that is this: the houses of the spirit grocers which are already in existence, are not allowed by law to sell for consumption upon the premises, and yet they do it, although they are liable to forfeiture of license which costs 10 l. or 12 l., and I think a penalty of 2 l. besides.

942. Do you think it would be desirable to make that distinction?—Yes.

943. It has been suggested that a man who wished to drink in a public-house, finding he could not take the drink on the premises, would with other men club together to hire an empty room, and take the drink into that room to have a carouse; now do you think it would be worth a publican's while to arrange with the owner of a neighbouring house, that people who had bought liquor in his public-house, might meet in his room which would then become a worse kind of tap-room?—To some extent that practice does even now exist, but those who club together in that sort of way, are the very lowest portion of the population; no decent tradesmen would be found to do that.

944. You do not think that that evil would be an extensive evil if it arose?—I think not.

945. Do you think there is any large class of working men or small tradesmen or persons employed in shops, who go to eating-houses for their meals on Sunday, and would feel it any hardship if those houses were not open for the sale of drink?—I think there is no large number of the artizan class in Belfast who answer to that description, but I think there are young men in drapery houses and linen warehouses who do.

946. Do you think that class of young men would feel it a hardship?—I do not think they would; besides, the eating-houses are open on Sundays the same as hotels.

947. But we are supposing that the sale of drink in eating-houses was put on the same footing as the sale of drink in the public-houses?—I would not myself deprive the eating-houses of the privilege of selling drink on Sundays; my restriction would merely go to the public-house where nothing is sold but drink.

948. Then your view is embodied in the second clause of the proviso in the Bill before the Committee, "That where any person bonâ fide carries on as his ordinary daily trade the business of an eating-house keeper, nothing in this Act contained shall prevent such person from selling, or from suffering to be consumed, in the same manner as he might if this Act had not passed, any meat or other victuals for consumption on the premises, or any fermented or distilled liquors for consumption on the premises with such victuals by persons who bonâ fide have purchased any such meat or other victuals;" that is what you contemplate, is it?—Yes.

949. But this objection has been made to that clause, namely, that if the exemption is left standing, then, while public-houses were closed, a large class of houses would spring up, which though nominally eating-houses were places where a man would, on the plea of purchasing a biscuit, be enabled to get as much whiskey as he liked, and consume it there?—But I think the control exercised under the licensing system is such, that that difficulty would not arise; persons who indulged indulged in such practices would find it very hard to get their licenses renewed.

950. You think that the police opposing the license would be a sufficient check upon that?—I do; the magistrates and chairmen of quarter sessions, who grant the licenses, make the strictest inquiry into every man's character, the style of his house, the valuation of it, the locality, and so on.

951. You think that if a man set up a nominal eating-house, in order really to retail whiskey, and said to his customers, if you will nominally take a plate of beef which you shall not pay for, and which shall be passed on to the next person, in such a case the police would be able to give such evidence as would induce the stopping of the man's license?—Yes.

952. Then you think the distinction between eating-houses and public-houses could be really carried out?—Certainly; if the restriction were to be extended to all eating-houses, I do not see how hotels could be kept open.

953. But it would not apply to persons residing in hotels on the Sunday?—But it very often happens that persons go to hotels to dine on the Sunday, and I am afraid the restriction, if it were extended to eating-houses, would be a very invidious one; I do not think it would be liked.

954. Do you think there is any large class of travellers who would be inconvenienced if they could not get intoxicating drink on Sunday?—No, I think not; in Belfast there are very few travellers on Sunday.

955. And in particular few of the working classes who are travellers, I suppose?—People who want to drink would of course seek to make themselves out travellers, but I would not call a man who had travelled six or eight miles a traveller.

956. Do you think there is any bonâ fide class of men in Dublin, in any number, who are away from their own houses?—There is not.

957. Your experience of Ireland is not confined to Belfast, I believe?—It is not; I have had some considerable experience in the county of Limerick as a magistrate, and some experience in county Cavan, but not much.

958. Not since the closing of public-houses on Sunday by the Roman Catholic Archbishops?—No; upon that subject I may say that there was a great effort made years ago in Belfast by the Roman Catholic clergy, and I am told a very successful one, to check the spread of drunkenness. They have not done anything in public, nor taken any steps to close public-houses by moral means, but I believe the efforts they made were very successful.

959. But it would be impossible for the Roman Catholic clergy to close public-houses in a town like Belfast, although they have done it in other districts, I suppose?—Quite impossible; Belfast contains a community of so many different religious persuasions, and it would not be fair to ask one set of persons to close their houses while the others kept open.

960. It would not be fair to the Roman Catholic publicans to compel them to close on Sunday, while other publicans kept open, for example?—No; and I doubt whether the bishops would succeed in carrying the thing out.

961. Does your experience extend very much to the town of Limerick?—Not very much to the town of Limerick.

962. Do you not think that it would be still easier to check the sale of drink on Sundays in country districts than it is in large towns?—Much easier.

963. Would there be any difficulty in checking the sale of intoxicating drinks altogether in a purely rural district?—The houses in a purely rural district are so isolated that they are not sufficiently under the supervision of the police.

964. But is there any habit among the rural populations of going to a public-house to buy beer for consumption in the family on a Sunday?—No; there is nothing of the kind.

965. In fact in such districts a public-house is a mere temptation?—Just so; nor is beer consumed at home in Ireland to the extent that it is in England; in England all the artisan class drink with their meals, but in Ireland it is rather a treat than a matter of every-day usage.

966. Would there then be any difficulty in stopping the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday in rural districts?—I think not.

967. Or any objection to doing it on the part of the people themselves?—Not much, I think.

968. Do you think it would lead to the illicit sale of spirits to any great extent?—I think not.

969. In Roman Catholic districts, I suppose, with the support of the clergy, a restraining law would be thoroughly well enforced?—I feel sure that it would. In Roman Catholic districts, after mass is over on Sunday the people lounge about in the neighbourhood of the chapel or the church in the village till the public-houses are open; if there was no public-house open those people would go home straight, instead of staying to get drink.

970. And if it was considered necessary to allow the public-houses to be open for one or two hours in the course of the day, would it not be very desirable that the hours should not be such as would fall immediately after Divine service was over; do you not think from three to four, for instance, would be better than from one to two?—I do not see that it would make any difference if the drink were not to be consumed on the premises.

971. But if the drink was to be consumed on the premises, do you not think a great number of people would go home instead of waiting to get it, if they knew they would have to wait a couple of hours before the public-houses would be opened?—I think they would. I suppose the Committee have already been informed of the number of public-houses in Belfast; there are 537 in one district of the town, and 28 in another; that includes Ballymacarrett. It is very customary with applicants, when they ask for a license at quarter sessions, to promise not to open on Sundays, but I have known people who have made that promise keep the front door shut and let the customers go in slyly at the back. The Committee asked some questions of the last witness with regard to the system of giving licenses. The plan is to make an application to the magistrates, who are presided over by the chairman of the county at quarter sessions; but another system has also been introduced since the Recorder has been appointed to the borough; but it is quite an anomalous state of things, and for this reason, that the Recorder holds the double office of Recorder and chairman of quarter sessions, and when he sits as Recorder, he is the sole judge of the propriety of granting or refusing a license; but the same judge, Mr. Otway, presides at another Court, assisted by the magistrates, and his decision

‘Mr. J. C. O’Donnell.] decision in one court may be reversed in the other.

31 March 1868. 972. Mr. Murphy.] But has the court of quarter sessions the same jurisdiction as he has?—It has even a more extended jurisdiction.

973. Do the bench of magistrates override his decision within his own jurisdiction?—They have the power of doing it, because when he sits as chairman of quarter sessions, he takes in a larger ambit.

974. Sir Graham Montgomery.] What proportion of the cases of committals for drunkenness which come before you on Monday morning are assignable to Saturday night, do you think?—The average number of prisoners on Monday morning varies from 60 to 70; on other mornings it is about 20 or 30; and out of the 60 or 70 persons who come before me on Monday morning, I should say two-thirds would be taken up on the Saturday night, and one-third on the Sunday; that is only an approximation, but it is very near the truth.

975. I believe the police have not now the power of taking up a prisoner on Sunday morning?—It is not done, and I believe it is illegal; but I have often attended at the police-house if there was any overcrowding, or any old or sick person, or anything of that kind, and in my discretion I have discharged that person, either unconditionally, or binding him to appear on the following day.

976. Do you think it would be considered a great hardship if the sale of liquor was restricted on Saturday evening when working men have just received their wages?—I do not know. The early closing movement releases men from their work earlier, and many mills and warehouses are shut at two o’clock and others at four, and between that and nine o’clock there is surely long enough for men to drink. I think, in fact, that the temptation on Saturday evening is so great that it would be desirable to shut the public-houses early.

977. With regard to travellers, are there not a great many people on Sundays who go out to Holywood or Bangor?—Yes, a great many take those excursions.

978. Do you think they would not in any way feel it a hardship if they could not find a place open at which to get some cheering beverage?—They could easily provide it the night before and take it with them; and indeed when they do get to Holywood, which is a very pretty village, the excursionists do not reflect much credit upon it, because their conduct in the public-houses is sometimes very bad; they are crowded up there in a close atmosphere, instead of taking a walk and enjoying the very pretty country.

979. You think the very fact of there being so many tourists would be rather an additional reason for closing the public-houses on Sunday?—Yes, and if you go along the highways you find an amount of furious driving sometimes that is dangerous to life.

980. I think you stated that some travellers and other persons went to eating-houses on Sundays to dine and get refreshments; do you think they would find it a hardship if they were not able to do so?—I would not suggest to the Committee that the restriction should at all be extended to those houses which are bonâ fide eating-houses.

981. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] Supposing a Sunday Closing Act to be passed with some relaxation in it in favour of travellers, do you think you could trust the police to decide who were bonâ fide travellers and who were not?—It would be very hard for the police to do that.

982. Do you think they could not very well carry out that duty in a large town like Belfast?—It would be very difficult for them to do so; the word “traveller” is open to a wide interpretation.

983. Mr. Cubitt.] Is there anything special in the situation of those public-houses which are closed on Sunday in Belfast; I mean anything special in their situation which would account for the fact of their closing?—No, I think not; it may be from the views of the people themselves.

984. Are they near great factories or anything of that kind?—No; it may be either from religious or other motives that they are closed.

985. I understand you to say that you think a considerable restriction might be made without either inconvenience or disturbance; do you think that one hour only would be sufficient for the public-houses to remain open on Sundays?—Yes; I do not think the public-houses ought to be altogether closed; it might be one hour or two hours for which they were kept open; I would not restrict my opinion to one hour.

986. You think, however, they might be closed for the whole evening after 6 o’clock without inconvenience?—Certainly.

987. Mr. Stacpoole.] The Recordership of Belfast is a new office, is it not?—Yes; the office was instituted about last January twelvemonth.

988. Supposing the Recordership fell vacant, does it follow that the chairman would be appointed Recorder, or might there still be two officials?—It does not at all follow that the same officer should hold both offices; the office was instituted at the instance of the Town Council upon a memorial from the Lord Lieutenant. At the time that the Recorder was appointed there were a number of gentlemen in or near the town in high commercial positions who were also appointed to the commission of the peace, one of them being the last witness, Mr. Lindsay.

989. And they have no power whatever in the Recorder’s court?—None; the Act is very clear that he is the sole judge in that court.

990. Mr. Murphy.] Are you aware that the object of this Bill is to restrict the hours for the sale of intoxicating drink on Sunday?—Yes.

991. But it allows spirits to be sold at certain hours, though they are not to be consumed on the premises?—Yes.

992. From your knowledge of the habits of town population, such as those of Belfast and Limerick for instance, do you think it would be practicable to allow spirits to be sold in any quantities from two to four, and from eight to nine on Sundays, and to prevent those spirits from being consumed on the premises by a great number of people?—I think spirits would be consumed to some extent, notwithstanding the utmost vigilance of the police as is now done at spirit grocers, but the restriction itself would materially check the vice of intemperance.

993. But suppose that a publican were allowed to sell intoxicating drinks, and was nominally not allowed to have them consumed on the premises, do you think that if he found it his interest to do so, there would be any great difficulty in his taking a house near the public-house, letting it out for lodgings in the course of the year, and keeping a room open there into which parties could could go and sit down just as they could in his tap-room, and drink as much liquor as they liked after having bought it at his public-house?—I should hardly anticipate that such a thing as that would be done.

Mr. J. C.
O'Donnell.

1868.

994. Why, if the publican found it his interest to do so, should he not institute another tap-room next door?—The only check on him would be, that his license would not be renewed.

995. That is another affair, but is it not possible that the thing should be done?—No doubt, any abuse of the kind is possible; but I do not think it likely to take place, at least not to any large extent.

996. Why not, when there is no law to prevent it?—I do not think it would be likely to be an extensive evil.

997. If the law allowed the drink to be sold and taken away for consumption, why should a publican's license be taken away if he were to do such a thing as we are speaking about?—They do not do it now before two o'clock on Sunday morning.

998. But they can go in and sit down now in the tap-room of the public-house on Sunday?—After two o'clock.

999. Do you not think that such an abuse as I have suggested would be likely to arise?—It would be possible, but it does not arise now among the spirit grocers.

1000. But parties can now go into a tap-room and drink as much as they like?—Yes; the spirit grocers keep open all night.

1001. A former witness gave it in evidence that though the spirit grocers were prohibited from allowing liquors to be sold on the premises the law was evaded?—Yes, but it is difficult to get the offence proved; "harbouring" is only a case for suspicion, and the spirit grocers, if they are summoned, bring up the persons who have been harboured, to say that they have not had any drink.

1002. Under the present state of the law a publican can sell spirits for consumption in his own tap-room, but supposing that the law forbade that, and yet allowed the drink to be taken away to be consumed elsewhere, do you not think that the practice which I have just referred to might spring up, of affording the same facilities away from the premises, but near them, as are afforded in the tap-room?—No doubt it is possible.

1003. Do you not in fact think it likely that if the Sunday tap-room was suppressed, a surreptitious tap-room would spring up in the place of it?—No, not to any extent; there are places of the kind now, which are known to the police.

1004. But the police would have no right to enter the kind of place of which I speak, while the public-house is open to the supervision of the police, while the house is open?—Yes.

1005. And that is to some extent a check upon what goes on in public-houses?—Yes, no doubt.

1006. But supposing the same consumption of drinks took place in a neighbouring tap-room or house, and that the police had not the right to enter, do you not think that that would be a worse state of things than exist at present?—I do not think it would be worse.

1007. Do you not think it would be as bad?—Scarcely; to say that would be in fact to stop all manner of entertainment among those people.

1008. But this Bill proposes to prevent any entertainment taking place in a public-house at 0.55.

all?—Yes; but the case you put is similar to the case of having one's friends in a private house, and I do not see how it is possible to restrict that.

1009. Then supposing that a number of people got a room next door to the public-house into which they could go and sit down, and suppose they could obtain any quantity of drink from the public-house, would they not be in precisely the same position as if they went into the tap-room?—Yes, but I do not think such associations would be frequent or likely to occur.

1010. But it would be quite possible to have that done?—No doubt.

1011. Major Gavin.] Do you know whether it is at all the habit in Belfast for people to take beer or spirits home on Saturday, for the purpose of consuming it with their own families on Sunday?—I do not know what their habit is.

1012. A previous witness said that there were 146 houses in Belfast that were voluntarily closed on Sundays, do you think that those publicans who close on Sundays are a better description of men?—Decidedly a better class; the people are better disposed, and are in a better position, and I believe most of them are people who carry on other trades, which makes them more independent of the profits of the public-houses.

1013. Do you know whether what they call spirit grocers do generally sell tea, sugar, and coffee?—They are supposed to do it, and I suppose they do.

1014. You would not recommend the entire closing of the houses which sell tea, coffee, and sugar on Sunday?—I would.

1015. Then you are an advocate for the entire closing of the spirit grocers' houses on Sunday as well as the public-houses?—Yes.

1016. You stated that you thought that the total closing of public-houses on Sunday could easily be arranged in the country districts?—In the country districts, yes.

1017. Do you think you could easily arrange to the satisfaction of the people the closing of the public-houses in Kilmallock?—I do not suppose it would be perfectly satisfactory to the publicans.

1018. But take the people in Ireland generally, what should you say?—I think a great number of them would be well satisfied in that district with the total closing of public-houses on Sunday.

1019. Do you really think it could be done without much difficulty?—I do.

1020. You know that it is done in Wexford and Tipperary?—Yes, by the moral influence of the clergy.

1021. Do you think that in Kilmallock a Bill such as this before the Committee, would have more effect than the moral influence of the clergy?—I should say it would exercise much more power certainly.

1022. If you had the charge of that district, which would you prefer, that the moral influence of the clergy should do all it could to close the public-houses on Sunday, or that this Bill should be passed?—I should decidedly prefer the help of the law.

1023. Chairman.] Let me follow up that question by another; would you rather have both than either?—Yes, the moral influence of the clergy would be very valuable.

1024. Major Gavin.] We have evidence that in many instances the moral influence of the clergy has done what is necessary, and there have

Mr. J. C.
O'Donnell.

have been no breaches of the Sunday Temperance Law, but you think the police would have some difficulty in carrying out this Bill?—There is scarcely a district in Ireland where moral influence would altogether succeed, for though there may be a great many cases where there are people who are willing to submit to moral influence, others may be very stiff-necked.

1025. We have had evidence before us to this effect, that in a town where there is a population of 5,000 people, the magistrates for 11 months never saw a drunken man or woman on Sunday; are you aware that that has been done?—In the beginning of my evidence allusion was made to that influence being exercised in Belfast, and I gave it as my opinion that it would utterly fail there, because of the diversity of religious sentiment in different communities.

1026. But in Kilmallock there is not that diversity?—Probably they are all of one persuasion, with the exception of half-a-dozen people. I know that the clergy in that parish have great influence, but I doubt that they would succeed in inducing people to close public-houses on Sunday.

1027. Mr. Murphy.] You stated that the average number of prisoners brought up on Monday mornings was 60 or 70, and that of those, two-thirds have been committed for Saturday night drinking?—Yes, about that proportion.

1028. Of course the reason why only one-third were committed for Sunday drinking, was that the hours for which the public-houses are open are limited on Sunday?—Yes.

1029. The hours are from 2 to 11?—Yes.

1030. Are you clearly of opinion then, that if the hours on Saturday evening were reduced, say for instance that we went back to the old law and shut up the houses at nine instead of eleven, the number of cases of drunkenness would be very much lessened?—Yes.

1031. And also if the Sunday hours were further restricted?—Yes; that is my opinion.

1032. Looking at the thing practically, would you think as an experiment in legislation it would be more reasonable to restrict the hours for closing public-houses on Saturday evening, say to nine o'clock, and to restrict the hours on Sunday evening in the same way, having relation to the fact that on Sunday the public-houses only open at two?—That would decidedly be an improvement on the present system; but I should like, as I have already said, to go further. I was talking on this subject the other day to an artisan in Belfast, and he told me how on one occasion a postage stamp cost him 2 s.; of course he could not buy a stamp at the post office on Sunday, but knowing that he could get one at the public-house he bought one there for a 1 d.; then some friends whom he found inside gave him a treat of beer or whiskey, and he wished to return the compliment, and so he spent 2 s. before he got out of the public-house.

1033. Chairman.] Is there anything you would like to add to your evidence?—With respect to the issuing of licenses, I have stated that I should myself prefer that the power of granting licenses should be vested in one person only; it is a duty which I as a magistrate do not wish to retain; I have sometimes been surrounded with interests which have been brought to bear upon applications for a license where my own judgment would go against granting the license.

1034. Major Gavin.] It was stated by one of the witnesses that many publicans obtained licenses, and then sold them for larger sums of money than they gave for them; are you aware of that?—I am not, but I know there is a system by which a man having got a license, and having put up fixtures, and gone to some expense, may if he change his intentions sell his interest, and another person takes the fixtures and goodwill.

1035. But have you heard of the sale of a license by auction to any one who chooses to bid?—That surprises me, and I scarcely think it possible for this reason, that there is a great deal of scrupulous inquiry made about the person to whom a license is transferred; when an application is made to me in court to transfer a license to another party, I never do it without having made inquiries from the police as to the way in which the house has hitherto been kept, and whether the applicant is a fit person to be trusted with the conduct of a public-house.

1036. We have evidence that people sometimes give 10 times as much as had originally been given for a license, and running the risk of their getting it transferred or of not getting it transferred?—I have heard of 100 l. or 200 l. being given for the goodwill of a place.

1037. Without any certainty of the new man getting the license endorsed?—Yes; and I have heard of many instances where the magistrates have been informed that large sums have been paid, and yet the license has not been transferred.

1038. The buyer of the goodwill loses the money, then?—Yes.

1039. Supposing a stranger came from Cork or Limerick, with plenty of money in his pocket, would it be possible for him to get a license transferred to him?—He must be known to the police as a man of good character before the license would be endorsed.

1040. Chairman.] Can the spirit grocers keep their houses open all night?—Yes.

1041. Not on Sundays, I suppose?—No.

1042. Major Gavin.] What does a publican pay for his license?—About 5 l. I think; there are two which amount to about 5 l., but the spirit grocer pays nearly treble, and if he is fined only 10 s. he forfeits his license, though he can go to the Excise Commissioners and renew it upon a payment.

1043. Mr. Murphy.] But is it a positive fact that the aggregate money value of the licenses held by publicans in such a town as Cork or Belfast is a very considerable sum?—It is.

1044. Where there are say 500 licenses, would it be at all out of the way to put down the goodwill as worth 50 l. a piece?—It would depend upon the situation of the place.

1045. But, taking the average, do you think 50 l. would be too high?—I do not think it would.

1046. That would be 25,000 l.—Yes; you are doubtless aware that Belfast is daily increasing in the number of its houses as well as in the number of its population.

1047. Major Gavin.] Do you know that in the town of Belfast there is as much as one public-house to every eight houses of the population?—I believe that is so in some instances; there is one case where there are 10 public-houses in one street of 66 houses; the system of the sale of drink rink in Belfast in unlicensed houses is very prevalent, though the police are very vigilant.

1048. Mr. Murphy.] Does that take place on Saturday evenings and Sundays?—Yes.

1049. There is a great deal of unlicensed selling during prohibited hours, is there?—Yes.

1050. Chairman.] Would you really say that here is a great deal of that going on?—Yes, I should; the law only imposes a fine of 5 s. for the first offence, but I have made it a rule to send the person to prison when an offence is repeated.

1051. Is it the fact that a large number of cases of fining for the use of party expressions occur on the Saturday and Sunday?—A great number of such cases are always brought up on the Monday morning, but the offence has of late decreased in Belfast; still we often have five or six cases, and the magistrates have made it a rule to impose the highest penalty the law allows, namely, 40s. and costs, as it often leads to a breach of the peace.

1052. Generally we may say that the committing of the offence is attributable to drink, may we not?—Almost invariably; I do not know a case in which a party cry has been raised by a sober person.

1053. Where does the revenue derived from fines for party cries in the course of the year go to?—It all goes to the credit of the town council of the borough; last year the amount which went to the credit of the town council of the borough was about 2,000 l., and I think about one-third of the whole amount was for fines imposed for party cries.

1054. Major Gavin.] Since you have been in Belfast you say that you have inflicted the highest penalty on both sides?—Invariably. I introduced that rule finding the thing such an evil with regard to the good order of the town, and every other magistrate concurred with me; so that if a man shouts out that he is a good Catholic or a good Protestant, the fine is the same in either case; that comes under the head of disorderly conduct, or using language which in Belfast is highly calculated to cause a breach of the peace. I know a case where a man said that he was a good Protestant, and an unfortunate Roman Catholic misunderstood him and gave him a blow, and the man died. Of late those cries have grown into such a disrepute that it is only the lowest and meanest of the population who use them, and as they cannot pay the fines they have to go to prison.

1055. You stated that there were several shebbeen houses in Belfast open on Sunday, I think?—Many.

1056. Do you suppose if this Bill were passed that those houses would increase?—I do not think they would.

1057. Why not?—The shebbeen houses are frequented only by the very lowest of the population, and there are so many of them that I think they would hardly increase. The artizan class would certainly not go into those places.

1058. Do you think the shebbeen houses would not increase if the total closing of public-houses on Sunday were carried out?—I think not.

1059. Mr. Murphy.] You mean that that class of shebbeen houses would not increase?—Yes.

Mr. J. C. O'Donnell.

31 March 1868.

Mr. ROBERT LINDSAY, re-called.

1060. Chairman.] Is there anything you wish to add to your evidence?—Upon the question whether I should prefer that the licenses should be granted by the magistrates or the recorder, I wish on reflection to say that I should, on the whole, prefer that the magistrates should have the power of granting them, in conjunction with the recorder, rather than the recorder alone.

Mr. R. Lindsay.

Mr. T.
Hamilton.
2 April
1868.

1061. Chairman.] You are a Resident Magistrate of the City of Cork?—I am.

1062. How long have you been stationed in the city of Cork?—I was stationed there for upwards of three years, as constabulary officer, and for the last six months I have been there as resident magistrate.

1063. Have you been stationed there nearly four years altogether?—Yes.

1064. And you have been in other parts of Ireland, have you not?—I have had nearly 16 years service in all.

1065. You are pretty well acquainted with a good many parts of the island?—Yes.

1066. Both country and town?—Yes.

1067. You are aware, I presume, of the general purport of this Bill?—Yes; the Sunday closing of public houses.

1068. Or, at least, greatly to limit the hours and conditions of their being open?—Yes.

1069. Have you considered the question of limiting the sale of intoxicating drink on Sunday?—I have, as far as Cork is concerned.

1070. In the first place, do you think that it would be desirable, if it should be found practicable, either to totally close public houses, or to limit the hours for which they are open?—From my experience, I would not advise the total closing of public houses on Sunday; but I think it would certainly be advisable to limit the hours.

1071. What is your reason for thinking that it would be unadvisable totally to close public houses on Sunday?—I think it would lead, in every way, to too much inconvenience, and prevent the working classes from having that reasonable indulgence which they are entitled to. At present the public houses are open from two to 11 at night; but those hours might be reduced with great advantage, and yet afford every reasonable license.

1072. What would you consider a reasonable limitation of those hours?—I know at present the almost invariable consequence of the very late hours is, that the working classes who indulge on Sunday night do not come to their work on Monday morning; whereas the chances are, if they were prevented from going to those houses so late, they would be at their work on Monday morning.

1073. And a good many also appear at the police office on Monday morning?—Generally a large number; much more than on any other day in the week.

1074. What do you think would be a fair hour to fix for closing on Sunday evening?—I would say with respect to Cork that in the summer season eight o'clock would be a reasonable hour; and in the winter season the hours might be shortened to perhaps six o'clock.

1075. You do not think that that would inflict any practical grievance on the working-classes?—No, nor yet on the publicans; the working classes are of course the first to be considered.

1076. Then what do you say with regard to the hours of opening?—Two o'clock is the hour for opening now.

1077. Is there not this great evil about that, that the great mass of working people leave their places of worship about one o'clock to half-past one, so that just as they are going home the public-house is open just ready to tempt them, and prevent their going home?—I do not know that that is so in Cork, for the mass of the people in Cork go to Divine service earlier.

1078. Would anything be gained by deferring the opening for an hour?—I do not see that it would; two o'clock or a little earlier is the hour that the working classes have their dinners; and those that choose to have their beer, or any drink in reason, cannot get it unless the house is open at two.

1079. Do the working classes in Cork take any beer with their dinners?—As a rule they drink in the public-house instead; a man may have his dinner and then go to the public-house and have his beer.

1080. Then he would not want the public-house to be open in order to get his beer for dinner, though he might want it after dinner?—If a man dines at two or half-past one, unless the public-house is open he cannot have beer at dinner, or immediately after it, as he may feel disposed.

1081. Do you think that, as a rule, they take their families to the public-house after dinner to have some beer?—Certainly not as a rule; a man and his wife may sometimes go together, but not as a rule.

1082. Do the working classes in Ireland, as a rule, consume either beer or spirits with their meals as they do in England, with their families, or immediately after their meals; is it not the fact et that drinking is almost entirely confined in Ireland to indulgence in the company of men?—It is almost entirely drinking in public-house; as a rule, there is no such thing as drinking in their own houses, having their beer with their dinner or anything of that kind.

1083. Do you think it is a common practice with working men for them to go after their dinner on Sundays or any other day, and have a pint of beer at the public-house and come away?—On Sundays they indulge in that way more than on any other day; a workman after his dinner is very likely to go to the public-house.

1084. Is it the general practice for them to go and have their beer and come away again, or is it the practice rather that the men stop there, and drink a good deal?—I think that the latter is more the rule; a man goes there to meet his friends, and for a little sociability, more than for the sake of having a pint of beer and coming away again.

1085. How long would you say that the man who goes to the public-house generally stops there; is it not generally more or less of a arouse?—I would not say that as a general rule, or it might be giving them a worse character than they deserve.

1086. All this relates to the great city of Cork, but is there the same necessity for public-houses being opened on Sunday in the purely country districts?—My experience has laid for the last seven or eight years altogether between Cork and Limerick. I know comparatively little from my present experience of the country districts.

1087. Would the opinion you have expressed with regard to Cork also apply with regard to Limerick?—Decidedly. I was there for upwards of three years, and I know it pretty well.

1088. The opinions which you have given apply entirely to Sunday?—Entirely.

1089. At the same time, would you give the Committee your opinion as to the question of the hour at which it is desirable that public-houses should be closed on Saturday evening?—I think that the late hour on Saturday evening is, if possible, a greater evil than the other. I think they might, with very great advantage to the public, and even to the publicans themselves, be closed much earlier on Saturday evenings.

1090. Do you think they might be closed earlier on every evening in the week?—More particularly on Saturday evenings.

1091. Would you fix the same hour on Saturday as on Sunday?—Nine o'clock on Saturday would be better, so as to allow a reasonable indulgence to both the publicans and the public.

1092. Would you agree with the opinion which has been expressed by several witnesses, that more drunkenness is caused between the last two hours of nine and eleven on Saturday evening than during the whole of the rest of the evening?—I have it in positive proof, from my daily experience as a magistrate and constabulary officer, that the average of cases of drunkenness is much higher on Saturday night than on any other day in the week.

1093. The proposal in the Bill is, in the first place, with regard to the hours for the sale of drink, to limit them on Sunday to from two o'clock to four o'clock in the afternoon, and then again from eight to nine in the evening; that is probably copied from an English Bill; but do you think it would be desirable to have the public-house twice open on Sunday?—No; I think it would be very difficult to carry out such a law.

1094. Perhaps the reason for fixing eight to nine in the evening was to enable the working classes in England to get their supper beer, but supper beer is not wanted in Ireland, is it?—There is nothing of the sort in Ireland.

1095. Mr. Pim.] Is there more beer drunk now since the duty on whisky has been raised?—Much more.

1096. Do you think the dearness of whisky has led to the use of supper beer?—No; there is no such thing as supper beer in Ireland.

1097. Chairman.] There is a distinction proposed in this Bill between the sale of drink to be consumed on the premises, and the sale of drink that is not to be drunk on the premises, and it is proposed to forbid entirely the sale of drinks for consumption on the premises; do you think that is a good distinction?—I do not see how it would apply to Cork, because, as a rule, the public do not take away any drink from the public-house; they might be induced by a change in the law to do so, and the chances are that they would do so; but, as a rule, they do not do it now.

1098. At present is there much evasion of the law at those houses which are licensed under the Spirit Grocers Act to sell drink not to be drunk on the premises?—There are no such things as beer-houses; they are all public-houses. There are grocers who sell spirits—respectable wholesale grocers—but none is consumed on the premises.

1099. Do you think, if such a distinction were made in the Bill, it would probably be evaded to any large extent; that is to say, if it were forbidden to sell the liquor to be drunk on the premises only?—I think that such a distinction would be perpetually evaded.

1100. The second proposal in the Bill is to make a distinction in favour of the bonâ fide eating-house keeper, allowing the drink to be sold for consumption on the premises during the whole of the present hours; do you think that distinction is a good one?—No; I think it would lead in Cork to a great many abuses and evasions. I think it would be hard to distinguish between the eating-house keeper and the public-house. The eating-house would be made a cloak for the purpose of getting drink; and the man who was prevented from going into the public-house would only go to the eating-house instead, and, under cover of taking food, he would get as much drink as he wanted.

1101. A resident magistrate stationed in Belfast stated that he thought that difficulty would not arise, because if the keeper of the eating-house was known to the police as having allowed such an abuse to take place in his house, his license would probably be taken away; do you think that in the city of Cork that would act as an effectual check?—It would be extremely difficult, unless that check were established by law, of depriving a refreshment-house keeper of his license in the case supposed. I cannot see how the abuse could be prevented. A man would go in and order something merely nominal to eat, and have drink ad libitum.

1102. You do not think that any general representation made by the police, to the effect that they believed a particular eating-house keeper was evading the law, would induce the magistrates to stop his license?—No, certainly not, unless unless there were a conviction brought forward against him.

1103. Am I correct, then, in summing up your opinion in the following way:—With regard to Cork city, and Limerick city, and other similar large towns, you think it would be desirable to limit the hours on Sunday for the sale of intoxicating drinks, and that the hours during which the public-houses should be open for such sale should in winter be from two to eight, and in summer from two to six?—Yes.

1104. The public-houses should close on Saturday evening at nine o'clock?—Yes.

1105. You do not think it would be possible to make any distinction between the sale of liquor to be drunk on the premises and the sale of liquor to be drunk off the premises?—I think not.

1106. And you do not think it would be possible to make a practical distinction between public-houses and eating-houses?—Precisely.

1107. Now, do you think that any inconvenience would arise to any class of travellers from there not being any place opened on Sundays where they could obtain refreshment, except during these limited hours?—I do not, because there are hotels in Cork to suit every class of traveller almost, and in those hotels refreshment can be obtained, food and drink both, by travellers.

1108. You do not think there is any large class of travellers among working people who would want refreshment in that way on Sundays?—Certainly not in Cork, it is much more likely that that should be the case in the outlying districts. As a rule, the members of the working classes in Cork go out of town to spend their Sundays, in some of the adjoining villages, or some of the points round the harbour.

1109. Do you think, with regard to that large class of excursionists, that the hours would be sufficient to meet all their reasonable wants?—I think so. I may add that since I was summoned to give evidence before this Committee, I have looked at some statistics for which I can vouch from my own personal knowledge, and I find that there has been latterly a very great decrease of drunkenness in Cork. In 1865 the number of cases of intoxication brought up to the police court was 7,196, in 1866 the number had decreased to 6,571; last year there was a further decrease to 5,081, and in the course of the two or three months of the present year which have elapsed, the numbers have still been decreasing in a similar proportion.

1110. Could you assign offhand any probable cause for that decrease?—I attribute it in a great degree to the high price of provisions, and the want of work; there are now a great many idlers.

1111. You do not think that that decrease should have any influence in checking legislation upon this subject, or that it points to any such increase of habits of sobriety among the people, as would lessen the necessity of legislation as to the hours during which public-houses would remain open?—No, but I have some statistics which point to the advantage of closing at an earlier hour on Sunday; the system was adopted on two or three occasions in Cork; in the month of March 1867, public-houses were closed for nearly a month at six in the evening; that was from the 11th to the 18th of March, a space which included two Sundays, and I find that on the following Monday mornings, while the average number of cases of intoxication amount to

40, the number brought up at that time was only 15 on one Monday morning, and 16 on the other, and that, I believe, was a result of the earlier closing of the public-houses; they closed at six from the 11th to the 18th, and at eight until the 25th of March.

1112. Mr. Dawson.] Do I understand you to say, that you advocate the earlier closing of liquor shops on Saturday night, as distinguished from other week days?—Certainly.

1113. Would not it be the case that those who might wish to take away a moderate amount of drink to their own homes on Sunday, would be rather incommoded if the houses closed so early on Saturday?—I cannot see that that would be the case in Ireland; not one in 100 takes liquor away from the public-house for consumption on Sunday.

1114. Do you know the archdiocese of Cashel?—No.

1115. It has been mentioned by the archbishop of that diocese that a considerable quantity of liquor is there taken home on the Saturday for private consumption on the Sunday.—I have no doubt it is so, because the public-houses are closed entirely in that diocese on Sunday. Saturday night is the night on which the labourers get their wages, and a great many of them not until a late hour, when they go to the public-houses and spend it. I firmly believe between nine and eleven on Saturday night out of the whole week are the most objectionable hours for keeping public-houses open.

1116. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] I think you have stated that there is not much consumption either of beer or of spirits in the family in Ireland; are you quite sure that none of the middle classes take, say, a glass of whisky punch after their Sunday dinner?—I have not the least doubt they do, but I was speaking of the mass of the people—the labouring and lower classes; the middle class, as a rule, have either beer or a glass of punch after dinner, no doubt.

1117. What you would call the middle class in Cork comprises, I suppose, a great number of the better class of mechanics?—Comparatively few of that class indulge themselves in that way in their own houses.

1118. Do you think, however, that if indulgence of that kind was left open to them on Sunday, it might tend to diminish the temptation to indulgence in the public-house?—Possibly it might, but not to any appreciable extent.

1119. With respect to any relaxation that might be made in favour of travellers, should you think it a practicable arrangement for the police to decide if a man was a traveller, and give him a certificate to entitle him to refreshment?—I cannot see how that could be accomplished; certainly not with the small number of police that we now have; we have only 120 in Cork for a population of 80,000 or 90,000 people.

1120. You think that the working classes are exposed to great temptation on Saturday evening, from the fact of the public-houses being open late; do you think that many of them when they have just taken their wages, go in to get a glass of something to drink, and are then tempted to take more?—Yes, from the fact that they have money in their pockets at that time, and the houses are open so late.

1121. And I understand that for that reason you would particularly recommend the early closing of public houses on Saturday evening?—Yes.

1122. You

1122. You think that would almost preclude the possibility of the working man spending any considerable portion of his wages in such places on Saturday night?—I think the hours from nine to 11 on Saturday evening, are, for the labouring class, the two worst hours in the week.

1123. At the same time, you think that if the public houses were open up to nine o'clock on Saturday evening, any person who wished to lay in a small store of drink for use on Sunday at home would have ample opportunity of doing it?—Yes, there would be time for that before nine o'clock.

1124. Mr. Pim.] I understand you to say that you would not recommend the total closing of public houses on Sunday?—No; I think that would be unfair to the working classes.

1125. Have you formed the same opinion with regard to the country that you have with regard to the towns?—I think there is less objection in the country than in the City, because in small country towns the public houses often adjoin the chapel, and the congregation have perhaps, come a considerable distance, and then if the public houses are open just as service is over, the people are induced to go in and they stay perhaps a good while; of course that argument would not apply to the City so much, where the people are all resident more or less near the chapel.

1126. Do I understand you to say that you think there would be less objection to the closing of public houses entirely on Sunday in the country than in the City?—I think it would be less objectionable to close them entirely in the country than it would be in the City.

1127. Mr. Murphy.] From the evidence you have given, am I right in concluding that it is your opinion that if drink be allowed to be sold at all on Sunday, the restrictions proposed in this Bill of not allowing it to be consumed on the premises would prove inoperative?—I do think so.

1128. Do you think it would be much better to have no restriction in that respect?—Decidedly, if the houses are to be open at all.

1129. From your knowledge of the habits of the people in Ireland, do you think it likely that if drink were not allowed to be consumed on the premises, although it was allowed to be bought for consumption off the premises, a publican himself might be induced to open a private house in some convenient place near his public-house to which drink could be taken, and where people could sit down and consume it just as they could in his taproom?—I think that would be very likely; I am quite certain that such a law would lead to a great many evasions, and, perhaps, evasions of that very character.

1130. You think that the proposal to prevent consumption on the premises would be of no practical use?—I think it would be inoperative.

1131. You think that the time for which public houses are kept open on Sunday should be for a certain number of hours continuously, rather than there should be a break?—Rather than there should be a break.

1132. Do you found that opinion upon the difficulty which you think the authorities might find in ascertaining whether or not any abuses were going on in the intermediate time?—Yes, that is the principal ground of my opinion.

1133. In the statistics that you gave us, did you make any distinction between committals arising out of Saturday night drinking, and committals arising out of Sunday night drinking?—

0.55.

No, I do not; but I can from my own personal experience state, that the number of drinking cases is greater on Saturday night than on either of the other five days of the week.

1134. Chairman.] Saturday is the highest, and Sunday is the second?—Saturday is the highest, and Sunday is the second.

1135. Mr. Chichester Fortescue.] Your figures refer to the cases that are brought up at the police court on Monday for drunkenness?—Yes, those that are arrested on the Saturday night come before the court on Monday morning.

1136. And you say the Saturday cases are the most numerous?—Yes; and the next in number are the Sunday cases.

1137. Mr. Murphy.] And for the purpose of preventing the Saturday drinking as much as possible, you very properly suggest a limitation of the hours on Saturday night, do you not?—I do.

1138. Prior to the passing of the Act of 1866, the hours for closing were nine o'clock in the evening of Sunday, I believe?—Yes.

1139. And you think it would be proper to revert to that original custom?—I have very little doubt that it would have a good effect upon public morality.

1140. Can you, from your knowledge of Cork, and the various classes of the population, inform the Committee whether, of the working classes and the inferior tradesmen, there is a very large proportion who make it a habit on Sunday to go out and walk into the adjacent villages, or to take a cheap train, or to take a steamboat, and make short excursions?—A very large proportion of the working classes avail themselves on Sunday of the advantages which Cork presents in that particular, and those advantages are very great in Cork.

1141. Have you any materials for forming an opinion of the proportion; do you think on the average that half the working classes make Sunday excursions in that way?—I should say considerably more than half of the working classes; those who are employed six days in the week do so.

1142. They do so more in summer than in winter, of course?—Much more.

1143. People of that kind are more or less decent in their own way when they go out to the villages around Cork in that manner; I suppose they refresh themselves at the public-houses?—Yes; and they are, as a rule, respectably conducted.

1144. Would you consider it a great hardship, if, although people could buy drink for consumption off the premises on Sunday, people of that class should be prevented from consuming it on the premises?—It certainly would be a hardship, but it would not apply to great numbers of those who go out of Cork on a Sunday, because they would become travellers to a certain extent; and I conceive they would be entitled as travellers to obtain refreshment.

1145. But supposing they were not considered entitled to obtain refreshment as travellers, and supposing people of that class were restricted from sitting down in a public-house for a short time to take their refreshment, you say that would be a hardship?—I would decidedly say so.

1146. Do you think that such a law could in fact be carried into effect at all?—I cannot speak from my personal experience as to that.

1147. But are you of opinion that if such a restriction

Mr. T.
Hamilton.

Hamilton.

restriction were made law, the non-consumption on the premises could practically be prevented?—No, I think not, in the case of travellers certainly.

1148. Major Gavin.] You have a large garrison in Cork, have you not?—Yes.

1149. Soldiers frequent the public-houses on Sunday, of course?—Great numbers of them do. We have about 2,000 soldiers in Cork.

1150. Are their own canteens open on Sunday?—I am not certain; but I have very little doubt they are.

1151. But still there are a great many soldiers that do frequent the public-houses in the city on Sundays?—I know as a rule, from my own observation, the soldiers frequent the public-houses on Sunday more than any other day in the week, so that, possibly, their own canteens are not open on Sunday.

1152. I think you stated that it was your opinion that it would be advisable to close the public-houses on Sunday at 8 o'clock in the summer, and 6 o'clock in the winter, and on Saturdays to close them at 9 o'clock?—Yes, that is my opinion.

1153. At the same time, did I understand you to say that you thought it would be difficult to carry out a law for the total closing of public-houses on Sunday?—No; I did not say it would be difficult to carry out such a law if it were made. I am certain it could be carried out, but I think the total closing of public-houses on Sunday would inflict great hardship upon the people.

1154. Do you know of such things existing in Cork as shebbeen houses?—There are very few indeed.

1155. Did I understand you to say, that there are none of what are called "spirit grocers" in Cork?—In Cork, all the licensed houses are classed in the same way.

1156. Chairman.] Is there anything you wish to add to your evidence?—I think not.

Mr. HUGH O'DONNELL, called in; and Examined.

Mr. H.
O'Donnell.

1157. Chairman.] Will you inform the Committee what you are?—I am the manager of a wholesale grocery and spirit establishment in Dublin, receiving a share of the profits.

1158. And you are, I think, President of the Grocers' Assistants' Benevolent Society?—Yes.

1159. And you come here to express their views on the subject of this Bill, at their request?—Yes.

1160. Will you, first of all, inform the Committee how many members there are in that association?—I could not be quite sure; but I think about 300.

1161. Are they a considerable proportion of the whole number of the body?—They are considered the most respectable portion of the assistants in Dublin, of whom I should say there would be altogether from 1,200 to 1,400.

1162. Will you state your own opinion, and at the same time the opinion of the association, upon this question of Sunday closing?—There was a meeting held on Sunday, the 15th of March, to consider the propriety of closing the public houses on Sunday; and, after due consideration, and reading over the Bill, this was the result: the assistants, as a matter of course, are, as a class, very anxious to get Sunday to themselves; but, at the same time, they came to the conclusion, that the Bill, as proposed, would act injudiciously to the trade; and, so long as it gives those privileges to eating houses, we are of opinion that more beer houses will spring up in consequence. The assistants think that, if the beer license was cancelled, then Sunday closing might be practicable.

1163. Do you mean the total closing of public houses on Sunday?—The assistants themselves are for that, provided the privileges proposed to be given to the eating-houses were withdrawn, and the beer license cancelled; but otherwise they think there would be a great many more eating-houses and more beer-houses—a good deal of vice and drunkenness take place in those beer-houses.

1164. What the assistants wish to point out to the Committee relates to the opening of the licensed beer-houses on Sunday?—During the week also.

1165. But with regard to Sunday closing, they would have no objection to that, if the beer-house was shut as well as the public-house?—None; but if Sunday closing was not fully carried out, the assistants would propose that the hours for which the public-houses should be open should be from two to five on Sundays, and that there should be no second opening.

1166. Is there a strong feeling among the assistants with regard to the number of hours for which they are kept to work during the week as compared with assistants in other trades?—Yes; as a rule they work 15 to 18 hours a day for six days in the week.

1167. And for how many hours on Sunday?—At present they work from two to eleven—it is nine hours on Sunday.

1168. How is it that they have to work for 15 hours on the week days?—In the neighbourhood where there are markets they open their shops in some cases at four o'clock in the morning, and they keep open till eleven.

1169. Are there many such houses in Dublin?—Not many.

1170. At what hour do the majority of the houses open?—At seven in the morning.

1171. And keep open how long?—Until half past eleven. The hour is eleven, but the police authorities grant an extra half-hour for clearing out.

1172. At what hour in the morning must the assistants be at their post?—At seven in the morning.

1173. Not before?—Very often to clean the counter and the measures, perhaps half-an-hour, and in some cases, an hour before.

1174. And if the public-houses are closed at half-past eleven as you say, do those assistants get away immediately?—No; they have to stay and clean up. I should say they do not get to bed before 12 o'clock.

1175. And that goes on for every day in the week?—Yes.

1176. And then on Sunday when the public-houses open at two, the assistant has to be there at least at sharp two?—Yes.

1177. At what hours do the public-houses close on Sunday?—11; up to 1860, it was nine o'clock, but it is now 11.

1178. Do

Mr. H.
O'Donnell.

2 April
1868.

1178. Do you know how that change came about?—I think it came about from the Wine Licensing Act of 1860.

1179. Is not this the case that the Wine Licensing Act fixed the hour at 11 instead of the hour of nine, and that hour was then held in practice to apply to all shops where liquor was sold?—Yes.

1180. So that that Act, which was never intended to have that result, had the effect of keeping the public-houses open for two hours later on Sunday?—Just so.

1181. Is there a strong feeling on the part of these young men that it is not fair that they should be kept at work so many more hours than the assistants in other trades?—There is.

1182. And especially with regard to Sunday; is it the fact that they feel that the ordinary rule of trade—namely, that it should not be allowed on Sunday any further than is proved to be absolutely necessary, should be extended to them?—Yes, it must be remembered that a grocer's assistant to-day, or this week, may be a grocer himself to-morrow or next week, and that in objecting to the clauses of the Bill before the Committee, they do so because they might act hereafter against them.

1183. But even with a view to their future interests as grocers, they would be prepared to accept a Bill which diminished the hours of Sunday labour to the extent which you have suggested to the Committee?—Yes, from two to five or from two to six; an hour more would not be much of a difference.

1184. Generally, do the spirit grocers open on Sundays, as well as the publicans?—They do.

1185. Those who have a license for the sale of spirits, but not to be consumed on the premises, I mean?—Yes; those who have a license not to sell more than two quarts at a time not to be consumed on the premises.

1186. Do they get on Sunday as large a trade as on other days in the week, for drink not to be consumed on the premises?—I do not think they do.

1187. Then why is it found to be to their interest to keep open on Sunday; do you think a good deal of drink is consumed either at or near the premises without their knowledge?—I should say a good many of them are not very particular about it, but the spirit grocers of Dublin as a rule are very respectable.

1188. But take the case of a spirit grocer with that license who is anxious to observe the law, would it not be very nearly impossible for him when he sells a very small quantity of spirits not to be drunk on the premises, to be quite sure that the man who bought it did not consume it between the counter and the door?—Yes, the man might take a bottle and drink it off before his eyes.

1189. Do you think, that allowing the liquor to be sold in small quantities with the proviso that it is not to be drunk on the premises, is, so to speak, an impracticable regulation?—I am of that opinion.

1190. I dare say you know the working population of Dublin pretty well?—Yes.

1191. Do you think they would suffer any inconvenience, if the hours for the sale of intoxicating drink were restricted from two to five o'clock on Sunday as you suggest?—I do not think the working classes would be inconvenienced; I think from two to five would be fair hours to fix.

1192. Am I right in concluding that the working classes of Ireland and the class just immediately above them do not consume beer with their supper, so that no necessity for leaving the public houses open at the hour of supper could exist in Ireland?—They do not consume beer with their supper as a rule.

1193. The chief distinction made in the Bill that you object to is the one in favour of eating houses?—Yes.

1194. Your objection to that is, that you think it would lead to great evasion; you think that the eating houses would be public-houses, under the name of eating houses?—Quite so; I think people would go in and buy a very little to eat, and a great deal to drink.

1195. Mr. Murphy.] Spend a penny in bread, and 4 s. 6 d. in sack?—Very likely.

1196. Chairman.] But with regard to such young men as have no home of their own to go to on Sundays; if the distinction in question could be fairly made, do you not think it would be desirable that they should be able to get beer or some other drink with their dinner?—I think many would go in to get a dinner that did not want one.

1197. But if it could be done, do you not think it would be desirable?—I do not think it would work, but if you could do it, I think it would be fair.

1198. In Dublin, do you think there is any considerable class of men, especially young men, who have to go to eating houses to get their dinners and suppers, who would feel it a hardship, if there were no such place where they could get either meal and get drink with it?—No; there is no large class like that.

1199. Take the class of young men with whom you are especially acquainted, that is to say, the 1,200 spirit grocers' assistants in the city of Dublin; where do they generally get their meals?—In almost every case, they are boarded in their place of business; there are not more than a dozen houses in Dublin that do not board their young men.

1200. In other trades, does the same rule prevail?—Yes; for instance, in the drapery houses, and those two classes include the principal number of young men in Dublin, engaged in mercantile pursuits.

1201. Chairman.] You do not think that there is any large class of that kind in Dublin who frequent eating houses for their meals?—No.

1202. You think that the closing of the eating houses, except from two to five o'clock, would not be a sensible hardship to any people in Dublin?—I think not.

1203. Do you think there is any large class of what may be called travellers in Dublin; I do not mean travellers sleeping in hotels, but travellers for the day, who would be inconvenienced by finding the public-houses shut in the evening?—There might be; that inconvenience might sometimes arise.

1204. But is there any large class of that kind in Dublin?—Not any large class.

1205. With regard to the districts in the neighbourhood of Dublin which are frequented by people on Sunday for recreation, such as Kingston and Bray, I suppose it would be a great hardship ship if the public-houses were shut altogether to those people on Sundays?—I should say that the traders there would think it so.

1206. Do you think that the customers as well as the traders would think so?—I should say that they would like to get a drink when they go out to the suburbs.

1207. Do you think they would suffer any great inconvenience if the public-houses were shut at five o'clock?—I do not think they would.

1208. Are you at all acquainted with purely country districts?—I served my time in the country, but I have not done business there for the last 10 or 12 years.

1209. What country town was that where you served your time?—The seaport town of Sligo.

1210. What is the population of Sligo?—About 12,000.

1211. Would you express the same opinion with regard to the closing of public-houses in Sligo as you do with regard to the closing of public-houses in Dublin?—Yes, I think it would have the same effect.

1212. Do you think it would be safe to close public-houses altogether in a town like Sligo, which, of course, is not so large as Dublin?—I think it would; I think they would suffer more inconvenience in Dublin than in such a place as Sligo, because the working classes are not so numerous in Sligo, even in proportion to the entire population.

1213. Would there be any great objection made to the closing of public-houses altogether on Sunday in Sligo, do you think?—I should say there would; they would like a few hours there as well as in any other place, but I think it could be done with more convenience in Sligo than in such a place as Dublin.

1214. With regard to Saturday evening, what is the hour for closing these houses at present?—Half-past 11 o'clock.

1215. What was the hour before 1860?—The same hour as on the week-day.

1216. Do you think it would be a gain to the working classes if the public-houses were shut at an earlier hour on Saturday evening?—It would; I think, if there were an hour or an hour and a half taken off, that would be a gain. I think 10 o'clock would be a fair hour for closing on Saturday night.

1217. Would you consider nine o'clock too early?—I would.

1218. Why?—Because there are a great many people in Dublin who are not paid their wages until after eight o'clock; they would not have time to purchase their things.

1219. Do you mean to purchase things to take home with them?—Yes.

1220. Do you think it is the fact that there is more drunkenness on Saturday evening than on any other evening in the week?—A great deal more.

1221. Mr. Chichester Fortescue.] More than on Sunday evening?—Yes; they begin it on the Saturday.

1222. And keep it up?—And keep it up till the Monday morning.

1223. Chairman.] Should you say that most of the drunkenness was caused by the late hours on the Saturday evening?—I should say a good deal of it is.

1224. Mr. Chichester Fortescue.] What did you mean when you said that there were very few people of the working classes in Sligo?—I meant that there was a very small number of them in Sligo in proportion to Dublin.

1225. The whole population being somewhat smaller, you mean?—Yes.

1226. With respect to those people who go out of Dublin in the summer to pass a part of their Sundays in the suburbs, you said they would not be seriously inconvenienced if the public-houses were closed after five o'clock on Sunday?—I did.

1227. That is because the hours from two to five o'clock would be about the time at which they would require refreshments, I suppose?—Yes.

1228. And as you think that generally they would be on their way home after five o'clock, you think it would not be necessary to keep the public-houses open later?—Just so.

1229. Are there very many eating-houses in Dublin?—They are pretty numerous.

1230. Eating-houses of all grades, I suppose?—Yes.

1231. Including places like Jude's?—Yes.

1232. If you were to close the humbler eating-houses, I suppose, you must close them all from the highest to the lowest?—I think, if you close the public-houses, Jude's and such places would admit humble people enough to them to get drink.

1233. You would be in favour of closing the highest class of eating-houses, and all of them, in fact?—Yes, when the public-house was closed.

1234. Do you see any difficulty in closing such eating-houses as I have referred to?—I see no difficulty at all in it.

1235. Are they not largely used by the middle classes of society?—Such a place as Jude's is not largely used by the middle classes of society at present.

1236. But I suppose there are some of those eating-houses which are?—No doubt there are places a shade below that.

1237. A good many?—Yes.

1238. Would it in your opinion cause any serious inconvenience to a great many people if they were not able to get their dinner on Sunday evening at those places?—It would. I mean that they should be closed as far as selling drink is concerned; I do not mean closed from giving a dinner to any one who went in for it.

1239. But I thought you said that if they were open for selling food, and not for supplying drink, that distinction would never work?—I said if they had a license for both; if they had a license to sell drink during those hours, they would sell drink.

1240. You think that distinction could not be maintained?—I think it would be very hard in practice if they had a license to sell drink.

1241. You do think, then, that there would be considerable difficulty and inconvenience in closing eating-houses after five o'clock on Sundays?—I do; but I think you ought not to allow them to sell drink at these hours if you close the public-house.

1242. Mr. Dawson.] Jude's house is already licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors, is it not?—It is.

1243. I think you said that you did not think that if those eating-houses were closed young men connected with your association would find any difficulty in providing themselves elsewhere with Sunday dinners and so forth?—The young men men I am acquainted with are all boarded in their houses of business.

1244. Your knowledge extends only to those who are so boarded?—Yes, and the drapers' assistants; my knowledge extends to all the young men; there are only a dozen houses in the trade that do not board their assistants.

1245. Mr. Chichester Fortescue.] If there is of a numerous class in Dublin to make use of them, how are those numerous eating-houses maintained?—By travellers partly.

1246. But does not the existence of such a number of them in Dublin imply the existence of a class of residents who take their dinners in that way?—The class who go to them are clerks in wholesale houses, attorneys' clerks, and that class.

1247. But would not they require their dinner as much on Sunday as on other days in the week?—Yes, surely.

1248. Would not the difficulty we have been speaking of arise then?—I think they dine more or less at home on Sunday; that is my experience of them.

1249. Do you think that a great many of those who dine at those places on the week days dine at home on the Sundays?—I know a great many who do.

1250. Can you say how that happens?—I know it is the case that a good many of them live in the suburbs, and dine at home on Sundays.

1251. Mr. Dawson.] The last witness gave reasons for the opinion that it would be desirable to close spirit shops earlier on Saturday than on any other day in the week, do you agree with that?—Yes, only I think nine o'clock would be too early; I should think 10 o'clock would be a more convenient hour.

1252. Chairman.] You would be in favour of closing at 10 o'clock on Saturday evening instead of half-past 11 o'clock?—Yes.

1253. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] Supposing the public-houses and eating-houses were either closed on the Sunday, or open only for a very few hours, whereas the clubs and hotels were not interfered with at all, do you think that there would be a feeling in any class of the population that there was a distinction drawn between them and the upper classes?—I do think they would feel that.

1254. But would not some such feeling be almost unavoidable in any legislation restricting the opening of public-houses?—Yes; the working-classes would think it unfair that the public-houses should be shut against them all Sunday, while the higher-classes could go to their clubs and have what they liked.

1255. Do you think that feeling would exist to any great extent among the working-classes?—I should say it would. I think the working-classes would rather have their public-house open; but I should say, at the same time, that it would be a good thing to restrict the hours.

1256. Mr. Pim.] Did I understand you to say, that before the year 1860 the public-houses were closed at nine o'clock during the whole of the week, or only at nine o'clock on Sundays?—Only on Sunday; during the rest of the week they were open till 11 o'clock at night.

1257. Would you recommend the closing of public-houses at 10 o'clock every day in the week?—I would. I think it would be a very convenient hour for all days in the week.

1258. You think there is no occasion for public-houses to be open till 11 o'clock?—I think 10 o'clock would be a very fair hour.

1259. But you would recommend that they should be closed at five or six o'clock on Sunday afternoon?—Yes.

1260. What you would recommend would be, that there should be a reduction of one hour on six days of the week, and that the hours should be from two to five or six o'clock on Sunday?—Yes.

1261. And you recommend that the hour for opening the public-houses on the other days of the week should be as it is now?—Yes.

1262. But that they should close at 10 o'clock?—Yes.

1263. Closing at five or six o'clock on Sundays?—Yes.

1264. And that there should be no other limitation with respect to the sale of beer, whether on or off the premises?—I should say that there ought to be no limitation of that kind. I think it would be better to leave it optional to consume the liquor on or off the premises.

1265. Do you think it fair that the eating-houses should be under the same restrictions as the public-houses?—Yes; and when I say that the liquor ought to be sold for consumption on the premises, I mean that in the first instance there are a good many travellers who are far away from their homes, perhaps, and they would not like to drink it outside the door of the public-house.

1266. Now, with regard to the eating-houses; if the eating-house was under the same restriction with regard to the supply of beer or spirits, that is to say, that it could only supply them for consumption between two and five or two and six o'clock, do you think there would be any difficulty in working that law if a man went in to get his dinner, say at seven o'clock?—I am afraid he would get the drink in the eating-house if he went in at seven o'clock.

1267. You think that, being nominally open for the supply of food, they would really be open for the supply of drink also?—I have no doubt of it.

1268. Do you recollect the time when public-houses were bound to be closed by law on Sundays at nine o'clock?—I do.

1269. Were they, in fact, so closed, or was the law not obeyed?—The law was obeyed with regard to public-houses, as far as my knowledge goes.

1270. I think you said there were between 1,200 and 1,400 young men employed as assistants in the public houses and the spirit grocers' shops in Dublin?—Yes, I did say so.

1271. Are many of those assistants under 21 years of age?—A good many; for I include apprentices.

1272. Would you say that one-third, or one-half, of the number were under 21 years of age?—I should say, that one-third were under 21 years of age.

1273. I suppose that you are aware that in some trades there are restrictions against employing for more than 12 hours a-day persons who are under age?—I was not aware of that.

1274. It is, however, the fact that in factories a young person under age cannot be employed more than 12 hours a-day; and, as that includes meals, it amounts, in practice, to 10 hours a-day?—I was not aware of that.

Mr. H.
O'Donnell.

2 April
1868.

Mr. H.
O'Donnell.

2 April
1868.

1275. That law was, last year, extended to other branches of business. Do you then see any reason why the grocers' assistants who are under age should not be entitled to the same protection as young persons in linen factories, or cloth factories?—Indeed I cannot see any reason why they should not.

1276. Are there any women employed in any of these houses in Dublin?—Very few; there are a couple of hotels where they have young ladies at the bar.

1277. In the country, are there women employed as assistants in public-houses?—In the country, it is generally the daughter or the wife who attends to the business; but I do not know any case in the country where they employ women as assistants.

1278. Mr. Murphy.] I think you stated that the grocers' assistants were boarded in the establishments where they were employed?—Yes.

1279. Is it the fact that they are employed practically for 17 hours in those establishments?—Indeed they are; they must be there for those hours.

1280. In some of those establishments, I suppose, the young men are not at work all day; are there not relays, so that they take their turn at the duties?—There are a few houses that do that.

1281. Generally speaking, you think every one is employed for the time you speak of?—Yes.

1282. You stated you thought that public-houses ought to be closed on Sundays at five or six o'clock?—Yes.

1283. Do you think, if that regulation was enforced by law, that any class of eating-houses in Dublin would be induced to open additions to their establishments, whereby parties who could not get drink at the public-house would get it there?—If they could evade the law, I should say they would do so.

1284. That is on the supposition that the eating-house was allowed a license to sell drink?—Yes.

1285. But suppose it was considered not advisable to restrict the eating-house keeper from selling liquor on his premises later than six o'clock, do you not think it likely that, if he had the power of selling it all the evening, the same class of persons would resort there who would resort to the public-houses if they were open?—If they had a license I think they would.

1286. Major Gavin.] You said that Jude's house was open always on Sunday, and that it was frequented by the middle class; would your people, for example, go there?—They might go there, but I never knew them to do so much.

1287. But they do?—You may say they do.

1288. Mr. Dawson.] Is that the description of house that they frequently go to on week days?—My own class have not time to go on week days; they go to bed when they have done business.

1289. Major Gavin.] I should like to know whether, in your opinion, public-house keepers would not be jealous if they found such a house as Jude's open on Sunday, when they were prevented from opening?—I am clearly of the opinion that they would.

1290. If one establishment was shut, you think they should all be shut?—Yes.

1291. Would you go so far as to apply that to hotels; take those in Dawson-street, and the oyster houses for instance?—I would go so far as restricting any hotel having a public bar, but the houses in Dawson-street, the Hibernian Hotel for instance, charge too dear for the working classes to go there.

1292. Mr. Murphy.] But suppose that an extra room or an addition to the building was created, what then?—I should be of opinion that any hotel having a public bar, should be restricted the same as the public house.

1293. Major Gavin.] Are there billiard tables open in Dublin on Sunday?—There are.

1294. Where you can get drink?—Yes.

1295. All Sunday?—All Sunday.

1296. Do you know whether the soldiers frequent the public-houses much on Sunday?—They do.

1297. More so than on many other days of the week?—I think they do; I see them more about the public-houses on Sunday than any other day.

1298. Do you know for what period the canteen is allowed to be open on Sunday?—I do not.

1299. You said something about people feeling sore, if they observed that their public-houses were shut on Sunday, while the club houses and hotels remained open?—Yes, I think there would be a jealousy.

1300. Nothing more than a jealousy?—I think they would feel that they were worse treated than the upper classes.

1301. You think that they would feel it an injustice?—I think so.

1302. Chairman.] You are of course aware that at the clubs in Dublin the members can get drink if they wish it at any hour on Sunday?—Yes.

1303. Do the working classes feel it an injustice that a gentleman who is a member of a club can go in and get a glass of sherry before two o'clock if he likes; did you ever hear that feeling expressed?—I never heard it expressed by any one in particular.

1304. Then what you meant was only this, that if the public-houses were closed altogether they would feel it a hardship, but not that they would expect their public-houses to be open for exactly the same time as those clubs?—That is about it, I think.

1305. I understand that you would advocate the restriction of the sale of drink in all eating-houses, and in all places that are licensed in exactly the same way as in the public-houses on Sunday?—Very strongly.

1306. But of course making an exception with regard to hotels and inns of any order for people who were living in them?—People who were actually sleeping in them.

1307. That is the only distinction you would make?—Yes.

1308. Mr. Murphy.] You mentioned the case of a man coming at seven o'clock in the evening to such a place as Mr. Jude's, for instance, after the prohibited hours, and asking for his dinner, and you said it would be very hard if he could not get something to drink, even if a law was passed prohibiting drink to be sold after six o'clock?—I think if he got his dinner he would be very likely to get some drink also.

1309. Do you think there would be any absolute objection to extending the hours to seven or eight o'clock on Sunday evening, looking at it merely as a question of degree?—I am speaking for myself and the assistants in general.

1310. You

1310. You are speaking from your own point of view, therefore?—Yes.

1311. But looking at it from the point of view of the public or the consumer, do you think there would be any particular objection to extending the time to seven or eight on Sunday?—I think seven o'clock would not be an unreasonable hour; I am giving my own opinion only.

1312. Chairman.] But your own deliberate opinion is that six o'clock would be the best hour?—I think six o'clock would be a very fair hour.

1313. Mr. Murphy.] Do you give that from your own point of view as a grocer's assistant?—Yes.

1314. Chairman.] But do you give it as your own deliberate opinion also, namely, that the best hour for closing is six o'clock, taking every point of view into consideration?—I do; I would not go further than six or seven o'clock.

1315. Mr. Stacpoole.] You would not approve of the total closing of public-houses from Saturday night till Monday morning?—I would not, for the reasons I have already stated.

O'Donnell.*

MYLES WILLIAM O'REILLY, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

The REV. LOWRY EDMONDS BERKELEY, called in; and Examined.

The Rev.
L. E.
Berkeley.
28 April
1868.

1316. Chairman.] WHAT is your profession?
—I am Presbyterian Minister in Lurgan, Ireland.
1317. You are, I believe, pretty well acquainted with the opinion of the Presbyterian body in the North of Ireland, on the subject to which this Bill relates, namely, the Sunday closing of public-houses?—Yes.

1318. Will you mention what that opinion is generally, and your reasons for holding it?—I believe that we are unanimous in the opinion that the people require the protection of the law against the traffic in strong drink during the whole of the Lord's day.

1319. When you say we, you mean, I presume, the whole of the Presbyterian Church?
—The whole of the Presbyterian Church.

1320. Including all the lay members or not?
—I believe including them, with the rarest exceptions. My reason for saying that is, that the general assembly which comprises some 600 ministers, and some 500 representative laymen, has frequently passed unanimous resolutions upon this subject, without the slightest exception being taken to them.

1321. Is the opinion of the general assembly in favour of total closing upon Sundays?—Decidedly. At the same time I think we should be glad to get anything in that direction, such as this Bill proposes to give; but we should not be satisfied without the total closing of the public-houses.

1322. Have you considered the objections or the difficulties which there would be found with respect to total closing in the first place?—Yes, I have.

1323. For instance, it has been stated that in great towns like Belfast, there would be a considerable section of that population who would not like to see the public-houses entirely closed, and that that feeling would probably lead to breaches of the law; what is your opinion upon that point?—We think there is an important difference, in two respects, between the Kingdoms of England and Ireland. In England, as I understand, drink is commonly used by people at their meals (beer, for example), and they regard it as necessary for their existence; and in towns, when they want it on the Sunday, they send out for it. In Ireland, the chief drinking is not outside the public-houses at all, it is in them; and there are very few persons, I think, with us who would send on the Sunday for the drinks that they wanted.

1324. But are there not a good many persons who, if the public-houses in a town like Belfast (I speak chiefly as to large towns), were entirely closed, would try to get shebeen houses, or other unlicensed places, open for drinking on Sunday?—I do not think that there are many people who would do that; I think the people really desire the protection of the law upon this subject. The publicans do themselves, in some cases, and a very large number of people; for example, I have remonstrated with a man who was injuring himself and his family by his drinking habits, and I have said, "Why do you go to a house to drink, instead of spending the time with your family?" and his answer was, "Get that moved out of my way, and you will have no trouble with me; put that temptation in my way, and I cannot resist it." I know myself the state of the case as regards publicans. I have spoken to a publican within the last eight days, for example, who says, "I frequently go out of the way on the Sabbath afternoon, that I may not have people asking me to let them in"; and then, he says, when he goes out of the way, his neighbour has his house open, and he gets the trade; so that I think it is unfair to one class of publicans, who wish to have the day for rest, to have any of the public-houses open.

1325. With regard to another class of objections made with reference to travellers. Many people are absent from their homes, and want to get refreshments. Are you of opinion that there is any considerable class of that sort in Ireland who would be inconvenienced by the closing of the public-house as is proposed?—I do not think that there is; of course there are persons going to hotels, but the Bill does not apply as regards travellers; I do not think that there is any considerable class of people who would be affected.

1326. This Bill proposes to leave the licensed houses open for two periods in the day; do you think that is a good plan, or would it be better, assuming that they must be open at all, to have them open for one period in the middle of the day, assuming that that one period of remaining open was somewhat longer than it is at present?—Of course I go strongly against having them open at all.

1327. I began by saying, "assuming that there was any necessity for having them open at all"?—Certainly, if they were open at one part of the day that would be better than having them open for two; I may just say I have had considerable experience experience in county districts as well as in towns, and my experience is, that the farmers and labourers in connection with the farms go to public-houses in the afternoon, say from three o'clock to nine or ten, and drink there to excess, and injure their means and their health, and unfit themselves for work on the Monday. Whatever may be the necessities, or supposed necessities, of towns, there is no kind of necessity for those places that are scattered all over the country, and which are deteriorating the character of the people most effectually; I have very strong views upon that subject, because those public-houses are scattered all up and down the rural districts where they are no manner of accommodation to the public, and where they are simply, in my opinion, corrupting the people of the district in which they are situated, and wherever such a house is open, morally destroying a large number of people in the district.

1328. May I ask what are the usual hours for Presbyterian service in the North of Ireland; the forenoon service?—The service is from twelve to two in the forenoon; some of them have afternoon service, that is from half-past one to three; and a good many have evening services from six till half-past seven, or from seven till half-past eight.

1329. Do you find it at all the practice in the North of Ireland to open a public-house close to a place of worship, so as to meet the congregation as they are coming out of service?—It was once the practice very largely, but I am happy to say that it is almost given up; and any of our members who were known to go to public-houses, after public worship on the Sabbath, would be counted not respectable or moral people; it was once the case, no doubt. Perhaps you will allow me to mention to the Committee, though possibly it does not come within the scope of your inquiry, that some of our brethren have very strong views as to the necessity of an earlier closing on Saturday night, it being their opinion that the late hour at which people get drunk on Saturday night injures them exceedingly.

1330. What hour would you suggest as a reasonable hour for closing them on Saturday night?—I should say nine o'clock.

1331. Is there any other point that you wish to mention?—There is a point upon which I know the magistrates feel very much, and I feel strongly upon it myself. Persons apply for a license and it is refused, and those parties go to the revenue and get what is called a forced license, and then the next time the subject comes up before the magistrates, they say this man has got a license already, and we may as well have the supervision of his house and give him a license ourselves; so that it is given, and the licenses are multiplied in that way, and that does great injury in our belief.

1332. What do you mean by a forced license?—It is an excise license.

1333. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] Is beer taken much by the labouring classes in your neighbourhood as a part of their Sunday meal?—I think not at all.

1334. Therefore it would be no hardship upon them not to be able to get it?—Not at all.

1335. Is there in your neighbourhood a large class of workmen living in lodgings who might be more dependent on the public-houses for their comfort upon the Sabbath than those living in houses?—No, I think not; and those who were dependent to a certain extent upon the public-houses are providing places in which to meet, and the labouring classes are trying to separate themselves from public-houses.

1336. Are you of opinion that the closing of public-houses upon the Sabbath would entail no inconvenience whatever upon the working classes upon the Sunday?—Not upon the whole.

1337. Mr. Pim.] What county do you live in?—The county of Armagh.

1338. Are there factories in that district?—There are.

1339. Are you aware that the young people in those factories are not allowed to work more than a certain number of hours a day?—I am.

1340. Are there not a large number of young people employed in the public-houses?—I think not.

1341. Are there any women employed in public-houses, such as the families of persons who keep them?—Very few with us; I should say that young men over 20 years of age are the principal persons employed in selling drink.

1342. Do you think that there is no reason why young persons of that sort should not be secured a weekly holyday?—Certainly not; and I think those young men, members some of them of my own congregation, would very much like to have that holyday; and they have often said to me that they would very much rather take any other occupation, rather than continue to work upon the Sunday as some of them were doing.

1343. Are you of opinion, therefore, that they should be secured that holyday apart from the question of whether such closing would secure increased morality on the part of the other members of the community?—Yes, and I am certain that the giving up of that employment would increase the morality of the district.

1344. Mr. Murphy.] You have said that a great many men you are acquainted with wished, in fact, to be protected against themselves, by the closing of those houses?—That is so.

1345. Turning your attention to the particular enactments in the proposed Bill before the Committee, I presume you have read them?—I am sorry that I have not read the Bill.

1346. But you know the substance of it?—I do.

1347. The object of the Bill chiefly, is to keep the public-houses on Sunday closed, with the exception of certain hours mentioned, but to allow liquors to be bought, not to be consumed upon the premises?—Yes.

1348. That being the case, do you think the permission to purchase liquor in any quantity, and the endeavour to prevent it being consumed on the premises when bought, would have any appreciable effect in doing away with the evils caused by excessive drinking?—I think it would have an appreciable effect.

1349. In what way?—The drinking, as I have said, is mainly in the public-houses, and not out of them; the people do not, as an ordinary rule, send for drink to be consumed in their own houses, and therefore, if the publicans were not allowed to permit people to sit down, I think that they would hardly go to those houses at all, and in that way I think there would be a great diminution of drunkenness.

1350. Take cities where there is plenty of room for evading the law; supposing there was a room open immediately next to a public-house, I where people could go and sit and consume their liquor, do you think, if that were the case, the evil you speak of would be appreciably remedied?—I think there is a class of people who, in that case, would go to that tap-room, but they are the very lowest class; I think people would not, to anything like the same extent, go to a place of that kind that now go to that public-house.

1351. But why?—Because there is a sort of degradation associated with that.

1352. But how would there be a degradation associated with going to a room of that sort when there is no degradation associated with going to a tap-room, assuming that the place was part and parcel of the same public-house, although next door?—I think their going to a place like that would show simply that they had a very decided love for drink.

1353. What do they do now when they go to a tap-room; is it to show that they have not a desire for drink?—I think it is very much the result of people meeting one another, and going to talk together.

1354. If they had an opportunity of doing that under another name, which they do now, do you or do you not think the same effects would remain?—I still think there is a class of people who go to the public-houses, and would not go to such a room as you speak of.

1355. In your opinion it is an arguable point?—It is.

1356. You stated that you thought a continuous opening for a certain number of hours on the Sunday would be better than an intermittent opening; you think that if houses are to be opened on Sunday for a certain time for the sale of liquor, that it is better to have it all in one time instead of having it intermittently?—I stated that upon the supposition that if there was but one time the time would be so much shorter.

1357. In your view the shorter the time the better?—Decidedly.

1358. Have you directed your attention at all in cities or in large towns to what the effect would be of intermittent opening as contrasted with continuous opening so far as the authorities are concerned?—I have not given my attention to that particular point, so that I could not give an opinion upon that.

1359. There is a proposed provision in the Bill whereby parties having eating-houses can be permitted to sell any quantity of liquors they like on Sunday, and to have the place open whatever the time assigned by law for that purpose is; do you think it probable, particularly in cities and large towns, that if total closing took place, or if the provisions of this Bill were carried into effect to prevent consumption upon the premises, a class of people would be induced under the name of eating, to go to those places to consume whatever quantity of liquor they liked?—I think it very likely, but I do not see why those places should be so permitted to open.

1360. Major Gavin.] You reside in Lurgan, do you not?—Yes, I do.

1361. Are there any club-houses in Lurgan?

—No; there is no house going exactly under that name; there are rooms where particular classes of politicians meet.

1362. Reading-rooms?—Yes, reading-rooms, and also lecture rooms.

1363. Where you can get a glass of wine or claret or anything of that kind?—No; they do not in any of the reading-rooms or club-houses keep drink that I am aware of, nor in what you may call the Orange Hall.

1364. But the first-class hotels are open on the Sunday, are they not?—Yes; they are open on Sunday.

1365. Are they frequented by the better order of the people on Sunday?—I think not to a large extent.

1366. There are dinners given, I suppose, by the better class of people sometimes?—There are not with us many Sunday diners; the only parties frequenting the hotels on Sundays with us, are people who are travelling, and perhaps a class of fast young men, or people of that sort.

1367. Or men of the better class?—Yes.

1368. Do you not think that, to make use of the expression, the lower orders of the middle classes would naturally feel jealous if they were deprived of their enjoyment on the Sunday, when those higher than themselves were enabled to partake of such enjoyments?—I do not think they would; I think decidedly the working people with us wish for the protection of the law against themselves, so to speak.

1369. And they would not feel any jealousy in seeing those above them enjoying themselves, when they themselves have not the opportunity of doing so?—No; especially as those who go to the hotels are very few indeed, and of that particular class that they would not wish to be mixed up with.

1370. And do you not think that there are fast people in the middle classes as well as in the upper classes?—I dare say there are.

1371. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] You were talking about people getting liquor from those public-houses in the hour or two they were open; is it your opinion even supposing that was done, there would be much less drunkenness than if the liquor was consumed in the public-house?—Yes; decidedly.

1372. And you think that very few people would be led on to getting drunk if they had to send for their liquor?—Yes; I think very few would get drunk under these circumstances.

1373. Mr. Murphy.] What is the population of Lurgan?—It is about 10,000.

1374. Mr. Cubitt.] Do you think that you are speaking for most of the Presbyterian ministers?—Yes I think so; they are unanimous in their wish to have the entire day, and I may say that I am speaking also for the people; I think there is hardly any exception.

1375. Mr. Murphy.] But your experience does not go to the habits of people generally in the town, does it?—No, not generally; I have resided in a very large parish, and I reside now in a large town, so that I have experience in that way.

FRANK THORP PORTER, Esq., called in; and Examined.

F. T. Porter,
Esq.

1376. Chairman.] You were formerly a divisional magistrate, were you not?—Magistrate of the head office of the Dublin police for twenty years and three months.

1377. You have thought a good deal, have you not, upon this question of restricting the sale of liquors on Sunday, and have formed a decided opinion on the subject, I believe?—I have formed an

an opinion on the subject, drawn just from my experience of the City of Dublin, from the locality in which I had to act for the years I have mentioned, and also I have a general opinion derived from my own experience as a member of society.

1378. Would you kindly give that opinion to the Committee?—My opinion is against the principle of restriction; I mean to say, if it is not too figurative, that if you plant the tree I do not think you will get any beneficial fruits from it; I do not think that it will produce beneficial results; I would not expect them from it.

1379. Will you kindly say how far you carry that opinion; am I right in believing that you are against all restrictions whatever on the subject of buying and selling?—I mean this: that it is my deliberate opinion that if you were to close the public-houses in the extensive division I had to deal with in Dublin you would not have less intoxication or less cases before the magistrates on the Monday morning.

1380. Am I right in thinking that your opinion goes further than that; that is, that on principle you are opposed to any restrictions on the sale of liquors?—I do not think that from the existing restrictions any beneficial result has arisen.

1381. Am I right in inferring that you would be for abolishing the existing restrictions as well as for not increasing them?—I do not say that I would be for abolishing the existing restrictions; I would leave them as a caput mortuum; I do not think they have done any good, and I think the public would be just as well without them, but I do not want anybody to try any experiments on my mere judgment.

1382. How far am I to understand you that the existing restrictions are a caput mortuum, or a dead letter; do you conceive now that the closing from eleven at night to half past one on Sunday is a dead letter?—I believe that those who are inclined for liquor—persons inclined to meet and have their liquor—get it just as freely at a restricted hour as they do after two o'clock in the afternoon of a Sunday; the last Sunday I was in town I saw a horrible case of drunkenness, and on looking at my watch I found that it was five minutes to 11 in the forenoon; that day week before that, at Inchicore, in the suburbs of Dublin, I saw two young lads miserably drunk between 11 and 12, and am quite satisfied that they got the liquor at illicit houses and hours.

1383. Would you also go as far with me this way, that you consider that at present those who are bent on getting drunk do get the liquor during the hours the public-houses are nominally closed? May I not infer that the closing of public-houses during the rest of the day would produce as much effect during those hours as it does during the present hours when they are closed?—I think that if you shut the public-houses completely up you would have an enormous amount of illicit traffic done, which no police could detect or stop.

1384. But would there be more illicit traffic done if they were shut during those hours than there is during the hours that they are now shut?—I understand you to ask whether the additional closing of the houses would lead to an increase in the illicit traffic?

1385. That is my question?—Yes, I think it would.

1386. More than in proportion to the increased number of hours?—I think it would; that is my own speculative opinion. I think that the feelings of the people would rebel against the total closing of the public-houses.

1387. But if, as you say, every man who is bent upon getting drink now gets it during the hours that the public-houses are closed, what more people would get it during the other hours that they were closed; there would not be any more people to get it then?—I admit that; but I do not think that the closing or opening would make any difference.

1388. You stated as your opinion that the closing or opening of the public-houses would not make any difference?—Not according to my own opinion or my own experience.

1389. I mean the closing for the rest of the day would make no more difference than the closing for the half of that time?—I think not; I may be permitted to say this, that in my memory there has been the most marked improvement in the moral condition of the operative classes in Dublin; a wonderful improvement. I recollect in my childhood (my father was a very extensive printer), that I never went into his printing-office when there was not a certain number of the people drunk; liquor was most inordinately used amongst them; drunkenness was almost the rule, and I have known it to be the same in other places. Now, I think you might go into fifty respectable printing-offices in the city of Dublin, and if there was a fellow inclined to inebriety, his fellow-workmen would not associate with him. There is a total reformation in that respect, and I believe, even in other trades, to a great extent also; I do not ascribe that change to any operation of law or statutory enactment, I ascribe it to the progress of civilization and self-respect, and feelings of decency amongst the operatives.

1390. Do you remember the state of the case before the passing of Perrin's Act?—I do; I was not in office at that time. With regard to drinking away from public-houses, I may mention this, that the worst cases of drinking, I do not mean of intoxication, but the worst cases of drinking I ever knew were not in public-houses. I recollect the murder of a man at Bansha, in the county of Tipperary, when I was on circuit, and the murderers who had agreed to kill him fortified themselves with a lot of whisky first, at a ball alley; and I remember the murder of a man named Rowe, at Kilkenny, and in that case there was a previous drinking, but not in a public house; the whisky was provided, and it was taken elsewhere.

1391. Is your opinion chiefly formed from your experience of Dublin, or would you extend the same opinions to the purely agricultural districts? I do not profess to be acquainted with the agricultural districts of late years. I form my opinion more from Dublin and its suburbs. My division extended to a considerable distance on the south side of Dublin and contained a very mixed population.

1392. And, therefore, in some respects the circumstances were different from those of the purely agricultural districts of Ireland?—Yes, they were manufacturing people and working tradesmen, a great number of them. I may say that I have got a newspaper with me in which there is a report of evidence given by Sir Thomas Henry before a Committee, relative to the sale of liquors on Sunday in England.

1393. Is that the Committee which is now sitting?—It seems that it was on Thursday last. He says just this, that he had noticed a decided diminution, not only in cases of drunkenness but also in breaches of the law, on the part of publicans; that that change was owing to the improved habits, education and tastes of the people generally. So far as that goes, as to the improved habits of the people, I would say ditto for Dublin.

1394. You are aware, I suppose, as every Irishman is, that in very large districts of Ireland, districts increasing yearly, all the public-houses have been closed on Sunday by an agreement on the part of the people themselves. I mean in the whole of the diocese of Cashel and the diocese of Emly (I am speaking of Roman Catholic dioceses), and Ferns and Kilmore, and in many other towns out of these dioceses the public-houses have been entirely closed and with good results?—I am aware of that.

1395. Does not that show that in large districts at least in Ireland, the public opinion of the people is in favour of closing the public-houses on Sunday?—The public opinion of the people elicited in a particular way may be. I am satisfied that there are thousands in those places that would shudder at kicking against the moral and religious influence that has been brought to bear upon them, and that if there was an Act of Parliament in the way they are the very people who would glory in throwing its provisions aside.

1396. Even though it was backed by religious opinion?—My opinion would be, that the strength of that statute would be derived from the moral influence behind it, and not from itself; that if it had not that influence behind it it would be like a piece of dry paper against the wall, it would fall; but paste it with moral influence and power, and it will stick there and remain.

1397. Is it not the fact that a great part of the strength of all laws is derived from their unison with the moral sentiment of the people, and that no law could be considered effective which violates the moral sentiment of the people?—The more of that principle there is in law the more respected the law will be, but there are many laws, mala prohibita, of which people only seek an opportunity of evasion or infraction.

1398. Is there anything else you would like to mention to the Committee?—No; I would merely be understood as giving my opinion against the principle of restriction, and to say that I would ascribe no value to it on my own experience.

1399. Sir Graham Montgomery.] Would you carry out this principle of non-restriction so far as to say that you would allow free trade in the sale of liquors without having any license?—No, I do not want to interfere with the revenue, but it is on a revenue principle alone that I say that. To a man of excellent character, probity and propriety of conduct I think I would give a license on the same terms as I would to anybody else.

1400. You would restrict the principle so far as to say that it should not be open to everybody to sell drink, but only to those licensed by the magistrates?—I would wish to see the principle carried out which has been adopted in France, giving great power and authority to the proprietor of the house to enforce order, and attaching to him, at the same time, a responsibility for the way in which that house was conducted. In France a liquor vendor is, I may say, a magistrate within his walls, and has power and authority to repress excess or disorder, and he is held responsible that he shall exercise that authority; and if he does not exercise that authority, and if he allows habitual intoxication, he is brought to the Maire, convicted of it, fined a certain sum, and then he is given a handsome advertisement or pasteboard which he must hang up in his place of business for one month to let his customers know that he has been convicted of allowing habitual intoxication; and if he does not reform the place and conduct it properly he is shut up.

1401. And you would like to see the licensing system in Ireland adapted to some sort of proceeding like that?—I would.

1402. You stated that you were inclined to believe that parties who wished to get drink would get it somehow?—That is my opinion. There was a limekiln in my former division, in a place called the Long Lane; and I am sure that hundreds of cases of intoxication have come to our office from fellows that have got liquor and made themselves snug by the limekiln, and relieved themselves from the horrors of sobriety there.

1403. Do you not think that, in a large city like Dublin, there would be a number of people who would be inclined to take spirits if they could get them, but who, if the houses were shut, would never think of doing so?—I admit this, that it would lessen temptation, and it would lessen the influence of a badly-disposed person; of course, there is nothing that cannot be turned to a good or a bad purpose.

1404. Still, you think there would be a large class of persons who would be tempted by the public-houses being opened on the Sundays, who might not be tempted if they were closed?—From my own personal experience, I cannot say much as to that; but my opinion is, that those who were inveterately inclined for it would have the liquor.

1405. But I was talking of those who could be tempted; do you not think there would be a very large class, in a large town like Dublin, who would be subject to temptation?—They would be subject to temptation; and I think that if you close the public-houses on Sunday totally and entirely, it would lead to the observance of what they call Saint Monday, and that they would make up on the Monday for what they had not had on Sunday. Monday, in my early magisterial time, was a very bad day; there was a very great deal of drinking on the Monday.

1406. But that was in addition to the drinking on Sunday, was it not?—Yes; I think they made up on the Monday for what they did not get on Sunday.

1407. Mr. O'Neill.] With regard to what has just been said, do you not think that putting aside the inveterate drunkard, there is a very large class, perhaps the largest class, of those who are tempted into intemperance, who go to the public-house mainly for the society and amusement that they find there; not with any intention of getting drunk, but who are perhaps led into intemperance by seeing it before them?—By subtle influences.

1408. Exactly?—I believe there are a great many people who will go to places of that kind not intending to get drunk, and they are led insensibly into indulgences; and then I beg to say I would meet that by referring to what I would propose to be adopted. I would make the publican or the people conducting that house accountable, that they should not allow habitual intoxication, intoxication, that they should not allow people to get drunk in their place, but refuse to supply a drink to persons who had already had enough. 1409. But if there was a possibility of their getting drunk at illicit houses, even with that arrangement that you have suggested, do you not think that your plan would become ineffectual, because people would go to a house where there was less control than there was in an orderly house?—They would have recourse to the illicit houses of course in a great degree; and I do believe there is an enormous amount of illicit traffic carried on in Dublin. There was in my time, I am sure.

1410. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] You stated that you would give the keepers of public-houses power to turn people out of their public-houses, and make them accountable for what took place in their houses, and you stated that that system prevailed in France. Do you not think that such regulation is much more easily enforced in France, where the people drink wine, than it could be in Ireland, where the people drink spirits?—From my own observation, which I must say is limited to Paris and to Brittany, I think the French are more of a beer drinking people than a wine drinking people.

1411. Then take it as to beer, is not a man much more controllable if he has drunk beer than if he has drunk spirits?—That may be so, but I did not see intoxication in France at all.

1412. But from your experience of what takes place in the public-houses of both countries, would you not say that the people who had drunk a certain quantity in France would be much more amenable to discipline than if they had drunk a certain quantity in Ireland, whether it be from the nature of the liquor they drink, or from the temperament of the people?—I have seen people in France, who would appear to be a little lively, demanding liquor, and they were immediately refused, and ordered out of the house.

1413. And was that order in every case obeyed?—It was obeyed at once, because the responsibility, I understood, would be very heavy for refusing to carry it out. I was last summer in Saint Malo, and I went one Sunday to see a procession. I got no breakfast before I went, and between 11 and 12, nearly 12, I went into a restaurant and asked for some breakfast. It was furnished to me, and two men, evidently seafaring men, came in and demanded some Cognac. They were refused and ordered out, and they went out immediately, and I think that was a very suitable way of dealing with those fellows, who appeared to have had a little drop before, that they should get no more.

1414. Did those men appear to be drunk, or would they not sell spirits to them under any circumstances?—They appeared to be a little flushed, and they could not get any more, but that was no reason why I should not get my breakfast.

1415. Could you suggest any other alteration in the general licensing system in Ireland beyond that to which you have adverted?—My experience goes only to Dublin.

1416. That is a very extensive experience?—My experience would suggest this fact, that there are five divisional justices in Dublin, and I would give them the authority of licensing. It is at present done by the court of quarter sessions, and that court of quarter sessions consists of one individual, and that one individual knows very little, I may say as little as any one could know, about public-houses and the sale of liquor.

1417. And that one individual might possibly be liable to pressure?—I should not say so; there would be no intimidation if you mean that.

1418. I do not mean that the magistrate would be intimidated, but he would be asked to give a license as a favour, perhaps?—I do not think the word favour could be used with reference to the Recorder of Dublin.

1419. Although that could not be the case as regards the present Recorder, but such a thing might happen, might it not?—Yes, you might have another Recorder of a different tendency.

1420. At present spirits are sold very much by the licensed grocers, are they not?—Yes. Supposing the public-houses were closed on Sunday, do you think that very much drinking would take place at the licensed grocers if they were allowed to remain open?—My opinion is, that I would merge those who are commonly called licensed grocers into one class with the publicans. I would have but one license.

1421. You would have them under the same regulations as the public-houses?—Yes, I would. I find that the number of licensed houses for consumption on the premises is 1,006, and of spirit grocers not allowed to consume on the premises, 189. I would see no objection to merging these two classes into one another; that is, by paying the same license, for I am really not aware what the respective amounts of the licenses are, but I think there is a distinction without a difference, and I believe that some of these spirit grocers act as publicans to a very great extent.

1422. You have stated that you thought that if the public-houses were closed all the Sunday, or nearly all the Sunday, the working classes would make up for their privation on the Monday. As it is, Monday is a very idle day for many of the artisans in Dublin, is it not?—It is for many of them, but not one-fourth of the number that it was in my boyhood. They are a wonderfully improved class.

1423. But those who are idle on the Monday are very generally idle for the purpose of getting over the booseyness of the previous day; is not that so?—I do not say so; I think that the Monday amongst those people is a continuation of the idleness of the Sunday.

1424. And perhaps they are a little incapacitated for work from having indulged a little too freely on the previous day?—That might be so with some.

1425. I think you stated just now that everybody who was bent upon getting drunk would get drunk whether the public-houses were open or not; but is it not the case now that many get drunk who are not bent upon doing so?—I have no doubt that many persons go into a public-house without intending to get drunk, but they are led on from one thing to another; but if there was a responsibility put upon the proprietor of that public-house that he should not allow people to get drunk on his premises, I think there would be a remedy for that.

1426. But do you think that, practically speaking, the proprietors of public-houses would have the power to stop excess in the manner in which it is done in France, arising from the temperament perament of the people and their habits?—I think there would be a little difficulty perhaps in the working; but I think it could be carried out, because there is no country where this would tell better for the proprietor to say, "You know I cannot allow it; I dare not allow it;" particularly if he had authority imparted to him, and the law supported that authority.

1427. Take the case you mentioned just now where you were having your breakfast, and the men who came in were refused spirits, do you think any publican in Ireland would have the courage to refuse those people a glass of Cognac if they could just step across the way and get drink at another public-house?—I do not think that those men would get it in the next public-house at St. Malo.

1428. I did not say at St. Malo, but at Dublin?—I think if there were the same responsibilities and the same power the Dublin people could work it just as well, and I do not think that there is adequate punishment inflicted on houses in Dublin, and perhaps in other parts of Ireland, which are, as I might say, temples of intemperance. If I am not intruding on the time of the Committee, I may say this, that a little time back I went with a friend out to the south part of the county of Dublin; it was on a Sunday, and when we were coming in we were admonished to this effect, "You had better take a little detour, and not go by a certain road, for there is a public-house there which every Sunday evening is full of drunken fellows, and their rioting might be very violent and annoying"; we did go that way as quietly as we could, and I saw a lot of fellows fighting, wrangling, and making a great uproar and disorder; and what I say upon that is that I would not only close that house on Sunday, but I would close it also on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday; I would shut it up altogether.

1429. You have stated that you thought there would be an illicit sale of spirits on the Sunday if the public-houses were closed; have not the police succeeded in stopping the illicit sale and also the illicit distillation of spirits to a great extent?—I never heard of illicit distillation in Dublin previous to my magisterial life; while I was in office there were two detections. I understand there has been one since I went out of office, and as to preventing the illicit traffic in spirits, the police are very energetic and are very anxious to do their duty, but I do not think they have succeeded in putting down the traffic.

1430. But they have suppressed it very much, have they not, if they have not altogether extinguished it?—I think there are a number of houses in Dublin that they have not been able to come at, and that perhaps they will not be able to come at, and where great trade is done. There is this to be said, that if a man has a license, the police can come and inspect his premises at all times. If he has not a license, although he is driving a considerable traffic in illicit spirits, there must be a sworn information laid, and a warrant obtained, before those premises can be entered by the police.

1431-2. But supposing this illicit trade in spirits was to be increased, would there be any difficulty in sworn informations being laid, and the trade being suppressed in that manner, supposing it became general; and do you not think that the police would be able to stop it?—I do not think that they have been able to stop it. I have every reason to believe that an illicit traffic is carried on in some of the most of the respectable streets in Dublin, and also in some of the most obscure and disreputable parts of the city.

1433. Mr. Pim.] I think I understood you to state that you thought that the restrictions upon the public-houses were of very little value; would you go so far as to say that you would have no restrictions as regards hours, but allow a man to keep his house open to whatever hour he liked, or close at whatever hour he liked?—My opinion may appear to you to be very extraordinary; but I do conceive if you give authority to a man to conduct his house properly, and hold him responsible for the exercise of that authority, you need not ask him then about his hours at all.

1434. I understand you to state that you do approve of licensing; you would not allow any person to engage in the trade without a license?—I would not allow a man to engage in the trade without a license. First of all, there is the revenue to consider, which I am not insensible to; in the next place, the withdrawal of the license would be a proper mode of punishing a publican, if he allowed habitual intoxication and misconduct on his premises; and if the licenses were abolished, you would not then be able to deal with the man who made his place a temple of intemperance.

1435. In fact, you rely more on proper surveillance as to the mode in which a house is conducted, than upon any restrictions as to time?—Yes, I do.

1436. Do I understand you to say that you think there ought to be only one license, that is, that there ought to be no spirit grocers' license, as distinct from the licensed vintners?—I think that to merge the 189 spirit grocers with the others, and to have only the one license, would be the better plan.

1437. Are spirit grocers allowed to sell spirits to be consumed upon the premises?—No.

1438. Do you think that they do, as a matter of fact?—I have had to record convictions against several of them for it.

1439. What is your opinion with reference to the authority for granting licenses; would your idea be that there should be some authority like the recorder, or would you allow any one to obtain a licensed vintner's license if he paid the sum of money that the license came to?—I would grant him a license, having given a reference as to his character. I certainly should require a good character, and I would also take into consideration the means that he had, or was reputed to have, for carrying it on respectably and fairly.

1440. You have stated that you did not approve any restrictions on Sunday, as regards the sale of spirits; in fact, you would allow a man to keep open the whole day if he choose; but would you like the same rule to apply to all other trades. You are aware it is not lawful to keep an ordinary shop open on Sunday; would you apply the same rule to all other places of business?—That is a very novel question to me. The trades to which you have before referred are trades administering to the interior comforts, with reference to eating and drinking, and the necessities of existence. A man does not require to buy and sell other articles on Sunday; there is no necessity, surely, for that; but a man will be hungry and thirsty on Sunday just the same as upon any other day.

1441. Are

F. T. Porter,
Esq.28 April

1441. Are you aware that the employés in public-houses are very hard worked; they begin at a very early hour in the morning, and the custom of the trade is to keep the houses open till a very late hour in the evening, so that their hours of labour are very long; do you think that is likely to be beneficial to them in a physical or moral point of view?—I would refer that to their own discretion, I would not interfere with it; I know if I was in any business I would not work more than I thought was consistent with my own comfort and my own interest.

1442. Part of the effect of closing other establishments on Sunday is to secure to the employés of those establishments a weekly holiday?—I think there ought to be a fair arrangement made between the employer and the employé; with regard to that I may mention that in the neighbourhood of the great markets in Paris, in the neighbourhood of the Halles, there are houses that are never shut from one year's end to the other, and there is a relay of servants who come in at night, because people are arriving from great distances to those markets, and they require refreshments at one, two or three o'clock in the morning, and there is accordingly a relay of servants provided for the night. I think that no servants either in a public-house or anywhere else ought to be worked beyond what it was fair to expect from them.

1443. You think that there is no occasion for any legislative protection?—The question is novel to me; I think as between master and servant there should be an arrangement to do so much service for such and such times, and to get such and such payments for it.

1444. Mr. Murphy.] I will deal exclusively with the Bill before us in asking you these questions; have you read the Bill as proposed, or do you know what the general purport of it is?—I do.

1445. You are aware that the Bill proposes to restrict the hours for the sale of liquors on Sundays?—Yes.

1446. To restrict it to the hours mentioned in the Act?—Yes.

1447. And to have two separate periods on Sundays for sale?—Yes.

1448. Is it your opinion (and I speak now partly as a matter of police supervision, and partly as a matter of convenience to the public), that if public-houses were allowed to be open on Sunday, a continuous time would be better than an intermittent time for the opening of those houses; that one entire period from the time they would be permitted to be open until the time they were obliged to be closed, would be better than to have a period of one or two hours at one part of the day, and one or two hours at another part of the day?—As a matter of opinion I would have it continuous; I would not divide it; I think the division would not be attended with any benefit to the public, and I rather think that it would be attended with great discomfort to people engaged in that trade.

1449. As a matter of police supervision, is it your opinion that it would be better in that point of view also, to have the time continuous?—I do.

1450. By the provisions of that Bill, liquor is permitted to be sold, but not permitted to be consumed on the premises; are you of opinion that if an enactment of that kind was made a law, it would be possible to carry out such a provision, namely, to allow spirits to be sold, but not to be consumed on the premises?—I think not; you might have a good deal of it taken away, but a good deal of it would be consumed where it was bought.

1451. The great evil complained of with regard to excessive drinking is this, that by having a taproom open in a public-house it insensibly leads parties who otherwise might not do so to commit excesses by going in there and meeting friends, and one party drinking and offering another drink, and so on, and the object of the Bill is to prevent that taproom drinking, although to allow spirits to be bought; do you think, from your experience of Dublin, which of course is an instance of a large city, that if no taproom (for that is the way to put it in the popular sense) was allowed to be open in a public-house on Sunday, that would induce the proprietors of those houses to rent a house next them which they could let out the whole year round in lodgings, and earn the rent of, so as to have a room analogous to the taproom, convenient or next door to their house, where people could go into and sit and consume their liquor?—If you buy liquor such a person would allow you to sit and consume it; there might be something in that, but I think there would be considerable counter practice; a man would get the liquor and drink it at the counter.

1452. Do you not think that if there was in effect a taproom next door to the public-house the people would sit there?—I dare say they would.

1453. Is it your opinion that if liquor was not allowed to be consumed on the Sunday in the public-house it would lead to illicit traffic or to an undue purchase of spirits to be consumed elsewhere; for instance, if people were not allowed to consume the liquor on the premises they would probably buy more than they wanted and take it to another place?—I think there would be an immense deal of illicit traffic, and I have to observe this, I have seen at racecourses a great deal of intoxication, and I am satisfied that the means were not acquired at a public-house, but brought there, and at reviews in the Phoenix Park I have seen many cases of drunkenness.

1454. But these might be taken as exceptional cases?—I think that if they were debarred from getting liquor under ordinary circumstances they will provide themselves with it either in an illicit way or previously.

1455. The necessary consequence of that would be, that the honest trader who would comply with this law, if carried into effect, would be deprived of a certain portion of legitimate profit, which if the liquor was allowed to be consumed on his premises he would have?—I think that would be the result.

1456. The necessary consequence of course would be, that you would injure the trader to a certain extent, and you would not benefit the public?—Exactly.

1457. Are you acquainted with the habits of the artisans and tradespeople of Dublin in going out on Sundays to the various suburbs to take their little pleasure; is it the custom that a great many go out with their wives and children on Sunday to Kingstown, and various other places near home—Dundrum and all those kind of places?—Not so much as I could wish them to do, but they do stroll out, the young men seldom stop in the town on Sunday; they walk off; make a walking party out towards the mountains or towards the sea, or round about.

1458. Is it not natural to suppose that either going or coming back, if they found a public-house on the way, they would step in and get some refreshment; some bread and cheese, some porter, or a glass of spirits or punch, or anything of that kind?—I think it is very natural that they would; and I may mention that there is a place near Dublin, called Dollymount, in the Clontarf direction, and I have seen upwards of a hundred of those hired vehicles, the jaunting cars there, and great numbers of pedestrians; the place perfectly crowded, and the garden behind it crowded; and though I have been out in that neighbourhood a good deal, I never saw a case of disgraceful drunkenness at Dollymount.

1459. Chairman.] Will you explain to the Committee what you mean by disgraceful drunkenness?—I would recall the word disgraceful, and say positive drunkenness, with violence or indecent language.

1460. Mr. Murphy.] I presume with regard to a house such as you describe, its principal business is on Sunday?—I have heard that on a Sunday they often take as much as in all the rest of the week.

1461. Taking an instance of that kind as a representation of a class all through the country, particularly in the neighbourhood of large cities, all through Ireland, is it your opinion that if this law which is proposed now were carried into effect, namely, that for three or four hours on a Sunday liquors should be permitted to be sold, but not to be consumed there, that would tend to promote the morals of that portion of the public who would be in the habit of frequenting those places; and, at the same time, would it or would not it have an injurious effect upon the proprietor of that house on his legitimate trade?—I do not think that it would signify in a moral point of view to the people if they were precluded from having those little creature comforts which they never appeared to me, when I have been in that neighbourhood, to abuse.

1462. But it would have a decidedly injurious effect upon the proprietor's trade?—Unquestionably, without doing any good. With reference to what course I would take with those licensed houses, I may mention this, that in a street in my division there were two houses; there was one that I never had reason to believe that an intoxicated person came from, and there was another where I believe there were 40 or 50 men intoxicated every night, and in that case the proprietor would call on his people to get those fellows out before the police came round to see that the house was closed. When the unfortunate drunken creatures were put out in the street the house was closed, and that proprietor might look the constable in the face, and shut at 11 o'clock; and the way that I would do would be to shut that man up totally and entirely, no matter at what hour he allowed beastly intoxication to be practised on his premises.

1463. I want to ask you another question which has been suggested by what you have said; have you formed any opinion as to whether the hours for closing on Sunday night should be restricted from what they are at present allowed as by law; you are aware that a public-house can be kept open till 11, practically half-past 11, on Sunday night by the present law; do you think that it would be an improvement if the hour was restricted to ten or nine o'clock on Sunday night?—I do not think there would be much resulting from it one way or the other; the houses in Dublin must shut at 11 o'clock, say on a Saturday night. The houses in Liverpool can remain open till 12, and I think you will have, comparatively speaking, as many people drunk in Dublin as you would have in Liverpool.

1464. You are not acquainted personally, or officially, or by experience of your own, with the data of drunkenness about Liverpool, so as to compare them with Dublin?—No, I am not.

1465. You do not know Liverpool as well as you know Dublin?—I do not.

1466. Major Gavin.] It has been given in evidence that it would tend to check drunkenness a good deal if the public-houses were closed early on Saturday evening; what is your opinion with reference to that; the reason given is this, that many labouring people and so on, get their wages on Saturday, and go, after having received them, into a public-house, and drink too much there, and then continue it again on a Sunday. Do you think if public-houses were closed earlier on a Saturday night so as to check that, it would have a beneficial effect?—It might, of course, prevent many cases of intoxication, but, I believe, in my town the practice is for respectable employers to settle at rather an earlier time on a Saturday with their workmen.

1467. Although they may be settled with at an early time, yet they are not relieved from their duty at that early time; they go away, I suppose, at six o'clock, the usual hour?—Or some of them even later. I do not think if the police returns were looked to, that there is a greater proportion of drunkenness on a Saturday night than for any other night in the week.

1468. Chairman.] Are you acquainted particularly with their returns, because we have returns from the Commissioners of Police for the last five years, which go to show that there is a very much larger proportion on Saturday?—I have not been in office for these five years.

1469. Major Gavin.] But I would like to get an answer to the last question; whether you are of opinion that the closing of the public-houses early on the Saturday would have a beneficial effect in checking the drunkenness on the Sunday; that is to say, a man takes to drink on Saturday night, he has his money in his pocket, and has something left on the Sunday, and continues the drinking; we have had evidence of that?—If he is a person of an intemperate disposition or intemperate habits, he will not be so well able to indulge in those habits if the houses are shut, unless he goes to some illicit place.

1470. You think if the public-houses were shut, he would find an illicit place to go to?—I do in Dublin.

1471. You stated in answer to the Honourable Chairman, that you thought that if this was passed into law, it would be evaded; that in effect it was generally the case that Irishmen were glad of evading a restrictive law; did I not understand you to say something to that effect?—I think that an Act of Parliament would not have anything like the effect upon them that a moral suasion and a religious influence would.

1472. Are you aware that we have had evidence before us here, that the Roman Catholic Bishop in Tipperary, and the Roman Catholic Bishop in Kilmore, without the aid of an Act of of Parliament, had succeeded in closing every public-house on the Sunday, and even persons not of the Roman Catholic persuasion have aided and assisted in carrying out their wishes?—I am aware, myself, on the very best authority, that in the diocese of Ferns, last Saint Patrick's day, the 17th of March, the public-houses were all shut, and nobody would have gone to them if they had been open.

1473. Do you think, in Dublin, from your experience, that if the Roman Catholic clergymen were assisted by such a law as we are about to pass, that law would succeed eventually in not being evaded?—I protest, that I think if they banded themselves together without the law at all, they would do it just as well.

1474. Then you suppose that if they did use the exertions which other clergymen have, they would succeed in their object?—I wish to say this, there may be very much greater facility in a rural district, in a county like Tipperary or Wexford, for effecting such a matter, than in the close and dense population of a city.

1475. But you say, yourself, that within your knowledge, within the last 20 years, drunkenness has been checked considerably, from the education of the people, and from their having better habits and better modes of amusing themselves, and of course having been benefited by religious influence?—I think the influence to which you refer would be very strong; it is very strong in Dublin, but I do not say that it would be as strong in Dublin as it would be in the rural districts and in the country villages and towns, but I am satisfied that it would be very strong in Dublin.

1476. Then I may arrive at this conclusion, that you are of opinion that if this law was aided and abetted by the Roman Catholic clergymen and all the clergymen of all persuasions, it might be carried out in a respectable way, and not evaded?—That is the principle of substituting sobriety for excess and intoxication; if they inculcated that, and enforced it morally, and insisted upon it, I may say, with their flocks, the desired effect would be arrived at.

1477. Chairman.] Would you approve of a change in the law which would enable the magistrates to inflict a fine upon persons found drinking in a public-house at the time at which it was closed by law as well as on the owner of the house?—I would not, whatever the law may be; I would put the consequences of an infraction of that law within the walls of the premises, upon the proprietor of those premises.

1478. You mentioned that there are refreshment houses in Paris, near the markets, which are kept open the whole year through; you have resided a good deal in France, I believe?—I was in Paris for upwards of 18 months.

1479. Are you not aware that there are a great many manufactories, shops, and every sort of mercantile establishment in France that are kept open from year's end to year's end, without any regard to Sunday, and that there are a great many thousands of working men in France compelled to work every day in the year?—I am quite aware that there is a trade carried on on the Sunday without any respect to the day, bricklayers, carpenters, masons, and plasterers, and I believe that the Government is not averse to that, because I have seen the public works going on at the Tuilleries on the Sabbath, and if Government wished to have the Sabbath respected, they would not have the public works carried on in their own palace.

1480. You may add another fact, that the Government establishments used to be kept at work on Sunday; then I think that I may infer from that that the fact that the refreshment-houses are kept open in France would not be an argument in favour of keeping refreshment-houses open in this country, where we do not keep other establishments open upon Sunday?—I have noticed that merely for this purpose, that though they were open Sunday and week-day, and without restriction as to hours, still I could not see the intoxication.

1481. I will just ask you one other question; are you aware that in France, for many years back, the greatest efforts have been made by the clergy, and by all persons I may say interested in morality, to put a stop to the practice of working and trading on Sundays, which sprang up at the revolution?—I know that all the clergy and all persons in religious orders that I have had any communication with are opposed to the habitual infraction of the Sabbath; and if I were to give a suggestion to the French Government it would be to pass a law to order the people to work upon a Sunday, and if it came out that there was an order that they should work upon the Sunday they would not do so.

1482. Mr. Pim.] You have said a good deal about making publicans accountable for giving drink to persons already drunk upon their premises; do you think as a magistrate that that could be practically worked out?—I do. I think that by giving authority to the proprietor of the house, and supporting him in the exercise of it, it could be done.

1483. Would you propose to visit an infraction of that regulation by a penalty, or depriving the house of the license?—There was a house where two fellows insisted upon having drink, and the waiter refused to give it them, and they kicked the waiter for refusing to give them what they required; they were brought before me next morning, and I made them pay sixpence each to the Queen, and forty shillings each to the waiter, and I do not think the waiter had the least objection to the manner in which I disposed of the case, and I do not think that those fellows kicked a waiter again for a considerable time.

1484. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] Is it your opinion that the people use the public-houses open on Sunday afternoon to entrap people into the Fenian conspiracy?—The Fenian conspiracy has cropped up since I ceased to be a police magistrate. I had to deal with a former piece of folly—the young Irelandism of 1848; I have no reason to think that there were any facilities afforded to it by the public-houses more than would have been afforded to the meeting of people engaged in any other project.

1485. But am I to understand from your own experience that you are not able to give the Committee any information with reference to the point I have just spoken about, namely, about the Fenian conspiracy having been got up very much in public-houses on Sunday afternoons?—No, I am not able to speak to that.

1486. Mr. Murphy.] In answer to a question put by Major Gavin, you stated that if the clergy of all denominations impressed upon their flocks the necessity of sobriety, and created what we could they be practically carried into effect unless aided and assisted by the moral feeling of the people themselves?—No; I am sure they would not.

1487. It would require that, in order to make the Act practicable?—It would.

Mr. MICHAEL CAREY, called in; and Examined.

Mr. M. Carey. 1488. Mr. Murphy.] I BELIEVE you are a member of the Town Council of Dublin?—I am.

1489. And you are a member of the Board of Guardians?—Yes.

1490. And last year you were a member of the Board of Superintendence?—Quite so.

1491. I believe you are President of the Licensed Vintners' Association of Dublin?—I am.

1492. You have been, it is needless to say, a great many years engaged in the trade?—20 years.

1493. You are acquainted, I take it for granted, with the habits of the middle classes and artisans, and all that class of people in Dublin, and with regard to their general mode of life?—I am; I was myself, let me be understood, a working tradesman; I served my apprenticeship to a trade, worked at it as a journeyman, as a foreman, and as master before I went into the public-house business, and I am perfectly conversant with their manners, being myself often on their Boards in conducting their society.

1494. Can you give me any opinion, from your own observation, whether or not drunkenness has increased in Dublin?—It has decreased; I hold at present a return from the Inspector General of Prisons for the years 1864-5-6, and 7, and with your leave I will quote it. I find that in the year 1865 the number of cases of drunkenness was 1,212.

1495. Chairman.] Those were cases of committals I suppose you mean?—Yes, cases of committals. In the year 1866 the number was 703, and in 1867 the number was 525; and I find that from the 1st of January to the 31st of December 1866, the total number was 4,108 committals on 1,815 people, some of them being 34 times committed. I called the attention of the Board to this in the year 1867, that we had no detailed account of the number of committals of the different persons. I find now that the Inspectors General have acted upon that; that they have given their return of 1,815 for 1866 on a committal of 4,108 cases; and that, in the year 1867, for 1,613 persons, there were 3,719 committals, making a very serious decrease.

1496. Mr. Murphy.] Have you taken the average of each of those cases?—No, it is nearly one-third, three times the amount of committals.

1497. To what do you ascribe the decrease of drunkenness; have you formed any opinion about that?—Yes, I have. In the year 1860 we ourselves went forward to obtain an extension of time to 11 o'clock on Sunday night, and that was for two reasons, namely, that the beer-houses and the spirit-grocer-houses being open, when we closed at nine on Sunday night, was the cause of the gentlemen—such as the gentlemen on the Committee, not conversant with public-houses, pointing out those persons committed in the morning as coming from public-houses—we struggled to make that trade respectable, and endeavoured by our laws and regulations to prevent drunkenness, and to prevent our members from giving drink to any person in a state of intoxication. In 1851, we presented a memorial to the Board of Inland Revenue, of which I have a copy; that memorial stated fully our object in calling on the Revenue, if possible, to set aside the drunkenness, and to set aside the irregularity of conduct on the part of these Revenue grocers, who get their license without any qualification but the payment of money, no questions being asked but merely, is the money ready? Here is a copy of the memorial (producing the same), and we received an answer to that from the Board of Inland Revenue, stating that they regretted exceedingly that being the case, but that it was as much a police question as a Revenue question, and we then applied to the Police Commissioners. We then received an order to give the names of all those houses where spirits were consumed, and the consequence was that barriers were thrown up in the spirit grocers houses to prevent the police doing their duty; but they did it remarkably well; they are now compelled to prove the sale, and it is very difficult to do that.

1498. In fact the effect of your statement is simply this, that the license to grocers to sell spirits, although it positively enjoins that those spirits shall not be consumed on the premises, has had the effect, nevertheless, of allowing the consumption to take place?—Yes.

1499. And that the law as it at present stands cannot effectually prevent that?—It cannot.

1500. Although the Act of Parliament expressly prescribes the contrary?—Directly.

1501. You mentioned that in 1860, I think, your trade, in consequence of the operation of the recent Act then passed, which allowed the spirit grocers and others to keep open until 11 o'clock at night, and which in the case of the licensed vintners restricted their hours to 9 o'clock, found it necessary to procure an alteration of the law?—We did, for two reasons; the discontent evinced by our customers at being shut out at 9 o'clock, and getting their drink at spirit grocers and beer-houses, compelled us in self-defence and in defence of our character, to go to the Board of Inland Revenue and to the Police Commissioners to endeavour if possible to do away with that evil.

1502. Was the consequence of that that your hours were extended until 11 o'clock?—We sought for that, and the 23rd and 24th of Victoria c. 107, s. 43, extended the time until 11 o'clock on Sunday nights, and since then I think there has been less drunkenness than before.

1503. Prior to 1860, when the hour of 11 was given to you, how late did those other houses which had licenses, viz., the revenue grocers, remain open?—There is no limitation to their hours, none whatever.

1504. Can they keep open all night?—They can.

1505. Chairman.] Can they keep open all Sunday?—They can keep open every day in the week;

Mr.
M. Carey.
28 April

week; that is the law; there is no limitation whatever of the hours to which they may keep open.

1506. Does not the common law, which shuts up all shops upon the Sunday, apply to those?—The 7th of William 3 is called the Sunday Trading Act, and is in full force, and I have known a case where a spirit grocer, in order to show his contempt for the magistrates of Dublin, used to send them 4s. 7½d., that is 5s. Irish, so that they need not have the trouble of sending a policeman for it, and then selling liquor all day on the Sunday at all hours.

1507. Mr. Murphy.] He conceived that the fact of paying the fine qualified him to keep open the place, although the law did not allow him to do so?—By the 3rd and 4th of William 4, under which we take out our licenses, every detection is a conviction and a fine, but with them there is only one fine during the day; under the 7th of William 3 there is only one fine.

1508. They are fined for doing so, but are not prevented from doing so?—That is so.

1509. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] In fact the fine was fixed at a time when money was much more valuable than it is now; was not that so?—That may be so, and the value is the same with ourselves.

1510. Mr. Murphy.] Have you formed an opinion as to what would be the effect of the passing of the Bill upon which the Committee are now sitting; would it, in your judgment, tend to increase or to decrease drunkenness, or would it have any effect upon furthering or otherwise, the morality of the City of Dublin?—I fear, and greatly fear—I am positive upon the matter—that it would do a deal of injury, not as regards publicans; I would throw them aside altogether, we care nothing about it as a trade question, because in our society we make it a rule that any man who breaks the law, has no protection from that society; our solicitor is not permitted to attend to him, and he has no protection from the society. If a man, no matter how respectable in his ordinary dealings in life, solicits admission into our society, and he is under any restrictions to the police during the time he solicits admission, he would not be listened to for a moment, he would be rejected; and we feel it our moral duty, and the duty of the whole of our trading society, not to give drink to any man who exhibits the slightest sign of intoxication, on the Sunday, or on any other day.

1511. Then how would the passing of the Bill now under consideration in your judgment be liable to increase intoxication or excess, or how would it be liable to act injuriously upon the morality of Dublin?—There is really more drunkenness on Sunday mornings when the public-houses are closed than there is afterwards; but if you shut the orderly houses, and prevent people getting those refreshments, you would have men walking about the pavement outside; there are between 70,000 and 80,000 operatives in Dublin, and many of these men only pay about 1s. a week for their beds, and have no place in which to store their liquor; but they must have refreshment and they go into illicit houses, and that great evil of all evils, night-houses, will spring up.

1512. Are you of opinion that the total closing on the Sunday would have very injurious effects?—Decidedly.

1513. Then you are of opinion that the modified closing, namely, permission to sell, but not permission to drink, would have the same effect?

—It would be a monstrous thing, you could not carry it out, and no police force could be got to carry it out; because a man walks into your house, and if you tell him to walk out with a glass of whisky, he would drink it on the step, and persons going to church would see that going on, and that would be immoral in every sense.

1514. You are of opinion that it would be better that if spirits were allowed to be sold on the Sunday at all, their consumption should, so far as the existence of a proper licensed house is concerned, be regulated within the house, than to have the consumption take place elsewhere, without supervision?—Yes, exactly. If the men establish clubs in their private houses, they will not sit there, you may depend, without playing at cards. They cannot do it, and they will not do it. But if men come into a public-house which a respectable man keeps, he would permit no card playing, particularly on the Sunday, and no drunkenness.

1515. Are you of opinion that if the consumption was prohibited in a licensed public-house, a class of rooms like tap-rooms, annexed to, or close to the public-house, would spring up?—That might be so, but I do not think they would; people would get drunk in the barber's shops, and in the huckster's shops, and in the cigar divans; and I would be sorry to believe, though I am sorry to say the example is set in Scotland, that they would get methylated whisky at the apothecaries.

1516. Your opinion in one word is this; from your knowledge of the trade, and from your practical knowledge of what the habits of the people are who wish to drink, this proposed Act of Parliament would be totally inoperative in any way to prevent, or to cause a decrease of excess in drinking?—Totally inoperative; you would injure the honest and honourable man, and you would help the rogue.

1517. Can you give any opinion as to what the nature of the trade of vintners in public-houses in the rural districts about Dublin would be; are you sufficiently acquainted with that?—There are a great number of young men, drapers' assistants, and others, of different trades in Dublin, who walk out on Sundays four or five miles, to Goat's Town and Dundrum, and the neighbourhood, and if they found that they could not get refreshments at those places, it would be very hard; and I think it would cause a great deal of discontent, and a great deal of annoyance.

1518. Have you any idea of what the comparative nature of the consumption by those public-houses in the rural districts is on Sundays as compared with what it is on other days in the week?—It would be much more, because people walk out from Dublin to enjoy themselves on the Sunday evenings, and then when they come back they look for that refreshment at nine or ten o'clock. I believe that the drapers' houses close about 11 on week days, and then they are locked out; but they are highly respectable, and they would not run any risk; they must go to the tavern and public-houses and get refreshment.

1519. Are you prepared to say, from any knowledge of your own, or from such conviction as you feel warranted in giving to the Committee, that the amount of trade done in those rural houses is sometimes three times as much as upon any other day in the week, and in some cases

Mr.
M. Carey.

cases as much as in all the week together?—In some cases, but not in all.

1520. But, as a fact, the trade done on Sundays is a very great deal more than upon any other day in the week?—Twice as much, you may say, upon the average.

1521. The effect under the total closing would be that it would be very ruinous to the proprietors of all these houses?—It would, and at the same time cause a great deal of dissatisfaction.

1522. I am talking of the effect upon the trade of those houses themselves?—It would in fact destroy it; they would in fact take out the revenue license to protect themselves, and sell all day on Sunday if they thought proper.

1523. They could do that?—They could do that.

1524. Then with the present state of the law, with the power to issue a revenue license, supposing this Bill was passed, in itself it would be no use at all?—It would be no use.

1525. I think that you said that there were about 70,000 of the working classes and artizans in Dublin?—As closely as I could say.

1526. Their habit is to walk out on Sundays?—Yes, and to meet one another.

1527. And it is unnecessary to ask whether the closing of these public-houses, whether wholly or partially, would be a very great inconvenience to those men?—It would, and cause a great deal of discontent.

1528. Has your society entered into any rules for the purpose of making the trade more respectable, and also of preventing the sale of liquors by illicit houses?—Certainly we would not permit it.

1529. Chairman.] I understand that you are entirely opposed to the total closing on Sunday?—I am.

1530. Are you also entirely opposed to any distinction during the hours in which houses for the sale of drinks are to be opened between drinking on and off the premises?—Decidedly.

1531. Are you also opposed to any further limitation of the present hours for the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday?—I have already told you that owing to the discontent we experience from customers, and the discontent from the public generally, we were compelled to go forward in 1860 to solicit from the Legislature an extension of the hours.

1532. But that was because another branch of the trade, another class of men who sold drinks were open; but assuming the restrictions applied to all persons selling intoxicating drinks; would you be opposed to a further limitation of the hours?—I would. I have already stated what I believe to be the fact, that the barber's shops and the beer-houses would be the places where they would drink.

1533. I was glad to hear you state that your trade cared nothing about it as a trade question?—We did not; for my own part it would serve me very much, being a tavern keeper.

1534. You say you thought that the licensed houses being open for the sale of drinks would tend very much to diminish drunkenness; do you include the country districts throughout Ireland in that statement?—I have no sort of knowledge of them. I cannot say much with reference to them, but I speak of a town where the working classes are numerous, and where they are confined, during the hours of work, from five in the morning, to use that phrase (because they must get up at five in the morning) until seven, then it is time to go to their bed to be up in the morning early. These men being confined during the week, naturally would look for a little recreation on the Sunday, whether in the country or in the city.

1535. Was I right in concluding, as I did, that your evidence is intended only to apply to the large towns, such as Dublin and the suburbs, but that you have no knowledge about the country?—I have no knowledge about other towns, I do not know what their moral feeling would be.

1536. You mentioned that no respectable publicans would permit intoxication upon their premises. Am I right in saying that most of the publicans in Dublin are respectable?—Yes, that is so.

1537. Could you explain where the large number of drunken men who are found in Dublin do come from?—I wish I could.

1538. I suppose we make take it that they do not get intoxicated in public-houses, and yet there are a large number of them who do get intoxicated. The question is, where they get the material to be intoxicated upon?—I honestly believe that no respectable publican would open his house for drink on Sundays.

1539. To a drunken man?—To any other man.

1540. Not on Sundays at all?—Not during the prohibited hours.

1541. You referred to the return which we have got from the Inspector General in Dublin?—Yes.

1542. A return was laid before the Committee from the Commissioners of Police in Dublin with regard to the number of arrests for drunkenness in the years which you have mentioned, which showed that large diminution in the number of arrests in the last few years; but appended to it was this remark by the Commissioners of Police: In the two last years in which this diminution occurred, the police in Dublin, in consequence of the disturbances, had patrolled two and two, which, states the Commissioners, may probably account for the diminution in the number of arrests. I suppose you would not be disposed to contradict that opinion of the Commissioner of Police?—I would add to that. I would say that the Fenianism which sprung up in some places in the country, had a wholesome effect upon some people who were in the habit of taking more than was good for them, and they do not take it now.

1543. So that that diminution in the number of arrests is not an absolute proof of a similar diminution of drunkenness?—I think it is a rule with the respectable operatives now that they will not drink to get drunk.

1544. But that diminution in the number of arrests does not prove to its full extent that diminution in the number of cases of drunkenness, because the number is probably diminished by the police being patrolled two and two?—The police will not arrest unless there is drunkenness; but the police had not the opportunity of doing it, for the men were generally speaking sober.

1545. This Bill, as at present framed, would not touch the revenue license?—That is quite true.

1546. And, consequently, it would injuriously affect the publicans?—Certainly.

1547. Would it not be easy so to frame it as to include every license?—Again permit me to ask, er's shop and huckster's shop?

1548. Excuse me for following the question; you mentioned that this Bill would not touch those selling under a revenue license; my question has nothing to do with barber's shops; could there be anything done to make the Bill affect those selling with the revenue licenses?—There could not be any difficulty about it, but it would not cure the evil.

1549. It would answer their object?—There could be no difficulty about it.

1550. Will you tell me how many assistants you keep in your house?—One for my coffee-room, independent of my maid servants and male assistants.

1551. What are the usual hours at which publican's assistants attend at the shop on week days?—They are generally engaged, on the average, from about eight o'clock in the morning until about half-past eleven at night.

1552. And on Sundays?—On Sundays from 10 in the day to about eleven at night.

1553. You have always taken a good deal of interest in this question; have you always been an uncompromising opponent of Sunday closing?—Certainly not; I should be most happy if the Sunday closing were carried out, if it could be carried out.

1554. Were you ever of opinion that it could be carried out?—I was.

1555. You have spoken a good deal upon this subject, and have given very good reasons, no doubt; I have some of them here, and I just wish to know whether you are still of that opinion. You are President of the Grocers and Butchers' Society, are you not?—Yes, I am.

1556. At a meeting of that Society you spoke of this Bill as a "blow that was sought to be struck at the last remnant of manufacture in this country, by closing the breweries and distilleries;" do you still think that it would be a fatal blow to the only manufacture in Ireland?—I do not remember having spoken that; I saw a statement in last Monday's paper, but it was not the truth.

1557. But what is your opinion upon that point now, assuming that somebody else said it?—If I said it I must have facts to prove it, but I believe it would be of no service.

1558. But you do not think that it would be quite fatal to our trade?—I think it would create a great deal of illicit distillation.

1559. Have you any reason to think that the brewers and distillers in Ireland are very much alarmed with regard to the prospects of their trade with reference to the chance of this Bill passing?—I have not consulted them.

1560. But they have not, in fact, opposed the Bill?—I think they are inclined to do so; I think they are men who are superior in wealth, and they feel it quite unnecessary to go amongst the working class of men like myself to oppose it publicly; but they know the hardship of it.

1561. There was another argument used against this Bill at your society by another gentleman, and I wish to know your opinion as to whether you agree with it, or not; it was upon this ground, that "in the first place, it would shut up all the public-houses in Ireland 55 days, or 8 weeks in the year;" and he asks "are you" (the trade), "a consenting party to this confiscation?" may I ask your opinion with regard to that; do you think that the publican has a natural right to trade upon those 55 days in the year?—I think when the law has permitted it for 40 years, without any visible increase of drunkenness, and without any encroachment upon the law of the land, we may fairly assume that these persons who have invested capital in those houses have a right to be supported.

1562. Will you explain what you mean by "40 years?"—Since 1833, that is 35 years.

1563. Then you think that the case of your trade is different from that of others, and that you have an inherent and natural right to trade upon Sundays?—I think that when the law enabled men to lay out a vast amount of capital in the trade, and by a license to prevent others from embarking in that trade, those men have a right to be supported in the fullest manner, and to get the greatest amount of support possible from the Legislature.

1564. And then there is a statement attributed to you, and although I believe it to be true, I should be glad if you would give me some proof of it: "There might be some drunkenness in the country towns, but in the City of Dublin, where there were 25,000 operatives, independently of labourers and others, there was less drunkenness than in any other large town in the kingdom;" I am quite ready to believe it, but could you give me any proof of it?—I quite believe that I was right; naturally, you would expect that there must be, from the knocking about of such large numbers of people, more drunkenness in Dublin than in any other town; but with the education which has been increasing amongst the people in Dublin, then, I say, there would be more drunkenness in the country towns than in Dublin.

1565. But you are not prepared to stand to the assertion, that there was less drunkenness there than in any other town in the kingdom?—I say that there is less drunkenness there than at Liverpool, less drunkenness than in London, less than in Glasgow, because in reading from one of the Blue Books, I find that Captain Smart, who was commandant of the Glasgow Police, stated in his examination (and it was reported first by the Alliance Society, and I must believe it to be true, they having reported it), that in the year 1853, when Forbes Mackenzie's Act passed, there were two shebeen houses in Glasgow, and that when the Committee was sitting in 1863, there were 1,600; and when he was asked how it was that coming before the magistrates the same amount of drunkenness did not appear, he stated, that all the station-houses in Glasgow would not hold them; but that if they found a half-crown or 5 s. in a fellow's pocket when they found him drunk in the street, they took it out; and if he chose to come and claim it the next morning he could do so, but if not, he went without it.

1566. Then, again, there is this statement, that all the police magistrates in the city of Dublin are entirely against it?—Yes.

1567. Is that the fact?—I have not had an interview with all of them, but with a great number of them, and Mr. Dicks, the other day, deprecated the Bill altogether.

1568. Could you furnish the Committee with the names of those authorities in writing, who will either give that statement in writing here, or verbally, that they are opposed to it?—I would rather leave that to another witness, if you would allow me.

1569. I am referring to the report of your society, which I think was presented under your presidentship;

Mr.
M. Carey.
28 April
1868.

Mr.
M. Carey.

presidentship; I suppose you are aware of that report?—Yes, I read it.

1570. I see in that report it is stated that the advocates of this Bill have used “misrepresentation, forged petitions, and clerical intimidation;” could you give the Committee any instance, for example, of forged petitions?—I should not like to take the name of a clergyman at all.

1571. I left that part of the question out purposely; but I am speaking of forged petitions?—I know a number of petitions have been got up for the Bill signed by children, and that the petition has been hawked through the schools for the signatures of children; I myself handed to the Honourable Member for Dublin, last year, a petition against the Bill, signed by 3,400 of the tradesmen of Dublin, which was brought to me to hand to the Honourable Member, and he presented it.

1572. I see a recommendation in the report that every exertion should be made to get up petitions against the Bill?—From our own society.

1573. Will you tell the Committee what success has attended those exertions?—I presented, through Sir John Grey, a petition last year, signed by, I think, 400 of the licensed vintners of Dublin against it.

1574. And I will add that there was another petition signed by a considerable number of publicans against it from the city of Cork?—Yes, there was.

1575. Can you mention whether there has been any other petition against it?—No.

1576. The result, I may take it, of those active exertions has been those two petitions?—We never stirred beyond the city of Dublin; we wished to leave every town to itself.

1577. Would you tell me what is the feeling of your trade in other parts of Ireland with regard to this Bill?—Mr. Barry, of Cork, has written up to express a great deal of indignation, and to state that the feelings of the people were very much against it, and that if passed it would cause a great deal of discontent and inconvenience.

1578. I am speaking of your trade?—Yes, so am I; he is a member of our trade.

1579. Limiting your conversation to Dublin, I find it stated that that association “were the protectors of trade, for the speaker was sorry to say, if they depended upon the trade to defend themselves they would be in a bad state indeed;” have they raised from that apathy since?—There is a great deal of apathy in every trade; in every portion of the public two or three men will always do any committee’s work.

1580. And I see you made the statement that you for one would not go to London with the deputation unless the trade supplied the proper means of defence, and would come forward promptly with their assistance; may I infer that they have come forward promptly with their assistance?—They have, and they have not; they did last year.

1581. There is another statement in the report which I should like you to explain to the Committee: “Benevolent funds have enabled your committee to faithfully discharge the trusts reposed in them. In addition to their ordinary duties, your committee had to gird on their armour and make battle with the modern Pharisees” (the authors of this Bill), “whose inextinguishable greed for notoriety impels him to undertake the most utopian projects.” May I infer from that report that those benevolent funds have enabled you to carry on the opposition to this Bill as you have done?—Not one shilling of them.

1582. Then that statement in the report was not what I will call strictly accurate?—If you will read that properly you will find that the benevolent fund is a distinct fund altogether, there are two branches to our trade, the trade, protection and the benevolent fund.

1583. I understand your explanation; that it does not apply to it. Then I see that a deputation from your society, of which you were one, after coming to London last year, went home “animated by the determination to spare neither energy, money, nor influence to oppose the third reading” of this Bill. I presume I may infer that you have spared neither energy, money, nor influence?—As far as energy and influence went, we did, but as for the money, we did not get that from the trade.

1584. But, however, you have, as you have declared you were determined to do, used every effort to defeat the Bill before Parliament?—The people look on it that the Bill will never pass; that it is just too utopian, and, therefore, they could not pass it; they think that the Legislature could not trespass on the rights of the people in that manner.

1585. I see you state there that the gentlemen who used to attend the meetings had left them?—Yes, that was what I tell you, that they thought it was all nonsense; that the Bill could not pass.

1586. But we may take it that those exertions made against the Bill have resulted in the fact that you have neither spared energy nor influence against it, and we may take the results as what we see?—I spoke of our own city.

1587. May I take it that with the exception of your own city and Cork there is no petition against the Bill?—And Drogheda.

1588. Will you state to the Committee the facts relative to Drogheda?—They have written to us and sent up a subscription to enable us to defend ourselves against the Bill; and they state, as I said before, that it would be very inconvenient, and would tend to drunkenness more than anything else.

1589. With those exceptions, we may take it that your trade throughout the country has been apathetic?—We did not apply scarcely to the country; the northerners seemed to take it upon themselves; we had letters from Belfast, that they were going to oppose the Bill in every respect; the letters are upon the file.

1590. Would you have any objection to all branches of the spirit trade being put upon the same footing?—If they paid the same money I would not.

1591. If they paid the same license money, you mean?—No, if they went to the same expense; a man lays out perhaps 2,000 £. in the embellishment of his house, and makes that house highly respectable, and fit for the entertainment of the middle classes as well as of poor men, and although he has paid 700 £. or 800 £. fine for the house, a man comes beside him and takes a house at a lower rate, and without laying out a single penny as a fine; and you ought not to give that man a license at the same price as the other; it would be a great injustice.

1592. But could not the publican have got a license without spending that money upon his house;

Mr.
M. Carey.

house; that was not the condition without which he could not have got his license?—No; he must first pay a very heavy fine for his house, which is put up to auction. I may say that I should be very happy to see the licensing placed in the hands of a lawyer every quarter session. A man pays a sum of 2,000*l.* or 3,000*l.* for the house.

1593. He paid that for a house which has already a license attached to it; is not that so?—Yes, quite so; and then another man comes next door at a less rent and opens a spirit grocer's place, in the hope that he may perhaps, under the Act, if passed by this Committee, get a license in the same way as the other man gets it; and that would not be justice.

1594. Am I right in understanding that the objection to making licenses uniform is, that persons who have got a vintner's license at present have got it by paying a very high price for a house to which a license is attached?—Exactly; and the vast majority of them are those that have come late into the market.

1595. But as far as the law of the case is concerned, that does not apply; the license might be the same?—The license might be the same.

1596. Supposing the Committee were to be of opinion that it was desirable to diminish the hours for the sale of drinks on Sunday, could you give any opinion upon what would be the best limitation; or do you stand out absolutely for the full present hours?—I say it might be advisable to limit the hours till nine o'clock on Sunday; that the house should be open from two till nine o'clock, to consume the liquors on the premises and off.

1597. With regard to Saturday night, would you be an advocate for closing earlier than at present?—No; a great number in the building trades and the shoemaking trades do not pay their men until nine o'clock; and it is very hard to get money on bills in Dublin sometimes, and then they have to get those bills cashed, and the men cannot get their liquor without the money being paid; they must get it at that time, and if you limit the hour on Saturday night, you do an injury to the poor men.

1598. You think it would be a serious injury to the poor man who does not get his wages until ten o'clock on Saturday night if he had no opportunity of getting his drink; in fact, if he went to bed on getting his wages instead of having an hour's drinking before he went to bed?—In my opinion he has a right not to be deprived of his refreshment if he demands it and requires it.

1599. Then if they paid the wages at eleven o'clock, I suppose you would keep the place open until twelve?—No, that would be a very exceptional case; I know of no employers who pay so late as that.

1600. Do you know what proportion of the tradesmen in Dublin pay at ten o'clock?—I know that the shoemaking trades very generally do; and the builders very frequently do not have their men in from the country to get their wages until late.

1601. You think that men have a right to get rid of part of their money on the Saturday night?—I repeat that they have a right to their proper refreshment.

1602. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] I understood you to say just now that there is nothing in the law at present to prevent those spirit grocers from keeping their house open all night, upon paying a small fine?—Five shillings, Irish.

0.55.

1603. Do the spirit grocers generally take advantage of that privilege?—They do not during the hours of Divine service, even when they sell to drink off the premises; but, with very few exceptions, they do not admit to drink upon the premises at all during those hours.

1604. Is there much Sunday morning trade that takes place at those spirit grocers?—I cannot tell; but I know that a great deal of drunkenness takes place on Sunday mornings.

1605. Does it take place at the public-houses?—They are not let into public-houses; they are let into the taverns.

1606. Would you say that on the whole those spirit grocers are as respectable a class of men as any in Dublin?—I do not dispute their respectability for a moment; Mr. Falkner, Grafton-street, is one of the most respectable persons in Dublin and he is a spirit grocer, and Alderman Campbell, Sackville-street, is a spirit grocer, and Mr. Andrews of Dame-street; those are highly respectable men, but this law has been made subservient to bad men as well as good.

1607. Mr. Pim.] A good deal of stress was laid by Mr. Porter, a previous witness, upon the advantages that would be derived from making publicans responsible for persons getting drunk upon the premises, or for giving drink to persons already partly intoxicated, and he proposed a fine in such a case, and even if persisted in, withdrawing their license; I think you have already stated that there are comparatively few licensed vintners who would do such a thing; that you would consider it very disreputable; but I wished to ask you whether you thought that any public advantage would be derived, or that it would be feasible to work such a penalty as Mr. Porter recommended?—It would be a gross injustice; I heard Mr. Porter's observations, and I do not at all agree with him, because any drunken fellow might enter your house and be drunk and refuse to leave, and if he was caught there you would be fined.

1608. I do not think that there would be any difficulty upon that point?—It would be necessary to prove the sale; but to use the old phrase, we should leave well enough alone.

1609. You do not approve of Mr. Porter's suggestion?—No, I do not; and under the Act under which we sell, any man convicted three times within six months loses his license.

1610. You referred to your arrangement as to opening on Sunday having existed 35 years, namely, since 1833; was that the year in which the Act usually called Perrin's Act was passed?—It is.

1611. I see here that at the Grocers' Assistants Association a letter was read from Cardinal Cullen, one paragraph of which is, "The law which forbids the sale of other articles on that day should surely make no exception in favour of liquors, the abuse of which is so unfavourable to the public?"—That is quite right, the abuse.

1612. What reason can you give why the law should be different as regards the sale of liquors from the sale of other articles?—The sale of liquors is a sale for refreshment and necessity, and the sale of drapery is not; you may buy it on Saturday and keep it for a month or a year.

1613. Is it not possible to provide the liquor the day before?—The working class have not a place to store it, many of them; there are many men who pay only a shilling a week for their bedroom, and who have no place to put it away

Mr.
M. Carey.

1868.

away in; they are merely flitting tenants, from week to week, or night to night.

1614. Therefore the only reason that you give for making that exception in the case of liquors is upon the ground of refreshment and necessity; that the persons who require that refreshment have not a place to store it?—Yes, exactly.

1615. Does that render it necessary to keep the places open all day?—From two to nine it would be necessary.

1616. You have stated that the people in your employ work from eight to eleven on week days, and from two to eleven on Sundays?—Yes.

1617. That is very much longer than they work in other trades, is it not?—Yes; but at the same time in the case of taking stock in any other business when the necessity arises the hours are prolonged.

1618. I have received a letter from a gentleman who writes on behalf of the Grocers' Assistants' Association, in which he says that the hours of labour are so severe, from 16 to 18 hours a day, during which time they are standing on their legs, that many of them become disabled before half their life has passed from disease of the limbs; do you consider that to be the case?—I consider Mr. Porter's answer to be a very good one, with reference to that, when he states that any agreement can be made between the employer and the employed which would do away with the necessity of any legislative interference in that respect.

1619. Are there many persons employed in the public-houses who are under age?—Very few, I believe.

1620. Still that answer would be very fair as regards the working hours on the week days, but it scarcely applies to the preservation of a weekly holiday?—That may be your opinion but it is not mine; I think it applies wherever a man is required to work; I again say that if a necessity arises, whatever the business is, the operative is obliged to remain and do what is necessary.

1621. Mr. Murphy.] Is it your opinion that if any enactment be made for the hour of closing, all houses for the sale of liquors should be made to close at the same time?—Decidedly.

1622. You are not of opinion that, as was the law prior to 1860, one house should be kept open to 11 and another closed at nine?—Certainly not.

1623. Are you of opinion that the same rule should be extended to every house that deals in spirits and liquors?—Yes; and to every house that is in trade at all, otherwise it would be of no use.

1624. Do you mean that you would extend it to all houses in trade?—Yes, as a Sunday trading Bill.

1625. Major Gavin.] I presume you are a married man, and have a family?—I am a married man with a family.

1626. Do you not think it would be for the benefit of the greater number of people that public-houses should be closed on Sunday?—I do not think any such thing.

1627. You do not?—I do not.

1628. Then I suppose by that, you would not object to your son going into a public-house and spending his time there on the Sunday?—If his education did not teach him better, he perhaps might do it, but I have a very strong feeling on the matter, that it would be injurious to draw such a class division, as that the respectable classes should be able to get all the refreshment that they think necessary, when the working man is precluded from doing so in the only way which is open to him.

1629. And you think that the closing of the public-houses could not be done with safety to the working man?—If it could be done, it might be.

1630. But you think it would be a very great hardship upon the men who had laid out money upon public-houses, to make a trade and to make a fortune, and who are very few in numbers compared to the people out of doors, to pass this Bill, though you believe it would be a good Bill for a great number of people?—I say again, pass by the publicans, do not touch them, do not take them into consideration at all, but take the morality of the working classes into consideration. I say you strike a fatal blow at them; put them under the protection of men who are bound by their license, and by their character and position in society to prevent disorder.

1631. Do you think that public-houses are not a temptation to men to drink?—I think not. I could pass by a public-house for a year without going in.

1632. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] Are there not a great many working men who cannot always pass by a public-house without going in?—I can only speak for myself.

1633. Major Gavin.] Would it affect your trade very materially, if the public-houses were closed on Sunday?—Not if they were all closed.

1634. Chairman.] You stated that you were of opinion that all shops should be closed, as a matter of Sunday trading on Sunday; that is to say, shops for the sale of drink?—If you close one, close all.

1635. Would you extend that so far as to close shops for the sale, say, of milk and fruit on Sunday mornings, when it cannot be kept in summer because the houses where intoxicating drinks were sold, were closed on Sunday?—I would, because I know that drink would be sold there.

1636. If shops for the sale of intoxicating liquors were closed?—Yes.

1637. And do you think that intoxicating drinks are sold now in shops where fruit and milk, and such things are allowed to be sold on Sunday mornings because they cannot be kept?—I hear that, and I saw an instance of it myself in a barber's shop.

1638. What would you propose; that the shops where intoxicating drinks were sold, should be open, or that the milk shops should be shut?—I would shut the milk shop.

1639. You are an advocate for shutting up the milk-shops?—Yes; I would shut them all. I say, "Lead us not into temptation."

1640. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] You stated that there was a great deal of capital sunk in those public-houses by people who pay very large fines; are not those public-houses very much in the hands of a few monopolists?—No; I do not think they are. There are 1,300 licenses in the police district, and they are not very much in the hands of monopolists.

1641. Are there not many of them owned by brewers and distillers?—I cannot say how many of them are, but infinitely less than in London.

Mr. RICHARD CORR, called in; and Examined.

1642. Chairman.] WHAT office do you hold?
I am a Superintendent of the Dublin Metropolitan Police.

1643. How long have you been connected with at force?—I joined the service on the 1st December 1837.

1644. In Dublin?—Yes.

1645. Therefore, you have been acquainted with the city of Dublin for some time?—Yes;
10 years the 1st of last December.

1646. During that time, do you consider drunkenness has decreased in the city of Dublin?
—For a few years past it has.

1647. Before that time, you would not say that it had perceptibly decreased?—No.

1648. What is your experience with reference to Sunday drunkenness; is it considerable?— No; there is less drunkenness on Sundays than on any other day in the week.

1649. And when would you say that the largest number of arrests which are returned on Monday occur?—On Saturday nights; from about nine o'clock on Saturday night to one o'clock on Sunday morning.

1650. Then, getting towards one or two o'clock on Sunday morning is what makes the return of Sunday arrests appear large?—Yes.

1651. Is not there a considerable number of men who get drunk on Saturday night and keep it up on Sunday?—Yes.

1652. And a good number of men who having not drunk on the Sunday, keep it up on the Monday?—That may be, but as long as you have the same system of licensing in Ireland as you have at present, you will have drunkenness.

1653. What is your opinion with reference to closing or limiting the hours of keeping open public-houses on Sunday?—I should say if you closed the public-houses entirely on Sunday, my opinion is from experience that you will open other houses where the illicit sale of drink will be carried on.

1654. Am I right in inferring that your evidence altogether applies to the city of Dublin?
—It does.

1655. You would not extend that observation to other districts of your own knowledge?—No.

1656. What do you think would be the effect of diminishing the present number of hours in which they are open on Sundays?—I think the opening of public-houses on Sunday at three and closing them at nine would have a good effect, because there are many places of worship in the city of Dublin where the service is not over until just two, when the public-houses are actually open.

1657. And they offer temptation to people just as they are coming out of a place of worship?
—It may be so.

1658. Why do you say that the closing at nine would be of advantage?—It might if a greater evil would not arise.

1659. And do you think that a greater evil would arise?—The low beershops and the spirit grocers would take advantage, if the regular public-houses were shut; you would have them springing up to a great extent.

1660. Assuming that every house was closed at nine, would not that be an advantage?—It would.

0.55.

1661. Is it not the fact, that the greatest amount of drunkenness occurs late in the evening, and that if men were obliged to stop drinking at or before nine o'clock, a great amount of drunkenness would be saved?—Yes; that is if you close all.

Mr. R. Corr.

28 April
1868.

1662. I am going upon the supposition, that the closing applies to all. Are you of opinion that it would be of advantage if all places for the sale of drinks were closed at an earlier hour on Saturday night than at present?—I think it would if they were all closed; but if you leave open one class, it is not fair to the rest.

1663. What hour would you consider a reasonable hour at which to close on Saturday night, having regard to the reasonable wants of the people, and to the general accommodation of the public?—I should say half-past 10 or a quarter to 11 at night.

1664. That is the present hour, is it not?—All regular publicans can keep open till half-past 11 week nights, and 11 on Sunday nights.

1665. And you do not think it would be safe to close on Saturday nights earlier than half-past 10?—I do not think it would, because I think you would interfere with the general accommodation of the public.

1666. Which class of people do you think want the public-houses open between nine and ten?—The labouring and the artizan class; they purchase groceries in those different houses.

1667. At what hour?—I see them and their wives marketing up to the very moment the shops close.

1668. But do you not think they could do their marketing before nine o'clock?—They could of course.

1669. Would you tell the Committee what you consider the evils of the present licensing system at Dublin?—As regards spirit grocers and beer dealers, wholesale and retail, the spirit grocers can keep open on Christmay Day and Good Friday, and every Sunday in the year. I have one at present in my division, which keeps open all night for the sale of drink, not to be consumed on the premises. I have to keep a constable there, at the door, to prevent parties from congregating about the place, and to preserve order in the locality. These beer dealers are a great source of annoyance in any locality in the City of Dublin that they spring up in;
there are some of them in lanes and in courtways, and I am sure it was never contemplated any license should be given to such places at all.

1670. They are not subject to any restriction with reference to getting the license; they get it as of right, by paying for it, do they not?—
No matter what a man's character may be, he goes down to the custom house and gets the beer license or the spirit license. In my opinion if you had one uniform license, and the police were to have a proper supervision as they have over the regular retailers of the City of Dublin at present; first to inquire into the general character of the applicant; secondly, the suitability of his premises, and thirdly, the requirement of the house in the locality, you would have very few irregular spirit dealers, or beer dealers, or publi-cans.

1671. To whom would you entrust the exercise of the power of granting a license?—To the

L

Recorder

Mr. R. Corr.

1868.

Recorder of the City of Dublin, and the Chairmen of the different Quarter Sessions.

1672. Then with regard to these licenses (I am speaking of the excise licenses as a class) is it the fact that there is no chance of their being deprived of their license; that they are merely subject to a penalty for an infraction of the law?—Yes; a conviction against a spirit grocer cancels his license.

1673. Major Gavin.] One conviction?—Yes; allowing parties to tittle on the premises; delaying the officer in the discharge of his duty, cancels his license, and cancels the retail beer license also.

1674. Chairman.] Is not that a very serious penalty?—It is as regards the spirit grocer.

1675. But not as regards the beer dealer?—No, because his license is only 1*l.* 1*s.*; he may get it again the next day; he may be fined by the magistrates the full penalty of 2*l.*, and the license may be forfeited, but the forfeiture of the license is a mere nominal matter; he pays only 1*l.* 1*s.* for the license.

1676. Do you know whether there are many persons in the city of Dublin who take out spirit licenses, not bonâ fide for selling drinks not to be consumed on the premises, but as a blind to enable them to sell it to be consumed on the premises?—The majority of spirit grocers in Dublin violate the spirit of their license.

1677. Would it not be difficult indeed to prevent a man having bought a glass of whisky in a bottle from throwing it down his throat when he had got as far as the door?—Yes, perfectly impossible.

1678. And yet the spirit grocer would be liable to a penalty if that were done?—Yes.

1679. Is not that a very absurd state of the law?—It is, no doubt.

1680. What is the rule of the police in prosecuting such a case as that; if they see a man swallowing liquor upon a spirit grocer's premises?—If the police officer comes into a spirit grocer's shop, and finds a man in the act of tipping spirits he lodges a complaint, and that complaint is laid before the Commissioner of Police, and he will order a summons to be taken out in the usual course before the divisional magistrates.

1681. And if the charge is proved the penalty follows?—If the charge is proved the penalty follows, and the forfeiture of the license follows.

1682. Then, in short, your recommendation is that all the licenses should be put on the same footing?—If you put all the licenses on the same footing, you would have good order and regularity established, but at present you can never have it.

1683. But even if it were all put upon the same footing it would be impossible to totally close the public-houses in the city of Dublin?—Yes, it would.

1684. The police would be unable to prevent the illicit sale of liquors?—The police would be unable to prevent it; there are many houses besides public-houses where liquor is sold, such as provision shopkeepers and barbers' shops, and we have had many convictions against brothel keepers, for liquors are sold by them. Young men and young women are in the habit of going out on Sundays, and if the public-houses were open, they may go there for refreshments where no impropriety could take place, but if those houses were closed against them they may repair to low beer-shops, or other disreputable houses, where the result would be very much worse indeed.

1685. Mr. O'Neill.] You mentioned that the police can exercise very strict supervision over the regular retailers of spirits; can they not exercise almost the same supervision over the spirit grocers?—No, they cannot.

1686. What would be the difference?—The spirit-grocer may have parties in his house, they always have a door inside the shop; there are two divisions made to the shop; there is one door where they go in to get drink to be consumed on the premises; if there are parties inside that door, the party in attendance may have every thing cleared away before the officer comes in, although there may be several parties inside, so that he can evade the law; and unless the officer can prove some appearance of drink having been sold there, he cannot make any case against him.

1687. It is a practical rather than a legal difficulty?—Yes, it is.

1688. Then the difference between the regular retailer and the spirit grocer consists mainly in this, that the spirit grocer can renew his license?—No, not the spirit grocer; the spirit grocer's license is from 14*l.* to 15*l.*, but the beer license is only 1*l.* 1*s.*

1689. Chairman.] Is not there this difference between those cases, that while the police can oppose the vintner's license on the general ground of his place being badly conducted, the only ground for depriving the spirit grocer of his license is a specific conviction of having allowed a breach of the law upon his premises?—Exactly.

1690. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] Is it your opinion that the Fenian agents avail themselves to any extent of people being assembled together upon a Sunday afternoon in the public-houses to enlist men in the Fenian conspiracy?—There may be some instances of that nature in the City of Dublin; any houses that we have any suspicion of we keep under supervision; in fact, generally speaking, the publicans of the City of Dublin are a respectable class, and there is a respectable class of houses springing up in the trade in the City of Dublin.

1691. But the number of people assembling together in a public-house would give the Fenian agents great facilities of meeting them and getting them into their conspiracy?—No doubt; they would take that opportunity on week days as well as on Sundays.

1692. But would not they have greater opportunities on the Sunday, as the people would not be assembled on week days as much as they would be after Divine worship on Sundays?—That would be so, no doubt.

1693. It was suggested by a former witness that it was desirable to give the publicans more authority in their houses than at present, to prevent drunkenness, namely, that they should refuse to give any more liquor to any persons whom they saw to be a little elevated?—If it could be carried out it would have a very good effect. A party may go into a public-house in a state of intoxication, and the publican may put him out, but if he does not put him out, and the police come up, he will be summoned for harbouring him, and the onus will be put upon him to prove before the magistrates that he had no liquor served him there.

1694. But

1694. But I suppose a publican could hardly refuse now to give more liquor to a party coming in a state of having had quite enough?—I know that it is a fine line to draw; it is a case in which I would not wish to offer an opinion.

1695. Are you of opinion that it will be very hard to give the publicans that sort of authority, and then to make them responsible for giving a man the last glass which made him intoxicated?—It would.

1696. I suppose that a publican now would wish to keep order in his house, and would put such men out when intoxicated?—I think so; because he could be indicted now for allowing any disorder in his house; three convictions in six months deprive a man of his license; if the Commissioners of Police direct proceedings to be taken against such a party, he is refused his license at the renewal.

1697. But what I wanted to ask was this: at present a publican would never refuse to sell intoxicating liquors to any person, provided that he was not intoxicated at that time?—I should say not.

1698. He would never refuse to sell it on the ground that he had a good deal, and that a little more might make him intoxicated?—I cannot give an opinion upon that.

1699. We have been told what is the practice in France; do you think it would be impossible to draw such a line as that in England?—I think it would.

1700. Mr. Pim.] Do you think it would be useful to go any further with legislation in that direction?—I do not think so.

1701. You heard the evidence of Mr. Porter, did you not?—Yes, I did; Mr. Porter has had great experience.

1702. Do you agree with him?—As far as that is concerned, I could not reconcile my mind to it; I think it would be drawing too fine a line for a publican to conduct his house in that way.

1703. Mr. Murphy.] Up to what hour are the meat markets open in Dublin upon the Saturday night?—Twelve o'clock, and some of them after 12.

1704. But are they open later on Saturdays than you are on other nights in the week?—They are.

1705. Are you aware that a considerable number of the tradesmen in particular trades are not paid their wages until very late on Saturday night?—I do not know that.

1706. Why are the markets kept open so much later on Saturday nights than on other nights in the week?—The markets are more thronged on Saturday nights than on other nights in the week.

1707. How do you account for that?—I account for that by saying that the wives and children of artizans and the labouring classes come there to purchase meat for the Sunday.

1708. But could not they do that at an earlier hour than 11 o'clock?—Perhaps they have not the cash to purchase with.

1709. Then your inference is, that Saturday being a great wages-paying day, and a very large number of the tradespeople not being paid their wages at a sufficiently early time to enable them to purchase their provisions earlier, are obliged to wait till they do get the means of purchasing what they require?—Exactly.

1710. Are you aware that the object of this Bill is to permit spirits to be sold at certain hours named in the Bill, but not to be drunk on the premises?—Yes.

1711. Are you of opinion that such a measure could be practically carried into effect?—Not at all.

1712. Are you of opinion, therefore, that unless the public-houses are totally closed, the fact of permitting drink to be sold would not prevent drink being consumed on the premises?—My opinion is, that if you have public-houses open on Sundays for the purpose of sale not to be consumed on the premises, you would have localities in which those houses were open in a state of disorder, because you would have a man going in for a glass of grog, or pot of porter, and bringing it out, and drinking it in the streets, and in many instances you would have them charged for tippling in the streets; the result would be that they would be taken into custody if such a state of affairs were to take place.

1713. In fact, the very passing of this Bill as it at present stands would lead to that which you say has already occurred in other instances?—I would not go so far as that; but if public-houses were open, the people coming from the country on Sunday evening would go into those houses, and if they could not consume the liquor on the premises, they would take it outside the door, and consume it there.

1714. Are you of opinion that if public-houses were to be open on the Sunday it would be better, or otherwise, that the time should be continuous; that is to say, that whatever hour they are to be open at on the Sunday, and whatever hour they are to be closed on the Sunday, the time should be continuous, and not be intermittent?—I think it would be better that it should run on.

1715. I think you stated, in the instance of spirit grocers, that, although they are not allowed to sell drink for consumption on the premises, they do manage to sell it for consumption on the premises?—Some of the spirit grocers are habitual violators of their license, and the beer dealers also.

1716. Are you of opinion that the same effect would occur with regard to public-houses if a law was passed not permitting them to consume on the premises, but to sell their liquors as is done now in the case of spirit grocers?—I am of opinion that if public-houses were allowed to open for sale, not to be consumed on the premises, a state of affairs would arise which would not be at all creditable to the city.

MOORE MILLER, Esq., called in; and Examined.

Moore
Miller, Esq.
30 April
1868.

1717. Chairman.] YOU are Resident Magistrate at Armagh, I think?—I am.

1718. How long have you been resident magistrate at Armagh?—Since the year 1846.

1719. How long have you been stationed at Armagh?—In the county for the whole of that time.

1720. Have you considered the question of either entirely closing the public-houses on Sunday or limiting the hours for the sale of intoxicating drinks?—Yes, I have considered the subject for some years past.

1721. What is your opinion with regard to it?—My opinion with regard to it is that a total closing of the houses on Sunday would be more beneficial than a partial closing.

1722. Would you consider that it would be desirable totally to close all houses for the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sundays?—Yes, certainly.

1723. In expressing that opinion, would you include all houses whatever their nature; that is to say, not only public-houses, but refreshment houses and eating houses, and all places where intoxicating drinks could be sold?—Yes, I would wish to explain that by saying that an exception might be made with respect to the persons dwelling in that house or residing in that house as in an hotel, but the other houses being open would lead to an evasion of the law.

1724. That is to say, that the leaving of the refreshment houses open would lead to an evasion of the law?—Quite so, and I believe it would be unsatisfactory to the trade itself; I say that from conversations I have had with persons carrying on the trade.

1725. Then, on the other hand, do you consider that the total closing would be satisfactory to the trade?—I think it would; I have had conversations with many persons carrying on the trade, and they have said to me that provided the law were made, not partially, but carried out fully, it would give satisfaction.

1726. Are you of opinion that it would give rise to dissatisfaction, among the labouring classes, on the ground of its being supposed to be class legislation?—No.

1727. You do not think that they would contrast the position of gentlemen who might frequent their club with their own position?—I do not think they would; I have considered the subject; it is an argument that is used very often in newspapers; it is an ad captandum argument, but I do not think it would have any weight with the labouring classes.

1728. From your experience of the labouring classes in the north of Ireland, you do not think that they would take that view of the matter?—No.

1729. Do you think that it would give rise to any substantial inconvenience by preventing people requiring their meals from getting them on the Sunday?—No. I would make an exception certainly in the case of travellers, limiting it to their travelling a certain distance, say 10 or 12 miles, or something like that.

1730. How would you propose to carry out that exception; how would you propose that it should be ascertained whether a man had travelled, say 10 miles or not?—I do not think there would be much difficulty in that, even as the law stands at present with reference to public-houses; there are certain hours in which there is an exception with regard to travellers on Sunday, and that is always a question for the court before whom a person prosecuted comes.

1731. You do not think there would be any considerable evasion of the law under the pretext of supplying travellers?—No, I think that in the north of Ireland there are not so many travellers upon the Sunday as there are in the south and west; for although I have been stationed all the time I have mentioned in the north of Ireland, I am not unacquainted with the south. I have been often sent there upon special duties, besides that, I know the south of Ireland, and I think that there are more travellers in the west and the south going to large fairs than there are in the north; that is the class of persons who come within the scope of the Act of Parliament.

1732. But then, as regards persons travelling that great distance to fairs, it could be easily ascertained whether they were travellers by their mode of conveyance?—I do not think that class of travelling is common in other places.

1733. Do you know the town of Belfast at all?—Yes, I do.

1734. Is it not the practice there, to a considerable extent, for excursionists to go out to neighbouring parts on the Sunday?—Yes, it is.

1735. Would

1735. Would those excursionists, in your idea, be under the class of travellers?—No, I should not call those bonâ fide travellers. The Committee might think it proper to consider them in another clause, separately and distinctly; but I could not, if I were asked the question, consider them bonâ fide travellers.

1736. Do you consider that that class of persons would be seriously inconvenienced by not being able to obtain intoxicating drinks on Sunday?—No; the law being once ascertained, the necessary provision would be made the night before.

1737. In fact, excursionists would take a basket with them, containing what they would require?—Yes.

1738. There are a good many manufacturing towns in your district of Armagh, are there not?—In my district there are several large towns. Lurgan and Portadown, besides the town of Armagh in which I am stationed, and Market Hill, so that I have a pretty large experience, one way or another; but there is nothing, of course, upon the same scale as at Belfast; and when you ask me if I know Belfast, I reply that I do know it pretty well, and also the north generally; but I am not so well acquainted with that class of excursionists and the habits of the people as the persons continually resident there are.

1739. But, practically, the district of the North that you are acquainted with, is not what you would call a purely agricultural district?—Certainly not.

1740. Is there any large class of workmen in those towns of Armagh, Lurgan, and so on, who live in lodgings where they cannot get their meals, and who would want to go to the refreshment houses to get them?—No, there may be isolated cases; but that is not the rule.

1741. Is there a large class of young men, shopmen, clerks, and others, who habitually get their meals at refreshment houses?—No, it is not their habit.

1741*. In the present Bill it is proposed that the houses for the sale of intoxicating drinks should be open at two separate intervals, from two to four and from eight to nine; do you consider that in case it were deemed necessary that those houses should be open at all, it would be better to have them open only for one continuous period?—That would depend very much upon circumstances; it would be an easier thing to administer the law; but that is the only way in which I could answer the question.

1742. Apparently we may infer that the second opening of the houses, namely, from eight to nine, was put in for the same reason as it was put into the English Bill, that is to say, to enable people to get their supper beer; but from your experience, do you think those people, as a rule, do take beer with their supper?—With reference to that class of people in Ireland, their habits are very different from those of that class of people in England; beer is very little consumed there, and scarcely ever for supper.

1743. Do the people in the north of Ireland habitually consume drinks, either beer or spirits, with their meals, or is not it very much more their practice to go and consume them together for sociality's sake?—Very much more certainly. Liquors, either ardent spirits or beer, are very seldom consumed, except as you say for social purposes. The Irish are a very social people, and they go into a public-house to spend half-an-hour or an hour in company with their friends, and that leads to drinking.

1744. Have you considered at all the question of the hour on Saturday evening to which public-houses are allowed to be kept open?—I have.

1745. At present, it is up to 11 o'clock, is it not?—It is.

1746. Do you consider that that leads to evil consequences, and that it would be desirable to shorten the hours on Saturday evening?—An enormous amount of intoxication takes place on Saturday, much more than upon Sunday: in fact, I would say, from all the information I can gather, and from my own observation, intoxication upon Sunday is not a crying evil in Ireland, and it is not on the increase; therefore, perhaps, the Bill is not so much called for in that respect as regards the amount of Sunday drinking; it is good of itself, but not for that reason. There is more drunkenness on Saturday night, a great deal, than upon Sunday; that arises, of course, from wages being received about that hour on Saturday.

1747. Of course it would be impossible and unjust to close places for the sale of intoxicating drinks on Saturday, but it might be considered possible to close them at an earlier hour than at present; what is your opinion upon that point?—I think an immense good would arise from that.

1748. Considering that the working classes are entitled to every fair opportunity of supplying their reasonable wants, and that nobody wishes to inconvenience them unfairly, what hour would you say would be a fair hour to close places for the sale of drinks on Saturday evening?—As early as seven.

1749. Recollecting that that closing would include spirit grocers, and every other house where drinks were sold, do you think that it would be desirable to close as early as seven?—I think so; I think if you extended the hour much beyond that the beneficial effect would be lessened.

1750. About what time are wages generally paid in the north?—In a great number of the houses business is suspended early; sometimes at two o'clock on Saturday, in large factories.

1751. And what time are the wages generally paid?—I think about that time; I know that it is the opinion of the employers of labour that an enormous amount of good would be effected by so closing the public-houses.

1752. Mr. O'Neill.] Is it your opinion that the partial closing upon Sunday would be hard upon the trade, but not the total closing, or do you only give that as a general opinion from your own observation?—I may have used an ill-considered word, in saying partially; but I meant to indicate a closing that was carried out impartially.

1753. Mr. Dawson.] Is it the case in your district, that after the refusal by the magistrates of applications for licenses, those same parties obtain a grocer's license, and then that on another application the magistrates generally grant the license after having refused it in the first place. My reason for asking the question is, that I have heard in the district about Lurgan, which I know very well, that that is a very common practice?—No, I do not think so. If you will allow me, I think I can just hit upon a case in point. I remember, at the Lurgan quarter sessions, a man having applied for a license, and he was refused. Whether he had a spirit grocer's license at the time or not I will not undertake to say, but he subsequently subsequently had, and he applied, I think, four times at least, perhaps oftener, and was refused each time.

1754. The population of the towns in your district is growing rapidly, is it not?—It is rising every day, Lurgan and Potadown especially. If you will allow me to say, I think one of the great evils with regard to public-houses in Ireland is the facility with which they get a license. Almost every man thinks he is entitled to a license, and he says, "I may just as well make a trade of it as my neighbour; my next-door neighbour sells whisky, and why should not I?" and he embarks in the thing without any capital, without any means of having a good house and giving that accommodation to the public which he is expected to give from his license.

1755. Do you know at all the proportion of public-houses in Lurgan to the number of the population?—No, I have not furnished myself with the statistics, but I might say as a general rule that the proportion of public-houses in almost all the towns is rather in excess of the want; and this I can say decidedly, that there is a tendency on the part of the magistrates to keep that excess from overflowing, as it were; to keep it down.

1756. I understand your opinion is in favour of total closing on Sunday, and of a limit on Saturday night?—That is the sum total of my evidence.

1757. Mr. Murphy.] You are clearly of opinion that every house which has a license to sell liquors should be closed on Sunday in order to do any real good?—I think so.

1758. And that otherwise a partial opening even of licensed public-houses, or a permission for eating-houses to consume liquor on the premises on Sunday, would, in fact, leave things exactly as they are at present?—I think so.

1759. The effect of this Bill is simply to allow an eating-house keeper to sell spirits as much as he likes until he closes at night, if the party comes in and buys a cake, say, at the same time?—Yes.

1760. If that was to be the case, do you think that the evils which in your opinion exist would not be remedied?—I think it would leave the door open.

1761. You would say that every place which sold liquors should be closed altogether?—Yes, I am very firmly of that opinion; I may be altogether wrong, but that is my opinion.

1762. Have your duties made you acquainted more with the rural districts than with the urban populations?—As I just mentioned, in my district there are several very large towns where factories are carried on, and therefore my experience is rather varied; but I am acquainted with the rural and the manufacturing populations both.

1763. Are you of opinion that if total closing took place on Sunday, it would lead to an illicit traffic?—No, not if properly carried out; it would be impossible by any legislation to prevent people altogether from doing that which was prohibited, but I do not think it would lead to illicit traffic.

1764. Are you or are you not of opinion, that there would be a greater tendency to illicit traffic if total closing took place than under the present regulations?—No, I think there would not. I think after the law was once understood and carried out, the illicit traffic would cease.

1765. Are you prepared with any return of committals for drunkenness from your district on Saturday and Sunday?—No, I am not, but I can speak pretty authoritatively upon the fact that intoxication is not so very great on Sunday, and that the great part takes place on Saturday. I think statistics, if you will permit me to say so, very often lead people into error.

1766. Have you of your own observation observed what class of people it is that get intoxicated on the Saturday night?—It is the artisan class, I think, much more than the labourers; not exclusively so, but more so.

1767. Have you ever made any observations as to whether that intoxication is habitual to them as a class, or is merely erratic, or temporary, or occasional?—I think it is rather a habit, unfortunately.

1768. And your opinion is, that they have acquired the habit of getting intoxicated on the Saturday?—I think so, and that class of persons, generally, have a character as it were, from the police; those who look after those people, and those who administer justice, will point out such persons as mauvais sujet.

1769. That is the class of people who generally get intoxicated during the late hours that the public-houses are open on Saturday night?—I think so.

1770. Supposing you restricted the hour to seven o'clock on Saturday night, as you have mentioned, do you think, or do you not think, that as regards that class of persons whom you have referred to as being habitually intoxicated on Saturday night, the mere closing on Saturday evening would prevent those parties from getting drunk if they chose to get it elsewhere?—I think it would have the effect of reforming them; besides, that is not the class entirely to which I allude, because it is my opinion that they mislead others who would not otherwise drink to excess.

1771. Is it your opinion that if there were people inclined to drink in a town where the licensed public-houses were in the habit of shutting early, they would go and get drink if they knew where to get it?—That tendency might be so great that they would certainly look for it, but finding the opportunity gone, I do not see why I should despair of its having a good effect.

1772. Are you prepared to say from any experience you have had in the matter, that such a state of things would not tend to illicit traffic, or to the establishment of shebeen houses, or to places where parties would find drink for them, if the hours of the public-houses were shortened?—I think that there might be attempts upon the part, as you say, of illicit traders; but on the Saturday more than upon the Sunday.

1773. Do you think that it is most likely that it would lead to attempts, not that there might be, but that there would be such attempts?—I dare say there would be attempts, but I think the law would be strong enough to put them down; I think that the balance between evil and good will be that the good would preponderate.

1774. But you cannot of course exactly give a positive opinion whether there would be any absolute effect with reference to the balance of good and evil; but can you say, from any opinion that you are capable of forming, which would preponderate?—I should say that the good would preponderate.

1775. But at most it would be an experiment?—I think it would be an experiment.

1776. You were asked a question by the honourable Chairman about excursionists going from from towns within your district; is it the fact that tradespeople and mechanics on the Sunday go out into the rural portions of the district, and take their wives and children with them for a stroll to the outskirts of the towns?—Yes, very much so.

1777. Are you aware what the habits of the people on those days are; do they take refreshments with them, or do they, if they feel tired after their walk, go into a respectable vintner's place and get a glass of spirits or beer and bread and cheese?—I cannot speak very decidedly about their habits.

1778. Do you not think it likely that they require some refreshment after being out for four or five hours upon the Sunday?—Yes; and it was for that reason that, in answer to the honourable Chairman's question, I said that if the closing on the Sunday was total, provision would be made by those people; people would think beforehand, and would lay in their little stock of provisions before they went out.

1779. In the case of a man going out with his wife or three or four companions to take a walk, do you think that a man would carry a basket with him all the while he was walking, with something made up from the previous night, in order that he might get some refreshment (for that is the only way in which it could be done), or how would you provide for them?—I do not see how they could be provided for.

1780. In fact, they would have to do without it altogether?—It would amount to that.

1781. Do you think that that limitation of their ordinary legitimate amusement and refreshment would be looked upon as a kind of hardship?—I do not.

1782. Do you mean to say that if they were to close the public-houses at the hour you mention, a tradesman or mechanic who wished to go out and take a walk for five or six miles to some country place and come back, having spent some five or six hours in doing that, would not feel it a hardship if the law prohibited him from getting refreshment upon the Sunday evening?—I do not think so; I think that it is the principle of all legislation, that the few have to give way to the good of the many.

1783. That is very true; but is it your opinion that in this case the inconvenience would be confined to the few, and that the mass of the population would be benefitted?—I do think so; I would say that one out of ten excursionists would feel aggrieved.

1784. What do you call excursionists?—People who walk about.

1785. Are not people much more in the habit of walking, so far as numbers are concerned, than of going out of town? A tradesman cannot always afford to take a car, and the labourers cannot afford to do that; they would rather take their own legs, would they not?—That might be so.

1786. One of the reasons which you gave, as I understood you, for wishing to have public-houses closed at seven on Saturday was, that upon that day, in your district, business was generally over at an early hour, and that the wages were paid at an early hour. Now, supposing a state of things exactly the reverse of that was in existence in large cities, would you think that under those circumstances seven would be the proper hour to close the public-houses on Saturday evenings, supposing that wages were not paid until nine or ten?—Would you permit me, with very great respect, to ask if I must assume that.

1787. You must assume it. I am putting that case to you?—Then I reply, no. I gave as a reason before for saying seven, that I would allow time for the people to transact their business, and therefore, of course, if you assume that they are not paid until nine, I should say that some little grace should be allowed.

1788. Supposing, in large cities also, that the public markets for provisions were not closed until 10 or 11 at night, and 12 on Saturday nights, would that also be a further reason, in your opinion, for not limiting the hour of closing to seven, taking into consideration the convenience of the tradespeople and the labouring classes, who would not be paid their wages until nine or ten?—I am afraid it would not be for their good to keep the houses open later. I think, if I must assume that the wages are not paid till nine or ten o'clock, it would only make a difference of closing them by one hour; by law they are closed at 11. I presume you are not talking of London, are you?

1789. My question has reference to Cork and Dublin?—And then the difference would be so marked between seven and eleven that there is a reason for taking a stand. If you could not effect any good by merely abridging it by an hour, then I would say le jeu n'en vaut pas la chandelle.

1790. You said, and I agree with you, the one reason in your opinion for an abuse, as well as I understood you, on the part of keepers of public-houses, was the facility for getting licenses?—Yes, I think so.

1791. And your opinion is that, if greater supervision was exercised in the granting of licenses, confining them to persons of known respectability in their various grades, a better effect would be produced?—The benefit would be enormous.

1792. Major Gavin.] I think you stated that you were of opinion that all public-houses, or houses of refreshment, should be closed on the Sunday?—Yes.

1793. Is there a club in Armagh?—No, there is not.

1794. Is there no place where the county gentlemen meet when they go into the town?—No.

1795. But suppose you wanted a bottle of sherry on a Sunday in Armagh, could not you get it?—At an hotel; I suppose so.

1796. And would you shut up hotels as well as public-houses?—Oh no.

1797. Would you not shut them up, except for travellers?—Yes, I would, except for bona fide travellers; but then that would not be exactly shutting them up.

1798. But you know if hotels were open upon a Sunday you could go in, though you were not a traveller, and order what you chose?—That would be against the law.

1799. This Bill does not propose at all to shut up public-houses altogether on the Sunday, but proposes shutting them up partially, allowing them to be open from two to four and from eight to nine for the sale of liquors not to be consumed on the premises?—That I understand.

1800. Do you know what the population of Armagh is?—I think about 9,000. I do not profess to be accurate; it was 10,000, but it is much lower.

1801. And I think, in answer to Mr. Murphy, you you said that if you prevented the public-houses being opened, there would be a lot of shebeen-houses opened; do you know what a shebeen-house is; perhaps you have not any in the north?—I understand the term perfectly; a shebeen-house, as I understand, is a place where whisky is sold without a licence, and it is generally a low term, it implies a low house of that class.

1802. But they do exist in Armagh and its neighbourhood occasionally?—Yes.

1803. Is it not the case that in the neighbourhood of Armagh there are ball courts, courts where they play ball?—No, I do not think that there are any.

1804. Is it prohibited on the Sunday?—No, I do not think so; but I do not think there are such things as ball courts, it is not a very common game.

1805. Is there such a thing as a dance-house open on Sunday where young men and women go to dance in the rural districts?—I do not say that there are not such things, but they are not common.

1806. Chairman.] It has been stated in evidence that there are one or two classes of employers in the City of Dublin who do not pay their wages on Saturday evening until, perhaps, 10 o'clock; would you, or would you not consider the fact of exceptional classes only receiving their wages at 10 o'clock a sufficient reason for keeping open the shops, whilst the great majority of the wages-receiving class receive their wages earlier?—I should think that that should not prevent legislation for the community at large.

1807. Mr. Dawson.] In the district of the railways in the north of Ireland, in your district, is the sale of whisky permitted at all the refreshment rooms at the different stations?—Certainly.

1808. Would you include, in your closing, a prohibitory power in connection with the excursionist traffic by railway, by closing also the refreshment rooms on railways?—No, I would not include them, because I would consider that they came under the exception with respect to travellers; but then that liberty should be confined within bounds, and then the keeper of the refreshment room would be considered liable if he gave refreshments to parties, not bonâ fide travellers.

1809. When first those railways in the north of Ireland were opened, they tried to prevent the sale of whisky at the stations, but I believe that that endeavour has been relaxed since; are you aware of that?—They certainly have an opportunity of selling spirits of all sorts and kinds.

Mr. GARRETT BARRY, called in; and Examined.

Mr.
G. Barry.

1810. Mr. Murphy.] I BELIEVE you are President of the Cork Vintners' Society?—I am.

1811. What are the objects of your society?—At the time we commenced to form the society the trade was not in what we may call a pleasing or respectable condition at Cork; I was in the trade then, and I found that there was room for improvement, and we associated together to prevent abuses, and make the trade, if possible, more respectable than it was at the time.

1812. How long ago was that?—I should think about 11 years ago.

1813. Did you succeed in effecting an improvement in the trade?—Quite so.

1814. What were the particular objects that you directed your attention to for that purpose?—The main object was to remedy the looseness with which licenses were granted to parties who were not fit to hold them.

1815. And how did you propose to correct that?—By employing lawyers on the days for granting licenses to show that such-and-such parties were not fit to have and to hold licenses.

1816. Have you heard the evidence which Mr. Miller gave?—Partly.

1817. Then you would concur with him that the facility which did exist for parties not properly qualified getting licenses led to abuses?—Certainly.

1818. And your object was to remedy that as far as you could?—Certainly.

1819. Are there any shebeen or illicit houses in Cork just now?—I do not know; they must be very much sub rosa if there are; we cannot find them at all; but some time ago there were plenty of them.

1820. Selling in the streets?—Selling in the streets.

1821. Chairman.] Did you initiate prosecutions?—Yes, and put the keepers of them to prison.

1822. Mr. Murphy.] The effect of your proceedings was to put an end to the shebeen-houses?—Yes.

1823. And to protect the honest trader?—Yes; we looked upon it that the honest man was receiving the opprobrious epithets which were applied to the publican in Ireland on account of those people.

1824. At that time what was the value of a license as compared with the present value?—At that time a license, unless in a very good position, and with a good investment attached to it, was worth nothing.

1825. That is to say, it was worth no premium?—Exactly, it was worth no premium.

1826. Are you prepared to say, from your own knowledge, or from any information you have received, what the average or particular value of licenses now is in comparison now in Cork, as compared with their value at the period you mention?—I think a person holding a very obscure place in a back lane could now get 50 l.

1827. Even in an obscure part?—That is the market value of it.

1828. Of course there must be a larger corresponding value in a better situation and a better class of house?—The vendor of a license wishing to sell in a good place could get more.

1829. How much would he be likely to get?—I would not say how much; it depends upon what the place would be worth.

1830. Would he get 100 l. for it?—I have known 200 l.; they ranged from 50 l. to 200 l.

1831. The consequence then of the improved pecuniary value of the license is the cessation, owing to the exertions of your society, of illicit houses for selling spirits?—Decidedly.

1832. That is the direct consequence of it?—Yes.

1833. Have you read this Bill?—I have.

1834. And you know, of course, the objects of it?—I do.

1835. Have

1835. Have you formed any opinion with reference to what the effect of this Bill, if carried into a law, would be upon the holding of licenses by respectable vintners in the city of Cork, and in the vicinity of Cork; the rural districts and liberties around?—My opinion is founded upon long experience, and I would venture to say that if that Bill be carried a license worth 50 l. to-day would not in a month be worth 10 l.; that is my opinion.

1836. Upon what reasons have you founded that opinion?—My reason is that in the suburban portions of large cities the poorer classes of traders depend mainly upon Sunday trading.

1837. You refer to the poorer class of licensed vintners?—Yes; and if this Bill should become law, and they could not trade as usual, they would rather turn to something else, and consequently they would throw their licenses into the market, and thereby reduce the bonâ fide licenses in value: the licenses would come too much upon the market; they would leave the trade, because it would not pay them to remain in it unless you gave them the usual course of action on Sunday.

1838. Have you formed any opinion with reference to the amount of business done by public-houses in the vicinity of Cork on Sundays, as compared with weekdays?—The rural and suburban districts, I should say, do most of what they do in the business on Sundays.

1839. That is to say, they do nearly as much on Sunday as they do in the whole six days of the week?—I am sure of that.

1840. In fact, their principal trade is derived from their Sunday selling?—Yes, certainly.

1841. Have you the means of being enabled to inform the Committee to what class of persons they sell their beer, or whiskey, or whatever it is that they do sell?—I would say that that class of people who hold houses in the suburbs have plain establishments; and, from my knowledge, I think that their customers are the working people.

1842. It was given in evidence here, by Mr. Hamilton, I think, the stipendiary magistrate of Cork, that, in his opinion, there were as many as 60,000 people, on the average, throughout the year, tradesmen, and people of the working classes and others, who went out from Cork, on Sundays, to the neighbouring villages, and down the river; is that the class of people to whom you allude?—Certainly.

1843. What is your opinion of the Bill, generally speaking, supposing it should become law; would it have the effect of preventing excess in drinking?—None, whatever, in my judgment.

1844. Why do you say that?—Because, I believe, and have known from experience, that the more penal you make the law to regulate the sale of beer and spirits the more likely it is to be violated, and not availed of; this Bill is penal.

1845. You are aware of that from your own observations and your own experience?—From my own experience and from my own observation upon the trade, that traders look upon laws, with regard to the sale of beer and spirits in Ireland, as penal laws, and anything to make them more penal will certainly excite a desire to evade them.

1846. Do you think, or are you prepared to say, as a positive opinion of yours, that the partial closing proposed by this Bill whereby spirits are not allowed to be consumed on the premises where they were bought, would lead to a violation of the law by illicit houses, or by substituting a taproom in a neighbouring house for the taproom in the present public-house?—Nothing could promote it better.

1847. Are you aware that, in the city of Cork, there are great facilities for doing that?—Undoubtedly.

1848. In fact your opinion is that if this Bill, as it is now printed, should become law, it will become inoperative?—Yes.

1849. While at the same time it would lead to illicit traffic, and materially injure the capital of the present traders?—Yes, I explained that in the petition to Parliament last Session fully.

1850. Are you of opinion that, if a law were passed, totally closing every house where drink was sold on a Sunday, it would have a good or bad effect?—A bad effect.

1851. In what way would it lead to secret drinking?—I conceive that the operative and working classes, having no day for pleasure and recreation but the Sunday, cannot enjoy that day without some refreshment, and that refreshment must partake of the nature of liquor in some form or other. Then, besides that, if they could not get it at the public-houses, they would find sufficient accommodation by jarvey women and shebeen houses, and matters of that kind, and what is worse, the article they would get would be a drug.

1852. That is to say, it would be adulterated?—It would be adulterated.

1853. Have you any experience from your own knowledge of any attempt at surreptitious trade at any time in Cork by persons selling in the street adulterated spirits?—Yes, and have convicted on a couple of occasions, or more, probably. I do not remember now how many parties selling liquors and keeping shebeen houses; what we mean by that is, unlicensed houses selling at all hours.

1854. Have you had any knowledge of women, for instance, or persons at the corners of streets having on their persons adulterated spirits, and selling them?—I have not seen them, but I have heard of it frequently.

1855. How was it that that custom sprang up?—It arose from two causes. In Cork, until our society began to work, some houses would be open after the hours; but after we compelled them to look sharp, these people availed themselves of the opportunity, or thought they could avail themselves of it, to carry spirits about, and did so frequently; in fact, cases of that kind have come before the magistrates where they were convicted, I may say on several occasions.

1856. What you mean to convey to the Committee is this: that when your society began their operations there were irregular or shebeen houses in Cork?—Yes, undoubtedly.

1857. That your action put them down, but that parties who had been in the habit of selling illegally resorted, in order to get back their trade, if I may call it so, to the operation of women going about with jars in which there was adulterated spirits, and in that way doing what they had been doing in the illicit houses?—Unquestionably.

1858. Are you of opinion that, if the hour of closing public-houses on Sunday evening or Saturday evening, were restricted to such a time as seven or eight, or even nine o'clock, a habit something thing similar to that would or would not spring up?—Certainly; it would be all one public nuisance altogether; we could have no order, as far as I can see; you could have no morality, and you could have no sobriety, because everything would go the wrong way.

1859. Would you think then that it would give a handle to those parties to resort to their old practice?—It would revive it immediately; that hour would not do.

1860. Have you formed an opinion what hour should be adopted for closing on Sunday evening?—In Ireland the people are paid very late.

1861. My question had reference to Sunday evening, not Saturday. The Bill proposes to limit the hours of opening from two to four, and to close then until eight, and to open them until nine; supposing the hours were to be continuous, that is to say, that from the time of opening on Sunday, the public-house should keep open until the law ordered it to close, what hour do you think would be the best to close at on Sunday evening, assuming it were necessary to restrict the present hour?—I should think nine o'clock.

1862. Reverting to the old law?—Yes, reverting to the old law.

1863. Is it your opinion that it would be better that whatever the hours are, that public-houses should be open on Sunday, they should be continuous rather than intermittent?—It would be better that they should be continuous, because it would be very difficult to supervise them by any inspectors at those intervals; they would take more advantage of the intermittent than of the continuous permission.

1864. Several questions have been asked about Saturday evening; have you directed your attention to the question of the hour at which public-houses should be closed on Saturday evening in reference to this matter?—I have.

1865. Are you of opinion that the present hour could be abridged; I think 11 is the present hour of closing?—Eleven.

1866. Do you think that any advantage will arise to the public by abridging the hour on Saturday night?—I should say not, and for several reasons.

1867. Would you be kind enough to state those reasons?—In the first place, the people who avail themselves of that late hour are very humble working men, porters and servants in establishments, and they are paid generally very late. They contemplate, of course, before going home, that they should have a drink, and some little thing or other. When they get their wages, they go into a place where they can count it and arrange their purchases, and the wife will meet and settle with the husband what she will buy and carry home; and if you close that place you give them no facility of doing anything, or getting any little refreshment, or being able to calculate how they will lay out their little money.

1868. You say the wife would settle with her husband what they would buy and carry home; do you mean by that what amount of marketing she should buy?—Yes. The second thing in connection with this part of the question would be, that on Saturday evenings undoubtedly the illicit establishments about the town, of which you spoke, would spring up, and those parties knowing that the working man had a little money would avail themselves of the temptation connected with it, of getting him a little drink round the corner.

1869. Have you considered whether the hour of closing on Saturday night might be restricted without any inconvenience to the working classes, and probably to their benefit?—I would feel inclined to believe that the respectable men in the trade would have no objection, provided all the other evils could be guarded against, to closing at, we will say, 10, yet it would be a loss to them where such circumstances as those to which I have alluded occur, and they mostly do occur in very large towns.

1870. In fact, your opinion is simply this, that if any limitation of the Saturday evening hours were entered into by any proposed Bill, so far as the restriction was concerned, a class of she-beens, corner houses, if I may call it so, would spring up to substitute that which at present exists?—That is my opinion, undoubtedly.

1871. Have you made any inquiry or directed your attention to the fact as to whether drunkenness has been diminishing or increasing within the last few years in the city of Cork?—Drunkenness has certainly declined in Cork, whether it arises from the want of employment or from the high price of spirits I do not know, but certainly it has declined.

1872. Within what period?—I might say four or five years.

1873. Do you make that remark from personal observation or from statistical information?—I make it from my connection with and from my knowledge of the trade.

1874. Mr. Dawson.] The statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer the other night in his budget speech, was that there had been a much greater consumption of spirits in the last year, representing a sum of 150,000*l.* more than during the previous year; how do you account for that?—That may be the case, but not among the working classes.

1875. Mr. Murphy.] Are these the rules of the society of which you are president (handing a book to the Witness)?—Yes, they are; I have copies of them.

1876. I will just read the 17th rule for you, and will you tell me if this is correct: "That the Committee shall elect a secretary, who shall be paid as it shall think fit. The duty of the secretary shall be to keep the accounts of the society in a clear, satisfactory manner; that he shall, when directed by the proper authority so to do, summon the several members at least three days before the time of meeting, under a fine of 6*d.* for every neglect. He shall collect subscriptions and entrance money and arrears due by the members, and hand same to the treasurer, including fines, from whom he shall receive an acknowledgment, which he shall enter in the proper book or books of the society. He shall keep an alphabetical list of the trade, and a strict watch on parties (particularly on Saturday nights and Sundays) who conduct their business not in accordance with the laws, and shall report their names to the sub-inspector, and use his best exertions to bring them to justice. He shall keep a diary in which he will record the names of those who refuse to obey the Publicans Acts, by keeping illegal and disorderly establishments. He shall, on seeing any public-house or place where beer and spirits are sold, open at illegal hours, immediately report the same to the police, and make entries in his diary of the particulars of the reports sent by him from time to time to the constabulary, and shall furnish the committee with a weekly weekly detail of his labours. And that he shall hold office during the pleasure of the committee?"

—Yes, that is the rule.

1877. Chairman.] You mentioned with regard to closing public-houses on Saturday evening, that they were closed there would be no place where the poor man and his wife could meet and calculate what they would wish to buy, and how much they would wish to spend?—I take it that that would be so.

1878. I do not understand that the public-house is the only place where a man and his wife could arrange their purchases?—But that is one of the inconveniences that would result. I do not mean to say that they do that as a matter of invariable usage, but it is an opportunity which is availed of.

1879. Do not this class of people purchase things in other shops besides spirit shops on the Saturday evening?—Yes, they do, certainly.

1880. And would not the other houses where they purchased things be as good to meet in and settle their purchases as public houses?—No, because they cannot sit down in them.

1881. You have said that the wife would be able to settle with the husband what she would carry home; I presume you meant what provisions she should buy and carry home?—Yes.

1882. Have you ever heard that what the wife wanted badly to see her husband for in the public-house, was to settle whether she was to have any money to carry home at all?—That no doubt is the case sometimes; but, generally speaking, I think that the shutting up of the houses at the hour mentioned in the Act of Parliament would inconvenience many of them to a serious extent, and would give birth to other evils.

1883. You mentioned that drunkenness has decreased of late years; I believe it has done so throughout Ireland?—I understand so.

1884. Have you any statistics to show what the decrease is in Cork?—I could not give that.

1885. Could you say at all what is the proportion of cases of drunkenness taken up by the police on Saturday and Sunday in Cork, as compared with the other days of the week?—I have heard indirectly, from the Bridewell keeper of Cork, that the Sunday arrests (that is to say, the arrests for Sunday drinking) have been and are very few.

1886. Have you any information as to what proportion they bear to the arrests during the rest of the week?—I could not say relatively what they would be; but as far as I could ascertain from the traders, Sunday produces the least number.

1887. But you do not find that in the evidence, because we have had a good deal of evidence to show that in Cork, as well as in Dublin and in other cities, the proportion of arrests on Sunday is much larger than upon any other day in the week?—I think that arises from Saturday's indulgence.

1888. And would you add, chiefly Saturday evening and night's indulgence?—I would be inclined to think that the great number you are speaking of arises from Saturday, and not from Sunday.

1889. Some witnesses of considerable experience with regard to the police have stated that the great majority of cases of drunkenness on Saturday evening and Sunday morning occur from drinking at a late hour on Saturday evening, between nine and eleven; would you be prepared to assent to that?—I think that that approximates to the fact.

1890. I presume that I am not to understand from you that the great mass of employers of labour in Cork do not pay their men their wages until a late hour on Saturday evening?—No, I do not include those respectable people; but there are a great many industrious people, shoemakers, and tailors, and dressmakers, and various classes who cannot get their wages, and who are actually waiting about to get their wages.

1891. But still the great majority of the labouring classes in Cork receive their wages at a reasonable hour on Saturday evening?—Yes, the great majority of them do.

1892. So that the necessity of leaving the public-houses open late on Saturday night would arise not from the desirability of serving the convenience of the great majority of the people, but of a section of it?—I would say the half of it.

1893. Would you say that the half of the employers do not pay till a late hour?—There are many other circumstances that would prevent these people from availing themselves of an earlier hour besides that; it is their constant impression that the public-houses being open till 11 o'clock, they have time enough to make their purchases before that.

1894. They generally transact their business first, and then go and have some drink?—Yes, that is so.

1895. You stated that, in your opinion, the more penal the law was the worse?—Undoubtedly.

1896. How far would you carry that principle; the laws are very penal in regard to selling intoxicating drinks at present, are they not; there are many hours in which it is prohibited to sell them; do you think anything would be gained by doing away with those restrictions?—I cannot think that in Ireland you could advantageously make the laws relative to the sale of liquor more penal than they are at present.

1897. There are restrictions at present; the houses are obliged to keep shut from 11 o'clock on Saturday night till two o'clock on Sunday. I wish to know, seeing that you think it undesirable to restrict the hours any further, whether it would be desirable, in your opinion, to open them during those hours when they are now closed?—I do not think it would be desirable to open them in the now prohibited hours.

1898. Then your objection to the penal laws stops at the present point; you think it desirable to maintain the present penal restrictions, but not to increase them?—No. I would go very far to allow fair play in the matter; but, as I said before, if you restrict the hours according to the proposal of the Bill, you do a positive injury to the keepers of the public-houses, and also to the public.

1899. To go to another point: you state that your association have succeeded almost perfectly, as I understand you, in putting down the shebeen houses, and almost all the other means of obtaining illicit drinks in the city of Cork?—There may be one small one left, but I do not think there is one.

1900. In that, your success has been mainly due to the action of the police, has it not?—No, that is not so; we infringed so much upon their authority at the beginning, that they appeared to feel that we were innovators, and they gave us a good deal of opposition; but with the aid of the public, and through the instrumentality of the press, with which I am connected, we brought the public to see that they were doing wrong.

1901. Mr. Murphy.] In fact, you succeeded in spite of the police?—We succeeded in spite of the police.

1902. Chairman.] Do you think that if the police had set to work, and done their duty, they would have succeeded?—I think not.

1903. Why not?—The society made it a point to publish everything connected with a party who was brought before the magistrates or before the recorder, charged with a violation of the Publicans' Acts, and that had a great impression upon the public and upon the police, and we then found them more active than usual.

1904. But supposing the police were anxious to do their duty, there would be nothing to prevent them publishing the circumstances as you do, if they were determined to do their duty, and to act as you acted; why could they not have succeeded?—They might do it; but the circumstances would not receive the publicity they do receive under the influence of the society.

1905. But still the police could have done it, if they chose to do their duty thoroughly?—Certainly they could, but the cases would not have been known to the public very often.

1906. You are not prepared to say that if the police were determined to do their duty they would not be able to stop the sale of illicit drinks on Saturday evening if the hours were shortened, or upon the Sunday if the hours were shortened?—I think you would require to increase the police force.

1907. But being increased, they could do it?—You would have to increase them very largely.

1908. Is there a large amount of Sunday drinking going on in Cork and its vicinity?—I do not think there is the same number of arrests; perhaps there is not a great deal of drinking on Sundays.

1909. Do you, or do you not, think there is much Sunday drinking (I am not asking with reference to the amount of drunkenness) in Cork and its vicinity?—I do not think there is.

1910. Would you kindly reconcile that answer with your statement that the value of the trade in Sunday drinking, to the publicans in Cork and its vicinity, is equal to the whole value of the other six days?—I said in the suburban parts.

1911. All my questions have been with reference to Cork and its vicinity?—I did not make that distinction which I should have done. What I mean to say is, that in those portions of the district which lie five or six miles off from the town those parties do live upon Sunday trading.

1912. Then do you wish to qualify your answer by saying that there is a good deal of Sunday drinking in the suburban districts of Cork?—There is a great deal of it, owing to the great number of persons that go for pleasure out of the city. I know that they will avail themselves of the pleasure of taking a pint of porter, or a drink of something or other, but in the city itself I do not think there is much drinking on the Sabbath.

1913. There are, I believe, 490 persons in your trade in the city of Cork and in the neighbourhood; do you include in this return the neighbourhood as well?—That includes a portion of the suburban districts; but I should say 500 would be nearer the number.

1914. Could you tell me what number of vintners there are in the suburbs, and what in the city; is there one-half in the suburbs?—The district is so large that there might be 500.

1915. Out of those 500 houses which there may be, do you think 200 are in the suburban districts?—I do not think there are so many.

1916. Would you say there are 150 of them in the suburban districts?—If you mean by suburban the districts without the borough boundary there would be nearly 200.

1917. Are those somewhere about 200 houses, establishments which would lose largely by being shut up on the Sunday?—Yes.

1918. Those in the city, I take it from your evidence, would not lose largely?—Not what you would call largely; not so largely as the others.

1919. Will you kindly explain, then, how it is that if out of 500 houses, 200 would lose largely by losing the Sunday trading, and 300 would not lose perceptibly, the effect of doing away with the Sunday trading would be to destroy the value of the licenses of the whole 500 as you stated it would?—Lay the 200 on the 300, and the licenses of the 300 would not be worth a penny.

1920. But those 200 could not take their houses up bodily, as they do in America, and go into the city, in order to annoy men who had got houses in the city?—They could not of course do that, but if you deprive a man of the income that he has, which is derived mainly from one day in a week or a month, he is dispirited and will not keep on with a thing that will not pay him.

1921. But the statement is that if the houses were closed on Sundays alone it would totally destroy the value of a license, which is now from 50*l.* to 200*l.*, and I want to know how it would destroy the value of the license of a house in the city of Cork which did not do much business on the Sunday, although I quite admit that it might affect a house in the suburbs, which did do its business on the Sunday?—The amount of property in any market regulates its value, and those people coming in perhaps two or three in a month, and throwing in their licenses, the buyers finding so many in the market would only give a low price for them; one man would take 30*l.*, one 20*l.*, and one 10*l.*; it would come to that; it must reduce the value of a real bonâ fide licensed house.

1922. What I cannot see, is how a house being closed in the suburbs because it was no longer profitable to keep it open, could affect the value of the license of a house in the city of Cork, which did not do much business on the Sunday?—From the very fact of men in the suburbs being obliged to sell their license.

1923. Then it would come to this, that if a man in Dublin gave up his license that would affect the value of a man's license in the city of Cork?—No; that would make no difference.

1924. Why not?—That would be too far to travel to get a drink.

1925. Then a license thrown up in Queens-town would not affect the value of a license in Cork?—Not so far as you have stated.

1926. Then you will not maintain your original proposition that the surrendering of a few licenses in the district would affect the value of all the licenses in Cork?—No; not to the full extent of that.

1927. Am I right in understanding your argument to be this, that the licensed vintners of Cork, by their praiseworthy exertions in putting down own drunkenness, have raised the value of a cense in the city of Cork?—Undoubtedly.

G. Barry.

1928. Not its legal value?—No; but its intrinsic value.

1929. Its value for purposes of sale?—Yes.

1930. You consider, therefore, that the publicans having to pay a considerable sum for their censes have acquired a peculiar right, and that whether or not it was desirable, in the interest of the public, that Sunday trading should be stopped, the publican should, in virtue of having paid a certain sum for his license, be permitted to trade upon the Sunday?—I will not go so far as that; I would look at the fact of drunkenness having diminished a good deal, and I believe that, at present, the city of Cork in every way, so far as that trade is concerned, is very well conditioned indeed.

1931. Then you do not press the argument of injuring the property of the vintner, so far as to say, that the Legislature have not the right to interfere with their property, even if it be for the good of the public?—No; I would not press it so far as that.

1932. And you would hardly, I suppose, support the epithet which was applied in your petition, and which was made use of at your very influential meeting in Cork, of calling any change in the law a confiscating law?—I look upon it as confiscating, inasmuch as it would deprive a man who has, perhaps, his whole means invested in that property, and who has, perhaps, purchased the house, or rebuilt it out of his profit. I consider anything that would deteriorate that man's property, if he is a man who keeps a respectable house, would be confiscation.

1933. Do you consider that in the event of any change in the law which was for the public good, but which might injure one particular class, the public have not a right to do what is right, although it might injure one or two individuals?—I agree that that is a moral principal which is very right; but see the individual losses that would arise.

1934. You presided, I think, at a very influential meeting of your trade with regard to this Bill in Cork last year at the end of June?—I did.

1935. I wish to draw your attention to one or two arguments which were adduced then, in order to see how far they will meet with your concurrence now; one of those was, that if this Bill passed it would shut up the distilleries and the breweries?—There is a misprint in that, I think.

1936. I have the Report here: "In this country we have no other manufactures of the least consequence" (except the distilleries and breweries); "and if those establishments are closed by cruel legislation, what will become of the people." You would not press that argument so far as that?—That would be too extreme; that does not exactly represent what was stated.

1937. Then you would not press that argument to the extent that it was put there, that "it would be a serious loss to the farmers and to the country if these establishments were closed, there would then be no purchasers for either barley or oats"?—I did not state that, but I agree that would be the case.

1938. That if this Bill was passed "there would then be no purchasers for either barley or oats;" do you mean to stand to that?—I would not go so far as to say all that; but I do say that anything that interferes with the legitimate working of an honest respectable trader would be in some way an injury to trade, and would reduce the value of barley and oats, of which the distillers and brewers are, locally speaking, very large purchasers.

1939. Do you seriously maintain here that if this Bill were passed, or if a Bill were passed closing the public-houses on Sunday, it would affect, by one farthing a quarter, the price of barley?—I would not say that it would affect it much.

1940. Would it affect it to the extent of one penny a quarter?—Not having been in the trade, I cannot say; but if you close on the Sundays, that would be seven weeks in the year taken away from the present traders.

1941. Then do you, as a publican, look upon the 52 Sundays as equivalent to 52 common working days upon which the publican is entitled to carry on his trade as he is upon the 300 other working days?—I would not look upon it in that light for every trade, but I would look upon the Sunday as a day upon which the working man is entitled to get a little comfort and refreshment, and that it would not be right to close upon that day.

1942. I am taking the argument as applied to the question of depriving the publican of the right of trading upon 52 days in the year. I want to know whether, in your opinion, the right which the publican has to carry on the trade on the 52 Sundays is the same right as that which entitles other tradesmen to work on the other 300 days of the year?—If the law permits it, it is.

1943. Is not the Sunday trading a perfectly exceptional thing; and are not those trades which are allowed to be carried on on the Sunday, such as the trade in milk and other refreshments, as allowed, not for the good of the traders but for the good of the public?—Yes, I admit that; but those exceptions, even if prohibited, would not have a tendency to do so much harm to the public as the closing of public-houses would.

1944. At a meeting, and no doubt a very respectable and influential meeting, in your city, a resolution was come to that you deemed it "an essential duty that not only the trade but the public should be invited to sign petitions against this Bill"; may I ask whether you carried out that which you considered a duty?—We did.

1945. Will you kindly inform the Committee what was the result?—I do not know; as far as the petition went it came to the House of Commons.

1946. Was that a petition from the public of Cork, and not the publicans?—It was signed by all classes of people.

1947. Can you tell us what was the number of signatures to that petition?—I cannot say.

1948. In fact, you cannot tell me what was the result of this effort to get petitions signed?—Although the time was very limited the effort was very successful; the petitions were signed very largely, but I may say that a great portion of the signatures were not sent in time to post with the petition; a number remained behind.

1949. But still it appeared that the signatures to that petition amounted to nearly 700?—I should say it was nearer 1,000.

1950. You have stated that there are in Cork about 500 owners of houses for the sale of drinks; I presume they generally signed this petition?—I cannot tell you that, really; but I presume every every man in the trade to whom it was presented signed it.

G. Barry.

1951. That would leave you 500 signatures for the whole of the non-trading interested portion of the public?—We had not time sufficient to carry the petition about, so as to have it signed by the public. We wished to have it posted by a certain time.

1952. Have you taken any steps since to ascertain the opinion of the general public of Cork upon the subject?—No, I have not taken any public steps of any kind.

1953. And I may say that no petitions have since been presented?—No, but it is in contemplation to hold another public meeting immediately.

1954. But so far we have not had any petitions from the general public except this one?—Very few take any notice of it except those that are in the trade; that is one of the reasons.

1955. At that meeting there was published a letter from your excellent representative, Mr. Maguire, in which he mentioned that he “presented a petition on the part of more than 700 citizens, many of them of the highest respectability, in favour of the general principle of the Bill”; I suppose that is accurate?—As far as signatures go it is very inaccurate; you would not conceive that a petition from a few infants in a ragged school would be very influential.

1956. What part do you dispute; that there were 700 signatures?—I do not know how many there were; but this I know, that they have been obtained in a very curious way.

1957. Will you tell us anything that you know of your own knowledge?—I do not know that of my own knowledge, but from general observation.

1958. Will you mention generally, from what you do know, how this petition was signed?—I do not know who were the responsible parties, but I know that in that year there was a party running about Cork to obtain signatures to a petition, which ostensibly put forward the idea that all public-houses should be closed on Sundays, or assertions tending to that effect, by which promises they gained many signatures from very respectable parties; but to counteract the influence attached to that, they had gone into the infant schools and got the tutoresses and masters, and the infants in those schools, to sign their names for Sunday closing.

1959. Would you inform the Committee whether it is of your own knowledge that those signatures of infants were signed to the petition or not; and, if not, what is your authority for saying so?—I speak from general conversations, general observations, and general remarks upon it.

1960. But you have no precise authority to give for the fact which you allege?—I will not allege it of my own knowledge exactly.

1961. But you did mention of your own knowledge that signatures were obtained on the unfair pretext that it was in favour of this Bill, while it was in favour of totally closing, and that many respectable persons signed it because it was in favour of total closing?—I have no personal knowledge of the circumstances, but I speak from what has oozed out; if I were to give my opinion I would say that I believed it to be true.

1962. Then those respectable people were in favour of going beyond this Bill; they were in favour of total closing?—That is what was said.

1963. Then the Committee may put one petition against the other; one signed by many influential people for the Bill, and one signed by 700 against the Bill?—The trade is represented by several thousands of pounds which are invested; we had not time to get the petition signed more numerously. The next will be large enough, you may depend.

1964. Will you tell the Committee what are the usual hours during which the assistants in these houses are usually employed on week days, what hour do they generally open in the morning?—I think the usual hour is about seven, or perhaps some before; say half-past six.

1965. And they close at eleven at night?—Yes, they close at eleven at night.

1966. They are not allowed to be kept open after eleven at all?—No, they are sure to be shut then.

1967. Then the assistants are employed from half-past six in the morning until eleven in the evening?—Not without intermission. I have known some in the trade that allow the young men to go out and take a run in the course of the day.

1968. And on Sundays they open at two o'clock, do they not?—Yes.

1969. The assistants would require to be there a little before two?—The moment the door is opened.

1970. And remain until 11 at night?—And remain until 11 at night, as at present.

1971. Have you ever heard any of the assistants in Cork say, as their association in Dublin said, that they considered these very hard hours of work?—No, I have not heard any of them make those remarks; but I presume they would be inclined to say so, if they were asked.

1972. Mr. Maguire also says, “I can personally state that many members of the trade in Cork have expressed themselves in favour of an earlier hour for closing, and have complained of the terrible slavery to themselves and those employed by them of the present system which, in too many instances, precludes the possibility of that necessary recreation which all persons in business require”; I presume you would not be prepared to dispute that there are many members of the trade who have so expressed themselves?—They may have so expressed themselves; but a person will often use the word many for a few. I do not know that there are many, but there are some.

1973. Then am I to take it that you yourself do not consider the amount of labour excessive; you do not consider that it precludes the possibility of that necessary recreation which all persons in business require?—In Cork it so happens that the assistants are not so numerous as they are in other places. A great proportion of the business in Cork is done by the owners, their wives and daughters, and that class who are connected with them; but the assistants, I would say, in Cork are not many; I would say half the number in the trade.

1974. Do you not think that the hours you have mentioned on working days and on Sundays also, are very hard hours of work for them and the members of their families, remembering that it is for seven days instead of six?—I would say that if they had the possibility of obtaining a living without labouring so much, it is very likely they would give it up; but being obliged to work for their living they must do it, and they do it with a kind of content. I know that the physical infirmities arising from too much labour not to be disputed; but yet they are so devoted to the pursuit of the trade from year to year, that they do not feel it so much as persons outside the trade might believe.

1975. Mr. O'Neill.] You stated, in reply to Mr. Murphy, that one of your objections to this Bill was that it would deprive the inhabitants of work, who went out to take long walks into the country, of the possibility of getting anything to drink; but do you not think that the fact that this Bill proposes to leave public-houses open during a certain number of hours on a Sunday will obviate that inconvenience?—I do not know what it would, and my reason is this: if you fix legally an hour for closing, the excursionists, or the travellers among the working classes that have neither watches nor clocks, would miss the time, and probably would not get their refreshment; and if they do succeed in catching the legal hour, they must stay, whether it is raining or hailing, outside the door.

1976. In lessening the number of illicit houses you mentioned that your Society had done, have you been assisted by the people generally, and by the clergy of the respective religious denominations?—We have received the subscriptions, I may say, of all classes. We have received the subscription of the Catholic Bishop and of the Protestant Bishop, and the aid and encouragement and supervision of the curates to put an end to it.

1977. Do you think that, considering, as you said, that the principal amount of drinking on Saturday night occurs between nine and eleven, if a provision were passed making it necessary to shut public houses at nine in the evening, the employers of labour would not, considering the general good to the people, pay their wages earlier than they do at present?—If it could be done, it would be done even now; but it would not prevent the evil.

1978. But to a certain extent it would, would it not?—It may; but, unfortunately, Irishmen are so fond of their drink, that there would be a compound for them at a convenient place.

1979. Mr. Dawson.] There appears to me to be some slight discrepancy in your evidence. At the commencement you said that there was six times as much drinking on a Sunday as there was on any other day of the week; that is, the public-houses do more business on the Sunday than they do on all the other six days in the week?—In the rural districts.

1980. And then at another part of your evidence you said there was more drunkenness on Saturday than on Sunday; so that if there was more drinking on Sunday than on all the other days of the week, how do you account for the fact that there is less drunkenness on the Sunday than on the Saturday?—What you have taken there, are the rural districts; it is principally in the rural districts.

1981. And that does not so much lead to drunkenness as drinking in the towns?—It does not.

1982. In fact, your opinion is that the law does not require any alteration at all; that it is quite sufficient now for the accommodation of the public, and in the interest of workpeople, and that there is no necessity for any change in the law; is that the purport of your evidence?—No, I would not exactly go so far as that; I would say that the licensing law, and the Publicans' Acts, require great amendment. I do not say so with reference to the limitation of time, but with reference to the general action and liberty which the magistrates and the recorder possess; I think there is great alteration desired in that respect.

1983. Could you sketch out at all the alterations that you think it would be desirable to effect?—No; it will be very difficult to analyse the question and to go into particulars now. You make comments every day when questions arise, but you cannot say all at once what you would suggest.

1984. Mr. Monsell.] You state there is at least as much drinking on Sundays, in the suburban districts, as in the other six days of the week; what I want to ascertain is this: is the drinking, on Sunday less within the city than it is on the other days of the week?—It is so, particularly during fine weather, when there is inducement for moving out of town.

1985. The principal argument, as I understand, that you have used against this Bill was, that you considered it would be impossible to prevent the creation of shebeen houses or, in some other way, the sale of spirits, which you said would probably be adulterated?—I said so.

1986. Is there the greatest possible temptation now, on account of the high rate of spirits, to set up shebeen-houses; are not the profits of shebeen-houses now enormous, in any part of the country where they are carried on?—Shebeen-houses profits are always enormous, because they sell at illegal hours, and those who look for it will pay any money for it; but they would not be buying an Act of Parliament spirit at all, but it would be a compound.

1987. At the present time there is the greatest possible inducement to persons to establish shebeen houses, is there not?—If this Bill be carried out there will be.

1988. But at present, I mean?—No; there is so much supervision, and the accommodation is so great, that I do not think they could do it.

1989. But the supervision would be just the same if this Bill was passed; my question is this: are not the pecuniary temptations, that is to say the temptations to profit, almost as great as they can be to induce people to establish shebeen-houses?—I thought I answered part of that before; certainly they are; but the facility of doing any good at it is not at present great. There is no facility in getting customers now, because the accommodation in the other places is sufficient for all purposes; if you limit the accommodation in other houses, then they would get a business.

1990. But supposing, in a country district, a man had been detected by the police in carrying on a shebeen-house, what would be the result?—In country districts it could not be carried out without the police discovering it; in cities they may discover it, but it would take a considerable time, probably.

1991. But what I want to know is this: is not there the strongest possible temptation now to establish shebeen-houses, but that the supervision that the police carry on is sufficient to prevent the shebeen-houses from being opened?—The temptation to establish shebeen-houses is not great; partly owing to the supervision of the police, and partly to the punishment attached. Besides that, a person now trying to establish a shebeen-house could do as well at anything else with the supervision that there is.

Mr.
G. Barry.
30 April
1868.

1992. That is to say he could not make a large profit?—He could not make a large profit.

1993. Even if he were uninterrupted?—I would not say that; if he was allowed to carry it on he would make something.

1994. Why would there not be the same provision for supervision on shebeen-houses, if the Bill were passed, as there is at present; the temptations are now great to establish shebeen-houses; but notwithstanding that the supervision is sufficient to prevent them being established, how would the supervision be diminished if the Bill were passed?—Take away the supervision, and pass the Bill, and then you will have plenty; but keep up the supervision, and even then you will have many.

1995. This Bill will not interfere with the supervision; therefore why would a supervision which is never effective not be sufficient under this Bill to prevent them from doing the same thing?—Because the supervision that is necessary just now is very limited; but pass this Bill and you will have shebeen houses in every corner throughout the country, and throughout the cities, and in every place where parties are to be found, who would drink any kind of spirituous matter; then the supervision would have to be increased, I suppose, tenfold to watch every party in the business.

1996. But the supervision would be as great, at least after this Bill was passed, as it is now?—It could not extend itself to the whole.

1997. But would not there be as much supervision after the Bill was passed as there is now?—There would be a difficulty in preventing an illicit trade.

1998. Would the operation of this Bill, if it were passed into law in any way, diminish the power of supervision?—This law would not diminish the power of supervision, but it would increase the necessity for supervision to such an extent that it could not be accomplished.

1999. That is to say, it would increase the temptation to open shebeen houses?—It would.

2000. But in answer to a former question, you said that the temptation to open shebeen houses was as strong as ever, and if, of course, anybody could open a shebeen house, he would make an enormous profit?—I stated that conditionally; if you pass this Act.

2001. At present is it not perfectly certain that in every part of Ireland any man who could manage to carry on a shebeen house, and carry it on uninterruptedly, would make enormous profits?—If he was allowed to do so; he would save the license in the first place.

2002. Mr. Pim.] You gave it as your opinion that earlier closing on Sundays would be desirable; you spoke of nine o'clock, I think?—Yes; I think the trade in cities would not care very much about it; there would be some objection, but the respectable members of the trade would have no great objection if they were obliged to close.

2003. It would be a great benefit to persons employed in the trade, that is to say, to their wives and daughters, to have an earlier closing; to have two hours more to themselves on the Sunday?—I think so.

2004. I think you rather objected to an earlier closing on Saturday, and your reason was, that it would give rise to the establishment of shebeen houses?—Yes.

2005. I think you stated that at the time that your association was formed, there were a great many shebeen houses in Cork?—There were.

2006. And that your exertions, aided by the ministers of religion, have put them down?—Yes.

2007. Supposing that by law houses were closed at nine on Saturday, you would have the same assistance from the police and from the ministers of religion in your exertions to prevent shebeen houses from being opened as you have had already; do you not think in such a case, that the exertions of your association would be equally effectual to prevent the opening of new shebeen houses, as they have already been to put down those that did exist?—Unfortunately, the parties who desire to become shebeen owners are generally persons who, in point of character, have nothing to lose; they do not announce it to the public; they do it in privacy, and in very obscure places, in such a way that the authorities would not, for a long time be able to get at them; in some cases they would not be worth fining, as they would not be able to pay the fine; therefore they are desperate characters who would go into business, knowing that they could make something of it, and you would find that those characters would be at it again. Nothing could touch them; supervision will not touch them, unless it is very strict. I think the last we caught, was caught through the instrumentality of the person who received the drink, and he was caught at a very late hour; it is so difficult even to watch them; the police could not find them out.

2008. But those who are likely to set them up, are not any worse characters than those that have already been put down?—One party was convicted twice, and he set up again.

2009. You are allowed to keep your houses open on Sundays when most other shops are closed?—We are.

2010. Do you consider that to be for your own benefit or for the benefit of the public?—I think both; to compare these with other shops who pay no licenses, is a thing which in itself indicates the idea that they have not the same right.

2011. You think that the fact of paying a license gives you a claim to be open on Sunday?—It gives a portion of the claim.

2012. Major Gavin.] I see that in your rules you say this, "He shall keep a diary, in which he will record the names of those who refuse to obey the 'Publicans' Acts' by keeping illegal and disorderly establishments; he shall on seeing any public-house, or place where beer and spirits are sold, open at illegal hours immediately report same to the police, and make entries in his diary of the particulars of the reports sent by him, from time to time, to the constabulary"; now, may I ask, if this Bill was passed, should you not still consider it your duty to do this?—At the time that that rule was drawn up, and at the time we commenced moral operations in Cork, as a trade, the trade was so very low that the rule was quite essential; but I believe that for the last five or six years that rule has been practically null and void; it is unnecessary to do all that is there stated now, because the trade has improved.

2013. But you said that if this Bill was passed, it would cause the opening of shebeen houses which you had succeeded in putting down?—It would.

2014. Would

Mr.
G. Barry.
30 April
1868.

2014. Would it not still be your duty to put those places down?—We should require so many agents in the country round.

2015. But I mean in the city; you have done it before, and I cannot see why you should not do it again?—It was very partial before, and its existence was nothing to what it would be now.

2016. But after all, this case would only apply to Sundays; only one day in the week?—Only one day in the week.

2017. But do you not think that the great body of your people who are, I suppose, fond of law and order, would still think it their duty to report to the police if any improper houses were opened?—If such things were established, or about to be established, they would take every care to prevent it.

2018. And no doubt in the event of this Bill passing, your exertions would be just as great to prevent these irregularities as they have been?—The Bill would have a partial operation; it would make others desperate; it is not only shebeen houses that would be established, but others in the trade finding that their neighbours were allowed to be open who have little refreshments about them in the shape of cakes and food, would think it a tremendous hardship; they say, where you go on Sunday to get a dram or a drink you will go on Monday, you will not come to me; I am obliged to be shut while my neighbour is open.

2019. Is there such a thing as spirits sold in milk shops in Cork?—I do not know that there is; I never heard.

2020. Have you not known that in the suburbs that is the case sometimes?—I never knew it; I do not believe it is.

2021. In the vicinity of Cork I suppose there is a good deal of ball-playing on Sundays, I suppose?—Not now; there was not very long ago.

2022. Wherever there is a ball-court I suppose there is a spirit shop?—Yes, there is, mostly; but they are generally in large towns and cities, not in the suburbs; I do not know of any.

2023. Mr. Murphy.] You were asked about a certain petition; was there any public meeting in Cork held last year for the support of a Bill similar to this?—No, not in support of the Bill.

2024. Are you aware who the parties were who went about procuring signatures in favour of this Bill?—No, personally I have no knowledge of them; but I know that in the "Southern Reporter" office, where they went to obtain the signature of the proprietor, he said, "We will not sign upon such a thing as that."

2025. Are you aware whether the parties were inhabitants of Cork or not?—No; I think they were inhabitants of some other quarter.

2026. Did you hear that they came on their own account, or that they were acting as agents for some other party?—Yes, I heard that.

2027. That they were sent in by some external party to procure signatures to the petitions, and that it was not a voluntary emanation from the inhabitants themselves at any public meeting assembled?—Exactly.

2028. Mr. Monsell asked you very closely about a hypothetical case, with reference to the supervision of the police. Supposing the present Bill were to pass into law as it is now would the effect of the present supervision be very much the same as it is now?—No, if you pass the Bill into law, it would be very difficult to supervise effectually.

2029. Assuming the effect to be just as great, would or would not the number to be supervised be increased?—Yes, it would be increased.

2030. So that, although the number of supervisors would be the same, the number to be supervised would be so much greater that it would be impossible to supervise them?—It would be impossible.

2031. It is your opinion that if a law was passed restricting the hour of closing, that should apply to all parties who sell beer and spirits?—It should be universal.

2032. It should not extend to licensed victuallers only?—Certainly not.

2033. Would you extend that to hotels and eating-houses?—Hotels have a right to exist, but there should be no public bar open after the hour designated.

2034. You would apply the same observation with reference to cigar divans?—Yes.

2035. Earl of Mayo.] On Sunday evenings, what hour do you find the greatest consumption of spirits takes place?—I could not exactly say, but I know that immediately after opening at two o'clock, a dram is taken as a sort of "raw chaw," as they call it, but, I believe, so far as I have known for years, it has not been very great; there was a Sunday morning trade, but that is shut up altogether.

2036. You think that there is no drinking before two o'clock?—Not before two o'clock, and even those who take it then take it for a stimulant previous to a walk into the country.

2037. Those people dine generally before two o'clock, I suppose?—No, they do not, I think.

2038. With regard to this, which is your busiest hour; do you consider that that is generally before or after the usual hour of dinner of the working classes?—The working classes associate on Sundays together and treat each other, but as for the drinking in Cork on Sundays, there is no such thing; it is all done in the suburbs, or very much the greater part of it.

2039. How does the consumption between nine and eleven at night bear comparison with the consumption between two and four in the day; is there more drinking between two and four than between nine and eleven?—I cannot say as to that, but I know that when the law permitted them only to be open until nine they were not dissatisfied with it, but the extra two hours' indulgence on the Sunday was the thing conceded to them.

2040. The old law was, that they should be closed at nine?—Yes.

2041. Do you think that that state of the law gave much dissatisfaction?—I do not know that it gave much dissatisfaction to those in the trade generally, taking them as a whole.

2042. To the people; I am not talking of the trade?—I have no reason to think that it did.

2043. You cannot tell what hour of the day on Sunday the most drinking goes on?—No; I think it would be very hard for me to say, not having been in the trade for some years; but I should think they run up to the hour of closing, as they do on week-days, with the exception of the drinking being less in consequence of excursionists and travellers, and walkers out of town.

2044. Their habit, I suppose, is to take a glass before they start, and to take another when they have done their walk?—I do not know that they do that.

Mr. WILLIAM HEALY, called in; and Examined.

Mr.
W. Healy.
30 April
1868.

2045. Chairman.] WHAT are you?—A Grocer, Spirit Dealer, and a Licensed Vintner.

2046. In the city of Cork?—Yes.

2047. Mr. Murphy.] Have you read this Bill, or do you know what the object of it is?—I do; I understand the object of it.

2048. What is your opinion as to what the effect of the Bill would be (speaking of it as a Sunday Bill altogether) upon the licensed publicans in the country districts about Cork?—My opinion is that it would be a very great injustice to those people, that being the only day, properly speaking, for their trade; of course, they consume larger quantities; between two and three casks of porter, perhaps, on the Sunday, which enables them to hold on during the week, and they supplement that by some other work.

2049. Is it your opinion that the sales on Sunday bear a very large proportion of their weekly trade?—A very large proportion.

2050. In fact, they sell four or five times as much on the Sunday as they do in the entire of any day during the week?—Yes, for the six days.

2051. In fact, you may say that their earnings are dependent almost entirely upon the Sunday trade?—Almost entirely.

2052. Have you given your attention, with reference to the comparative quantity of drinking in the city of Cork proper, on the Sunday, as compared with other days?—The drinking on Sunday in the city of Cork is very much smaller; there is a quantity consumed up to a certain hour; the people, as has been already said, go to various country towns for excursions, and that almost is the rule for five months in the year. Cork, during those five months, is almost deserted on Sundays. Of course, in the country districts, some of them take with them their refreshment, but the very great majority of excursionists cannot afford to do so, and as a matter of course they drop into the public-houses, and take their bread and cheese and beer; they are very well conducted, as I have experienced.

2053. You have had experience yourself of that fact?—Yes.

2054. Looking at the provisions of this proposed Bill are you of opinion that it would be likely to effect the object proposed by the promoters of it, namely, to restrain excessive drinking on Sundays?—My impression is that it would have quite the opposite effect.

2055. Why do you say that; what is your reason for thinking so?—Of course illicit trading would, as a matter of course start up, and those refreshment houses, as proposed by the Bill, I would say would almost entirely, by-and-by, become illicit or shebeen-houses; they would, practically, be shebeen-houses and perhaps worse.

2056. I presume it is scarcely necessary to ask you whether it would not be your opinion that there should be either the total closing on Sundays, of every description of house, where liquor was to be sold, or the opening of them for certain continuous hours under supervision?—Just so.

2057. And you do not conceive the measure proposed by this Bill to allow spirits to be bought, but not to be consumed on the premises, could be carried into effect?—It would be almost impossible to carry it into effect.

2058. Have you formed any opinion with reference to the desirability of restricting the hour of closing on Sunday evening?—I think the hour ought not to be later than the former hour.

2059. Do you think that nine, on Sunday evening, would be the proper hour to close?—It would be quite late enough.

2060. A considerable amount of evidence has been taken before the Committee, with reference to the desirability of closing at an earlier hour on Saturday nights than at present, as by law allowed; have you given that subject your attention?—Yes; my impression is that it would be a very great hardship on the trade.

2061. Do you mean that it would be a hardship to those engaged in the spirit trade?—Exactly.

2062. Do you think it would be a hardship, in many cases, upon mechanics and labourers?—I do.

2063. Why so?—Saturday is very well known as being the principal day for every description of business, and it has been already stated that the labourers and mechanics are in very many cases not paid till 10, or even 11, on Saturdays; that I am aware of from my own knowledge, and as a matter of course the first thing those people, the labourers and mechanics do is, if they want clothing or shoes, and so on, to buy it; that is the only day on which they can get them, and they go to those shops, and that takes them an hour or two, and then they go to other houses, grocers, and so on, and then perhaps to the public-houses, and get from them what they want.

2064. You are a grocer, I believe, as well as a licensed vintner?—I am.

2065. Of course the two establishments are quite separate?—Yes, they are quite separate, although they adjoin one another.

2066. In your case, suppose that you were obliged to close your spirit shop at, say, seven on Saturday evening, as was suggested by a witness here; what effect would that have upon you?—This effect, that my customers and such parties as I have mentioned, finding my shop closed, would very easily find their way to those shops which are now springing up, called spirit grocers; those people would buy it there, although they would not be allowed to consume it. I know places where there is more spirit consumed than in the largest public-houses.

2067. Are there a good many in the city of Cork?—There are a good many, and there has been an addition within the last six months.

2068. The effect of the establishment of those spirit grocers is this, that spirits are absolutely consumed on those premises, although the law says they shall not be so consumed?—Yes.

2069. And the tendency of such a Bill as this would be to create those spirit grocers' shops, and in that way, instead of remedying the evil to increase it?—Yes, in my case I have observed it.

2070. Earl of Mayo.] Have you a wholesale license too?—No; those people would go to another shop if they found my shop closed, and under the ostensible purpose of buying groceries they will get whisky, and they will go there for that purpose, and traders such as those who close at seven o'clock or eight o'clock would lose their custom custom up to 10 or 11; and in all probability they would lose their grocery custom too.

2071. Are you aware of the fact that it is the habit of mechanics and working people, so late as 10 or 11 o'clock, to buy groceries?—Yes, it is the regular custom on Saturday nights. We have to keep our doors open after 11 o'clock, and I ask them sometimes why they come so late; and they say it is only just now we have been able to get our wages and settle our little affairs. I frequently keep open after 11 o'clock to sell to them.

2072. And what do you sell them?—Groceries.

2073. Mr. Murphy.] Are you aware that it is not the custom in Cork, amongst a comparatively large class of labourers and mechanics, to leave off work till eight or nine o'clock in the evening?—No.

2074. They are not restricted till six or seven o'clock, but work till eight or nine o'clock, and are not paid their wages till after that?—Very often.

2075. And for those reasons it is your opinion that restricting the hours on Saturday night to nine o'clock, as was the old custom on the Sunday, would be injurious and would do no good, and would not prevent drinking?—It would not prevent drinking, and it would be injurious to the trade.

2076. Do you think that the hour on Saturday evening could be shortened at all, or that it might be without any inconvenience?—My own impression is that the hour should not be later or earlier than 10, with this understanding, that all licensed houses should be closed at the same time; licensed grocers and all.

2077. Earl of Mayo.] Wholesale houses and all?—Yes, wholesale and all; in point of fact, the wholesale dealers are now closed at 10.

2078. Mr. Murphy.] Are any of these spirit grocers' shops open on Sunday, in Cork?—There are a few in the back streets.

2079. But they can be open if they choose?—They can be open if they choose; and of course they can do a little in the illicit trade too, but it is very small.

2080. Earl of Mayo.] What do you mean by an illicit trade?—The early morning drinking, before two o'clock on Sunday morning; but the law being to keep open till 11 they can do nothing in that way.

2081. Do you think that any illicit trade which goes on before the proper hour is carried on more in connection with the wholesale houses than with the publicans?—No; there are very few of those that I am speaking of. The evasion of the law on Sunday mornings is principally confined to the lower class of public-houses; there is a very great reformation in that, as Mr. Barry has observed; but there is much to be done, and any amount of supervision can hardly command it.

2082. Mr. Murphy.] The spirit grocers can keep open on Sundays, I believe?—They can.

2083. Presuming a law was passed, as proposed, that spirits should be allowed to be bought, but not consumed on the premises of licensed vintners, do you think the tendency under that state of facts would be, that spirits would be bought, sold, and consumed at the spirit grocers, although prohibited?—Yes, there is already a very large illicit traffic by those men, and this Bill would be a very strong incentive to go further.

2084. The general conviction on your mind is this: that in order to make any law of this kind operative, it should extend to all parties in the trade; and that in the next place the hours of remaining open should be continuous, and not intermittent?—Yes, and not to close earlier than 10 on Saturday night, and not later than nine o'clock on Sunday night, and the earlier, if possible, the better. As regards the Sunday closing, it is quite a matter of indifference to me; I open only for a few hours on the Sunday and close at eight, and I am preparing to close altogether.

2085. Earl of Mayo.] What is your usual time of closing?—Eight o'clock. I have never taken advantage of the permission to keep open later.

2086. Are there many men in Cork, in your trade, who adopt that plan of yours?—No, very few. There are a few who do not open at all; but those who do remain open till 10 or 11 o'clock.

2087. Do you find a great loss in your trade from closing at eight o'clock?—No, for this reason, that the little I do is principally confined to the housekeeping class; that is not so fluctuating as the trade with the other classes, and the people who go to the country generally leave the country by trains about eight o'clock, and they drop into Cork then; and by closing the public-houses then the temptation would be removed.

2088. Do you think that the general habits of all respectable people who go out of Cork on Sundays is to turn their faces homewards between seven and eight o'clock?—Yes.

2089. And they do not practically require refreshment after that?—They do not practically require refreshment after that.

2090. And the persons who would require refreshment after that would be more tipplers or drunkards than anything else?—Yes.

2091. Chairman.] I suppose there would be no difficulty in making the law include everybody, if the law was that every house should be shut?—Yes, hotels and clubs, and all.

2092. Except, of course, for travellers?—Yes, as regards the hotels.

2093. I suppose you know there would be a difficulty in regard to clubs, as being places of consumption but not sale?—That might be overcome.

2094. On Sundays you think establishments for the sale of refreshments might always be closed at nine?—That would be quite late enough.

2095. Your great reason for leaving them open on Sundays is for the sake of excursionists, which applies very strongly to Cork?—Yes.

2096. One very competent witness, Mr. Hamilton, your stipendiary magistrate, suggested that they might be closed earlier in winter than in summer, because the excursionist traffic does not then exist: would you agree with that?—It would not make a great difference.

2097. His proposal was that they should be closed on Sunday at eight in summer and at six in winter; you, perhaps, would not wish to see them closed so early as that?—My individual opinion, perhaps, might be so.

2098. But you certainly think there might be a distinction made between winter and summer?—Perhaps you had better strike an average, and strike off another hour, and say eight o'clock all round.

2099. I suppose you are aware that the greatest amount of drunkenness on every day in the week does arise from late drinking?—From late drinking.

N 2

2100. Then

Mr.
W. Healy.
30 April
1868.

Mr.
W. Healy.
1868.

2100. Then a man who goes to the public house with the intention of taking a little in moderation has the opportunity of sitting till 11 o'clock, and so of getting drunk?—Yes, perhaps as a rule that is so.

2101. Do you agree with that statement?—Generally I think that is so, although it is not the case always; people, I know, get drunk very much earlier than 11 o'clock.

2102. What hour on Sunday do you think there is the most drinking at your house?—My house shuts at eight o'clock, but the general drinking time is from eight or nine to eleven; that is the time when people drop in from the various country districts; up to eight o'clock there is very little drink of any kind consumed in Cork; Cork is perfectly quiet, and as well-ordered a city as any in Ireland, and then when the excursionists return from the country districts the consumption begins; I know some few houses where there are taprooms, and I have been talking to one of the owners, and he is very anxious that they should be closed at nine; and he said, "I do nothing but from eight to eleven, and I am tired of it."

2103. Earl of Mayo.] Would not the excursionists feel it a great hardship if they came in and could not get anything in the shape of refreshment?—No, I do not think they would think so; they would have had so many good things before they came to Cork that they would not think it so.

2104. Chairman.] I suppose you are aware that the proportion of cases of drunkenness taken before the magistrates is much larger of people taken up on Saturday evening than at any other time?—As a matter of course; but I believe that the statistics prove that drunkenness on Saturday nights is considerably less than it was at any former period.

2105. Are you aware of the system as stated by the stipendiary magistrates which was adopted in Cork in March 1867 of closing the public houses for a month at six in the evening on Sundays, the result of which was, that whereas the average of the number of cases of intoxication brought before the magistrates on Monday had previously amounted to 40, they amounted only to 14 on one occasion, and 16 on the other?—I think it was the feeling of coercion that was abroad which prevented the people from getting drunk; in point of fact, people were not able to get to the public-houses; they were afraid, except that they were shut; I think that was an exceptional case, and a case of that kind I do not think applies.

2106. The resident magistrate and the police have given a very strong opinion with reference to closing earlier on Saturday nights; stating that by far the greatest number of cases of drunkenness in the whole week occur in the two last hours, and they have suggested nine o'clock; have you any strong reason for saying that it is necessary to keep them open till ten?—The reasons I have stated, I think are sufficiently strong, that it would be a great oppression if a man could not remain at his public-house until that hour, and the trade would be inconvenienced. There is a small tradesman in my neighbourhood, a tailor, employing about 10 men, and almost every Saturday night I am obliged to lend him a few pounds to pay those men. I know very large builders whose men are not paid until about the same time, and then, perhaps, only about half their wages.

2107. You would not extend that to any large proportion of the employers of labour in Cork?—Not to the great mass of them.

2108. The great mass of the employers pay before that time, do they not?—A great number of them are tailors and builders and carpenters, and I am aware that those men often do not get more than half their wages on the Saturday night.

2109. And the great injury to those people would be, that whilst they might have time to go and buy clothes and provisions, by closing the public-houses, they would just lose the opportunity of going to get a glass before going home?—Yes, and would require that just as much as a garment very often.

2110. Mr. O'Neill.] You stated in the beginning of your evidence, that the closing on Sunday night would increase illicit drinking very much?—That is my opinion.

2111. And you stated just now, that when during last year the public-houses were closed at six on Sunday evening, so much influence was brought to bear upon the people that they could not in any way get drunk at all; do you not think that if the closing was still earlier on Sunday, and that influence could be brought to bear, it would operate to prevent illicit houses being opened on Sunday?—No, I think, moreover, that that case is a very exceptional one; the people during five months of the year are very largely out, and do not return until eight or nine o'clock.

2112. Mr. Pim.] You stated that you did not consider that the operation of that Act would lessen drunkenness, but I think you did state that the closing of the houses, say at eight or nine, would have a tendency to prevent drunkenness?—Yes.

2113. There is another object in the Bill, besides the prevention of drunkenness; that is, with respect to the persons engaged in the trade, both the owners of the houses and also the persons in their employment, either their paid assistants or their wives and daughters?—Yes.

2114. Part of that object is to secure to them a larger portion of Sunday as a day of rest; are you not of opinion that that is a very desirable thing?—Yes, very desirable; but as far as the assistants are concerned, there is a much larger amount of relief given them than people imagine; almost every publican would allow his assistants to go out an hour or two in the day.

2115. Every day, or on Sunday, do you mean?—Every day; I allow my assistants to go out for an hour or two every day when they wish to go.

2116. You object to the houses being closed earlier than 10 o'clock on Saturday night, do you not?—Yes, I object to the houses being closed earlier than 10 o'clock on Saturday night; and only then with the understanding that all licensed houses be closed.

2117. And how would that be with regard to grocers; grocers would not be closed?—It applies in this way: I am a grocer, and my shops adjoin, but they are distinct, and if I was compelled to close at seven or eight upon Saturday night, my class of customers that I have mentioned, tradespeople, and that rather large class who cannot get their wages until late, would go immediately to those persons called spirit grocers, a class of persons springing up in Cork, who hold a spirit license connected with their grocery, and on the same premises. They, although they are bound not to sell, do sell, and are selling very freely in Cork, for consumption on the premises, and the result would be that traders such as I would lose much of our whisky traffic, and also part of our grocery custom.

2118. Would it be possible to prevent the spirit grocers from selling liquor after the prescribed hour for the closing of public-houses?—If you could prevent them there would be nothing to complain of.

2119. But you remarked that in that case you could not object to closing at nine on Saturday? That is a matter of opinion; but the difficulty preventing those people selling for consumption on the premises is not easily imagined; the only plan would be to license them differently: allow them to sell to be drunk off the premises, and to supervise the place.

2120. Suppose every spirit grocer was obliged to close his establishment at the same hour that the public-houses were closed, would that be an advantage?—Yes; but it would be a hardship upon the grocers if you compel all spirit grocers to close at eight.

2121. But all grocers have not a spirit grocers' license?—Very many of them have; that is the reason why I contend that it would be a hardship upon the grocers; that the people could not get in their groceries. Ten o'clock would come pretty near the convenience of a great number of them, yet it would be a hardship still.

2122. Earl of Mayo.] Is the number of houses in Cork, that hold this grocers' or wholesale license, increasing?—Largely increasing.

2123. Is that in consequence of the increasing habits of the people as regards buying spirits, and taking them home to drink?—No, I think not. I do pretty largely in the housekeeping, and that way, with spirits, and it is just pretty much the same as it has been.

2124. But still there is more spirit sold in Cork to be consumed off the premises than there used to be, is there not?—I should say so. I should account for that by saying that there is a large increase in the consumption of porter and ales.

2125. Would that be sold very much by these wholesale houses?—I mean by public-houses; the consumption of ales and porter has increased in public-houses.

2126. Has the consumption of spirits proportionately decreased?—No, I should say not; in any case it has not.

2127. But people are consuming more both of porter and spirits than they used to do?—Yes, I think they are consuming more.

2128. From your knowledge and observation, do you think drunkenness has increased in consequence?—No, I should say the opposite. I think that drunkenness has decreased. My observations, from looking at the class of people who have been coming to my place for 10 years back, lead me to think that they are better conducted and less noisy, and that drunkenness is less amongst them.

2129. You consider that moderate indulgence in drink is increasing, and that drunkenness is not increasing?—Drunkenness is decreasing.

2130. Is there much irregularity amongst the wholesale houses?—No, there has been a great reformation in the style of the houses for the last 10 years. I was, I may mention, originally in the society that you have been talking about, and the rules were written by me; they were very much abused at the time indeed. Even long before I had any intention of going into the trade I addressed a few letters to the trade, calling attention to the scenes of drunkenness and rascality that existed at that time, and that I had observed from time to time. That was the reason why I asked the members of the trade to get some society together to make the trade respectable, and to get some reformation carried out.

2131. And that has been very successful, has it not?—It has been very successful.

2132. Do those wholesale houses open on Sundays?—No.

2133. By wholesale houses I mean the spirit grocers?—Some few small houses do.

2134. It is exceptional?—Quite exceptional.

2135. Do you think if the hour for the sale of spirits by publicans in Cork was restricted on Sunday, it would be a great temptation to those spirit grocers to try and open their houses and push their trade?—I think it would.

2136. Do you think that would produce an evil effect?—It would produce a very unfair effect.

2137. But is not that description of drinking from the wholesale house, from the fact of its not being under the same supervision as the drinking in public-houses, open to very great objection?—It is.

2138. And that it would be contrary to good order if there was a great increase in the consumption of spirits in those wholesale houses?—It would; and those houses that you allude to in that Bill, refreshment houses, I think I observed, would be all turned into drinking houses. At the corner by my place in Cork there was a narrow place, and there were a few houses that had been doing something, I understand, quietly, and those people of course could set up a refreshment license if required, and of course they would get some bread and butter or biscuits, and call those refreshments; they would be the very lowest shebeen-houses.

2139. Then it would be a very great evil, looking to the good conduct and morals of the town, if that class of small eating-house became turned into any place for drinking?—Of course; no one would imagine the scenes of drinking that are carried on; there is no supervision in those houses; the authorities have not power to enter them, and it is very easy to understand the scenes that are carried on from seven or eight in the evening to six in the morning.

2140. Are you, therefore, of opinion that it is absolutely necessary, that wherever spirits are largely consumed there should be a very strict and rigid police supervision?—Very rigid police supervision.

2141. Mr. Murphy.] And in continuation of Lord Mayo's question, that the time for having public-houses open should be continuous, and not intermittent?—Not intermittent.

2142. You stated that one of your reasons for naming 10 o'clock on Saturday night as the earliest hour at which licensed vintners' houses should be closed was, that it would bring about a kind of average in time, a kind of average custom, which would induce people to come and do all their purchases before then?—Yes.

2143. You also stated that at that hour every house, no matter of what description, that sold liquors should also close?—Yes.

2144. Have you considered the possible convenience and the more than possible inconvenience of closing earlier than 10 with regard to

Mr.
W. Healy.

that class of people who do not go to public-houses, but to refreshment rooms and cigar divans, and take their ale or their brandy-and-water on their way home, clerks and others; if the hour were restricted, for instance, to nine on Saturday instead of 10, is it your opinion that that would cause a great outcry?—Yes; but I would not take into account that class of people at all; I take the general public, and particularly the tradespeople and labourers; people outside of that class can afford to get it at home.

2145. And do you think, if the hour was limited or made earlier than 10, it would practically lead to the opening of shebeen-houses?—Yes, I do think so.

Mr. JOHN KEEGAN, called in; and Examined.

Mr.
J. Keegan.

2150. Mr. Murphy.] You are Secretary to the United Trades Association of Dublin, are you not?—Yes, I am.

2151. Will you explain to the Committee the nature of the organisation of that society?—The United Trades Association is composed of the various trades of the city; the building trade is not included. Except one or two, its executive is composed of representatives from the different trades; they are represented in proportion to the constituency, and the organisation itself is established upon ordinary trade union principles; the protection of the rights of labour, the prevention of strikes, and the settlement of differences, by amicable arrangement and deputations, and so forth, to employers, when those disputes arise, and for the purpose also of promoting Irish manufactures, where we can give it as good and as cheap as it can be got elsewhere; these are the principal objects of the organisation.

2153. What particular reasons do they assign for that objection?—In the first place the tradesmen feel that the system of closing public-houses will not be productive of sobriety. They feel that it is only the sober man and the well-conducted man that will suffer any inconvenience, and that the drunkard will suffer no inconvenience whatever; that he will run all personal risk to obtain drink whenever he requires it; and in order to illustrate that, I may remark that the only disgraceful exhibition of drunkenness presented in the city of Dublin is from eight in the morning on Sunday morning until two in the day, the very hours that the public-houses are closed; and this disgraceful exhibition arises from those drunken men who go to look for drink in low localities, at spirit grocers, beer shops, and other places like that; and I may also mention that on the Sunday a very large portion, in fact, I may say all the respectable tradesmen of the city, after leaving their various devotional places, go to the country, to the Phoenix Park, and to the neighbourhood of Rathmines, Donnybrook, Dollymount, Sandymount, and those places, to walk before dinner; and I know, of my own knowledge, that there is a number of those who go into public-houses at, or even before two o'clock, not for the purpose of drinking 2146. Major Gavin.] You stated that if this Bill was passed it would be prejudicial and injurious to your trade in general?—Yes; the hour of closing, as proposed by this Bill, would be: my case has reference simply to Saturday night.

2147. You have 110,000 people in Cork, have you not?—Yes.

2148. You are not of opinion that it would be for the benefit of the greater number if this Bill was carried into execution as it is?—I think it would be grossly oppressive to a very large class, and of no material benefit to the general public.

2149. You do not think it would be a benefit?—I do not think that it would be a benefit.

or getting drunk, but for the purpose of getting legitimate refreshment; they go in to get, say, a bottle of porter, glass of beer, and I fear that if the principle of closing and restriction was carried out, as is proposed by the Bill, they would suffer a great amount of inconvenience. They say that the Sunday is the only day that the working man has upon which to enjoy himself legitimately; and they feel very sore that that source of enjoyment should be taken away.

2154. You have mentioned that the most objectionable and disgraceful instances of drunkenness have taken place at the very hour at which the present law prohibits the sale of drink on Sunday?—Yes.

2156. The police, I take it for granted, are quite aware of those localities?—Yes.

2157. And I presume the authorities do all they can to prevent the vending of liquors at those prohibited hours?—Yes; I am aware that they do, and I have seen the police placed on special duty over certain houses, and I have seen actually people coming out of those houses, and I have known, from the outside appearance, parties coming out now and then, that there was a business carried on inside, although the police might be within a few perches of the house. This class of people are up to every kind of trick to carry on their illicit trade.

2158. From the illustration you have given, I take it for granted that you must be of opinion that to men who will have drink, the closing of the public-houses has not the effect of preventing them from getting it?—I have said already that the closing of the public-houses on Sunday will be no inconvenience whatever to the drunkard.

2159. You are aware that the object of this Bill is to allow liquors to be sold at certain hours on Sunday, but not to be consumed on the premises where they are sold; do you think that that could be carried into practical operation?—I believe it would have a very demoralising effect, and I have heard the working men of Dublin speak very strongly upon that point. It is to be borne in mind that the tradespeople and labouring classes are very badly accommodated as regards dwellings; they are generally confined to one room, and we say that if drink was to be introduced into the family circle it would be productive of great social evils; and I have heard men who have worked in Glasgow, particularly that tramp, describe the awful scenes that take place in the city of Glasgow from that very circumstance, and I am fearful that such evils could be produced in Dublin by this system, promoting drinking at home; I have heard that rebuked more strongly than any other thing which is suggested by the Bill.

2160. And this very class of people, whom the Bill professes to serve, are themselves afraid of—Yes, they are afraid of it. I have heard of men taking exceptions to the system of class legislation proposed by the Bill. I have heard of men, and sober men, who go into a public-house, not for the purpose of drinking, but for the purpose of social intercourse, say that it is not fair to deprive them of that social intercourse while public-houses and club-houses are left open for the very same purpose for another class of society. My opinion is, that it is not right to create a strong feeling on the part of the intelligent portion of the working classes, that there is class legislation.

2161. From your knowledge of the working classes in Dublin, and from the peculiar knowledge you must have, I would ask you one general question, are the working classes, as a rule, drunkards?—I will speak from my own experience of many years. I could speak for more than that, but I will confine myself to that, from the time that I became an apprentice. At that time it was the common practice the Monday morning in the workshop when the men came in, if they did not keep out for the first quarter, to suggest the means of getting what is called a “cure”; now such practice exists, and as a general rule the working classes are particularly sober, and at that time the public-houses were closed at nine o'clock on the Sunday night. In order to follow up that opinion more strongly, this has just occurred to me. I recollect the charge of Mr. Justice O’Hagan to the grand jury of Dublin at the opening of the commission on the 20th of June last, and he said this in addressing the grand jury of the city: “I have to state to you that our duty will be of the slightest character and discharged in the briefest time, for I am extremely happy indeed to be able to congratulate you upon this fact, that, so far as ordinary crime is concerned, there is almost nothing on the face of the calendar. It is to me a perfect wonder that, sitting at a commission of oyer and terminer in a metropolis such as ours, so few cases are to come before you on this particular occasion; no case of violence, and I may say only a few cases of fraud. I doubt if there be a community in the world where such a gratifying spectacle could be exhibited as is exhibited here to-day. With reference to the county of Dublin, so far as ordinary crime is concerned, I do not observe any single case in which it becomes or behoves me to address you specially or more particularly. I think that is a very strong opinion in favour of the decrease of drunkenness, because, unfortunately, drunkenness in Ireland is almost the root of every crime that the people commit.”

2163. That being the case, and presuming that the provisions of this Bill being carried into law would produce great inconvenience, and that would not affect the majority of those who are not drunkards, what effect would be produced by 0.55.

passing it at all?—The effect of it would be the production of a greater amount of secret drinking than at present exists. On Saturday night, the moment the public-houses are closed, at half-past 11, there is a class of low spirit grocers who commence then to do business. I have seen them repeatedly standing at their doors about the neighbourhood of Stephen-street and Golden-lane, and low neighbourhoods like that; they do not do business until that hour, and I believe, if this restrictive Bill was carried out, they would reap a very rich harvest.

2164. I would only ask whether, if any restrictions with reference to hours were passed by any law, those restrictions should extend to all classes of houses?—Yes, to all classes of houses, and I may also say that I have heard it stated that it is the general opinion amongst the working classes, that the privileges given in this Bill in respect to eating-houses would be productive of fearful consequences; that drunkards would go in and buy a biscuit, and take a glass of whisky along with it.

2165. Chairman.] But, then, I suppose, you will agree that if spirit grocers and all traders in liquor were closed at the same hour, and in the same way as public-houses were closed, the evil you suggest, as arising from spirit grocers carrying on their trade, would be stopped?—You misunderstood my answer to Mr. Murphy’s question. This that I have been speaking of occurs at the time when the spirit grocers are apparently closed, but the people have been let in by a side door; it is the illicit business that I am particularly alluding to.

2166. You consider that the present closing, say, from Saturday night to two on Sunday, leads to a great deal of illicit drinking?—It does.

2167. Do you think it would be better to have the houses open during those hours?—No, I do not, and I will tell you why; I do not mean to say that this illicit drinking continues from 11 to two the next day, but it continues on Saturday night in certain low localities from half-past 11 to, perhaps, a little after 12; and then it commences on the Sunday morning from about eight, or the time that that class of people rise, and continues until two in the day.

2168. You stated that the working classes expressed great fear of the bad results that would arise from bringing the drink into their families, if they were not allowed to consume it at the public-houses; you said that the same effects would follow in Dublin as at Glasgow?—Yes.

2169. We are speaking of the large mass of the working class who are sober respectable men?—Yes.

2170. Why do you think that their having a glass of beer or a moderate drink would lead to this fearful demoralization that you anticipate?—I do not mean to say that it would lead to that amongst the sober portion of the community, but what I mean to say is this, that as far as drunkenness is concerned, it is at present only confined to the head of the family; but that if a man introduced the drink into his family by his bad example, it would be productive of evil consequences to his children, and to his wife, he having only one apartment, and not only that, but his associates would go with him, and the evil would be multiplied.

2171. But the evil would be confined to the small drunkard class, and would not arise in the respectable class?—No doubt.

2172. Does not that evil sometimes arise from the wife going to look for the husband at the public-house?—No doubt, there are sure to be drunken women, but they are very few.

2173. Do you know at all the difference in the number of arrests between women and men?—I do not.

2174. Would you be surprised to hear that the proportion of women was very large?—I would not be surprised, but there certainly is a distinction to be made between the classes of women. I do not think that there is a large class of drunken married women. I think that when you allude to a large number of arrests being made amongst females, that does not include the married portion of the females, but a class of another low order, viz., the woman of the town.

2175. You mentioned that the working classes would feel it a great injustice to be deprived of the opportunity of social intercourse in public-houses?—I believe they would.

2176. You do not think that they would bring their families there for the social intercourse, do you?—They would not think of such a thing.

2177. Is not the best sort of social intercourse that a man can have that with his family?—A man can enjoy himself with his family, but he likes to vary his enjoyment; he cannot enter into the same conversation with his family that he can with his fellows over a glass of punch.

2178. You said that confirmed drunkards would get drunk in spite of any legislation, and that it was only the sober class who would be inconvenienced; do you not think that the distinction which has been drawn is a sound one, that there are, first, determined drunkards who will get drunk under any inconvenience; next, determined sober men, who will not get drunk under any circumstances; and, thirdly, a large class, like us Irishmen, who will not get drunk unless we are greatly tempted?—No doubt.

2179. Do you not consider that it ought to be taken into account that the large class of men who may give way to excess, if drink is brought home to them, is the largest class?—It is the largest class; but at the same time there ought to be taken into account the irritation that would be produced by depriving a man of what he believes he has a legitimate right to.

2180. But you would, therefore, qualify your first argument that there was only the drunkard and the sober man to be considered, the largest class being the intermediate class?—I must admit that.

2181. How many trades are there in your association?—About 30.

2182. And how many members are there altogether?—That would include somewhere about 15,000 or 16,000 of the population.

2183. You mean that there are about 15,000 or 16,000 subscribing members in your association?—I will explain that the association is composed of representatives, but the constituency of the association comprises that class.

2184. But do those constituents pay anything or enter into any arrangement in order to become members?—They pay a subscription of a halfpenny a week per member; there is a proportion struck of the number of men employed all the year round, so we cannot always tell their exact number.

2185. Your central association represents the trade association, comprising, as you think, about 16,000 tradespeople?—Yes.

2186. A very large proportion of those are Dublin tradespeople?—They are.

2187. As far as the opinion of the whole body of tradesmen goes, your central organization has not expressed any opinion?—No; the opinion I have expressed now is what I have heard freely discussed privately among the members.

2188. This is what I wanted to make clear; you are not, so to speak, giving evidence officially, but as a person largely connected with individual tradespeople?—Yes, I may mention that we have this general committee of the united trades who meet weekly, and on last Monday week we had a conversation about what was suggested by some of the witnesses as to closing on Saturday night, and the general feeling was that such a thing would not be suggested by the committee, that it was not seriously entertained. They said, in fact, that it would be productive of such serious inconvenience that they did not believe that those parties who suggested it were really sincere.

2189. That was the opinion of the members of your committee, was it?—Yes, but I may mention what was said then with reference to the serious inconvenience that would be produced; it was the unanimous feeling that the early closing of public-houses on any other night of the week, would be less inconvenient than on Saturday night, and for this reason, that a large portion of the working classes (two trades were mentioned, tailors and shoemakers, numbering together about 6,000), and others which were mentioned, who are what is called out working tradesmen, generally bring home their work on Saturday night at seven, and their average time of payment is about nine, and it was stated that they are sometimes paid two or three together with a large note, which they have to go to a public-house to get changed; there they ask for change, and order some drink, in order to get accommodated. And there is a large class of people depending upon them for payment, such as female sewers and so on; and if the public-houses were closed earlier than at present, it would be productive of serious pecuniary losses, and the people would have to buy the liquor and groceries which they required at small shops, 30 per cent. dearer in price, and 50 per cent. worse in quality. Moreover, I may also state that the marketing hours amongst the working classes, on Saturday night in Dublin, are from 8 to 11 o'clock.

MYLES WILLIAM O'REILLY, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

The Rev. EDWARD (Canon) McCABE, called in; and Examined.

2190. Chairman.] You are the Parish Priest of Kingstown, are you not?—I am.

2191. How long have you been parish priest of Kingstown?—Three years now.

2192. And before that you were parish priest of what place?—I was for about nine years parish priest of St. Nicholas's, Francis-street, Dublin.

2193. That is a very large parish in the centre of the manufacturing and working part of the town, is it not?—It is.

2194. May I ask what other parishes in Dublin you have been connected with?—I was nearly three years in Marlborough-street, and nearly 15 years before that I was a curate in Clontarf; Clontarf is in the suburbs of Dublin, but there is a very large agricultural country attached to it.

2195. But St. Nicholas's is one of the largest parishes in Dublin, containing one of the largest working populations, is it not?—I suppose that I had 32,000 or 33,000 Roman Catholics belonging to my own jurisdiction.

2196. And most of those are poor people; it is not a parish in which there are many rich people, I believe?—Except the shopkeepers; and in St. Stephen's Green, and a few other streets, there are some of the better class; but the population of that class over whom we could claim spiritual jurisdiction in the parish is very small, so that the great majority of the parish would be of the working class.

2197. Would you say that drunkenness has decreased in your recollection in the last 20 years?—Yes; I should say so.

2198. To what cause do you attribute that decrease?—I would attribute it to the agency of education amongst the people; they are better instructed, and the schools have been attended by them very generally for the last 20 years. I would attribute it, to a great extent, to their being better instructed, both in religion and in secular science.

2199. Are not the working classes also better off than they used to be?—Yes, and I think that drunkenness amongst them will decrease as their comforts increase; in proportion as they become comfortable, we shall have less trouble in the shape of drunkenness with them.

2200. Is there still to your knowledge, however, a great amount of drunkenness on Saturdays and Sundays amongst the working classes in the city of Dublin?—On Sundays a great deal. While I was in Francis-street, the amount of drunkenness was very remarkable indeed. On Sundays I attributed it a great deal to their getting drunk on Saturday nights, by which they had a sort of appetite created for it on Sundays, and the consequence was that a great deal of drunkenness came under my observation.

2201. On Sunday evenings?—On Sunday evenings.

2202. Were there anything like groups of drunken men to be seen in any of the streets about Francis-street on the Saturday and Sunday evenings?—I could scarcely say groups, but I could see a good many of them. If you could judge of those who were invisible from those who were visible, the number would be very great.

2203. Would the drunken people be about in such numbers as to produce inconvenience to respectable people at seven o'clock in the evening?—Yes. At Kingstown we have service at seven o'clock in the evening, and it has come to my own knowledge that a great number of respectable families have given up the idea of attending the evening service, in consequence of the number of drunken men about the corners of the streets.

2204. Have you considered the question of either totally prohibiting, or increasing the restrictions on the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday?—Latterly I have been considering the matter; I think that from my experience of Dublin and Kingstown, I would not recommend total closing.

2205. To what extent would you recommend increased restriction?—I would suggest that the houses should be left open sufficiently long to afford poor people an opportunity of getting the refreshment which they might naturally be expected to look for on Sundays. For instance, at Kingstown, where I am at present, a very large number of the working classes come out from the necessity of getting fresh air after the hard work of the week, and I think that it would be a hardship to deprive them of all the means of getting reasonable refreshment on Sundays. If a man takes a walk for four or five miles out of Dublin, say to Kingstown, I think he would consider it very hard that he should have no opportunity of getting any refreshments until his return to Dublin.

O

2206. What

Rev. Canon
McCabe.

5 May 1868.

Rev. Canon
McCabe.

5 May 1868.

2207. They are now closed until two o'clock, are they not?—Yes, they are; and the reason why I would suggest three o'clock is, that our service is over about two; from half-past one to a quarter to two, and the men who have been attending service are in a great many cases tempted to go in and drink, with the terrible risk that, having once commenced, they will continue it; and I think if public-houses were kept closed until three, the congregations would have fully dispersed; they would have gone away from the immediate neighbourhood where the temptation would be strong upon them, and they might not drink at all that day; whereas, if the public-houses were open at that time, when they were passing by, through a feeling of good fellowship, they would press one another to go in and get some drink; and the man who receives the treat in the first instance feels himself in some way or other bound through the feeling of fellowship to reciprocate the compliment. There are a great many men who go on in that way without the smallest idea of getting drunk, but who get drunk nevertheless, whereas if those men had gone home to their families they would have had a fair chance of spending the day in sobriety, so that I would consider it a very great blessing if three o'clock were substituted for two as the hour of opening.

2208. What hour would you propose as a proper one for the public-houses to close at?—I would suggest a different time for different seasons of the year. I think that it would be a very great blessing if the public-houses were closed, as far as possible, in full daylight, because when a man gets drunk at night he staggers home, and is protected by the darkness of the night, and very few people see him and notice him, but if he was obliged to go out in the glare of the day, when the people for whom he had a respect were likely to see him, it would be a very great check upon him. Now I may say that for a great many years temperance, though violated, is held in very great esteem by the people. It is some years since I commenced my career first, and then men were very little ashamed of being seen drunk; in fact, they sometimes feigned a greater degree of drunkenness than was warranted by the fact, but I think no man would do that now; he would feel that he was degrading himself, and my opinion is, that if he were obliged to face the public when he was drunk he would scarcely try it a second time.

2209. What hour for closing would you suggest in winter?—Five o'clock.

2210. And in summer what hour would you suggest?—In summer they might be open from three to seven o'clock. These hours strike me as desirable to meet the inconvenience I spoke of a while ago; it is only right that the poor man should have the opportunity of getting refreshment in coming to the country; but I think that any man coming to Kingstown, for example, at two o'clock, would have ample time to get anything he might require and to turn his head towards home, and get there by seven or eight o'clock. There is a neighbouring parish to mine, which I cannot speak of from my own experience, but if I may be allowed to mention the experience that I glean from others, I would mention a fact respecting it. Sandymount which is very near Dublin, is very much frequented on Sundays; a great number go out there, and I have been told by the priest of that locality that the scene is perfectly disgraceful; that people loiter about the strand and drink to excess, and remain there until the houses are closed, which I believe is at 11 o'clock, and they consequently go home in a manner that is not at all calculated to increase their respectability in the eyes of any person. If those houses were left open only until seven o'clock in the summer, these people could get quite enough for all the purposes of legitimate refreshment, and they would go out in the broad daylight, and I think that public opinion is quite strong enough to put down drunkenness if it could be brought to play upon it in this manner.

2211. With regard to not opening until three o'clock, are you of opinion that no inconvenience would be felt by the great mass of the people through losing that additional hour; that they do not want drink before three o'clock?—No; as a rule our people never drink at their meals; I mean malt drinks; they may drink water. In this country they drink ale and beer and things of that sort, at their meals; but in our country they do not as a rule; there may be exceptions, but as a rule they never think of it; anything for the purpose of refreshment they would have ample facility for getting between three and seven o'clock.

2212. Even in summer you consider that seven o'clock would be late enough to afford all reasonable facilities for getting what they wanted?—I think so; they could get all they wanted in the country, and could then go towards home like reasonable beings, or if they wanted to enjoy the remainder of the evening in the country they would be able to do so.

2213. Do you think that that change in the hour would have a very considerable effect in diminishing drunkenness in Dublin, and in the neighbourhood?—I think it would, even if it had no other effect than that the man having got drunk would have to go out in the open day; I think that would be a penalty which he would not like to incur a second time.

2214. Am I right in saying that it is your opinion that the greatest amount of drunkenness takes place late in the evening, both on Saturday and Sunday?—I should say so. Our people, as far as I know them, and I know them tolerably well, drink, not for the sake of drinking; they have got the character of being very fond of drink; but I think their character is misunderstood; they are exceedingly sociable, and I think that I could scarcely venture to say that I have met a dozen men in my life who got drunk for the pleasure of drinking; they go into the public-house without any intention of going to excess; there they are joined perhaps by a friend and are naturally so hospitable that they will not either eat or drink alone, and they are impelled to ask their friend to drink with them; that friend being hospitable himself must return the compliment, and then three or four coming in the circle is enlarged; and every man must be as good as his neighbour, and the consequence is, perhaps, that they all get drunk, not through love of drink but through love of society.

2215. It has been stated by some witnesses that any legislation restricting the hours for the sale of drinks, would be only effective as against the the sober man for whom it is not required, because the confirmed drunkard will get drunk in some way or other, either by getting it at the time, or by laying it up beforehand; would you agree with me that the portion of the people you are acquainted with should be divided into three classes; first, the confirmed class of drunkards; secondly, the very sober man, whom no temptation will induce to exceed; and the third class persons who are not intentional drunkards, but who are weak under temptation, and who would be glad, in themselves, to have the temptation of the public houses removed, for at least a portion of the time?—I think you may adopt that division; it is the only division that could be made; although the confirmed drunkard is determined on getting drunk, and perhaps may succeed, I think it is a mercy to him to throw all obstacles you can in his way. In the next place, I would not agree with you in saying that the confirmedly sober man is free from all danger, because I do not think he is. He may be a very sober man from habit, but circumstances may expose even him to the danger of committing excess. He may be going along the road, and may be asked by his friend to go into a public-house, and he may be detained there, although it may be repugnant to all his principles, and before he leaves he may be guilty possibly of his first crime of intemperance. There is a very large class of those who are not drunkards, yet who are not yet perfectly established in the habits of temperance, and who are quite accessible to the influence of temptation, and it would be very desirable to have some legislation in respect of them. Perhaps I might particularly allude to the class of young men who are passing from the period of boyhood to that of manhood; if those young people contract intemperate habits at that period of life, there is very great danger that they will be continued.

2216. Is it within your knowledge that there is a very considerable amount of drinking on the Sunday morning in the city of Dublin during the prohibited hours?—I am told that there is a great deal.

2217. You have reason to know it, have you not?—I have.

2218. Is it your opinion that that arises from the illicit sale of drink on that morning?—Yes.

2219. Do you know at all the class of houses in which that sale is carried on?—I was speaking about that a day or two ago (the day after I got the summons to attend the Committee) to a very intelligent priest in a very populous parish, a parish very similar to the one I was in myself in Francis-street, and he did not hesitate to say that even the most respectable men in the trade were beginning to sell on Sundays before two o'clock. Of course, he spoke only with reference to his own locality. He said that he was quite of opinion, from the facts that came under his observation, that probably there was more spirits and drink sold from 11 to 2 o'clock on Sundays than during the remainder of the day. An attempt was made, to my own knowledge, in one of the very leading streets in Dublin, to induce all the principal members of the trade to close their shops on Sundays altogether.

2220. That was Thomas-street, was it not?—Yes, that was Thomas-street. The attempt was successful, and so it continued for about a month. The gentleman who told me said that all the members of the trade to whom he spoke were glad to embrace the opportunity, and they all agreed to close, and they all did close. After a while one man opened his shop on Sundays, and then the next man, and the man opposite or next to him who opened his house thought it very unreasonable that he should be called upon to keep his promise while his neighbour broke it. The result was that after a week or two it became the rule to open again.

2221. It has been stated that the working classes, and the poorer classes in Ireland, particularly in Dublin, would feel any further restriction upon the sale of intoxicating drinks upon that day to be class legislation, and would be very indignant at it; how far would that be your opinion?—I doubt very seriously if they would consider it a grievance; there might at first be a little grumbling, but I am quite sure that they are quite intelligent enough, and quite religious enough to enter into the spirit of any legislation which was devised for their own good; but to this fact I think I might bear testimony, that whatever the feeling of the male portion of the population might be on that matter, I am certain that the female portion of it would very fervently bless the Legislature which passed the law.

2222. I suppose they would have a good deal of influence on the other sex, in inducing them not to be indignant at it?—After a while, I think the whole thing would subside. I go all along on the supposition that a reasonable time is given for the refreshments which those people would require. I would not at all advocate total closing, because I think it would be unfair to the poor.

2223. With regard to the Saturday evening, are you of opinion that a great deal of mischief is done by the late hour to which public-houses are kept open on Saturday evening?—Indeed, I am very strongly of that opinion. I think that the misery of the ensuing week is very much to be attributed to it. Men, with their week's money go into public-houses to get refreshment, and are tempted to spend their money. Very often they are tempted and made dupes by designing men, and they very often go home on Saturday night with a very considerable deduction from their week's wages. I am quite certain of the fact.

2225. Then, I suppose, you will agree that if the public-houses were closed on Saturday evening at nine o'clock, all other houses in which drink is sold should be also closed?—Certainly, otherwise it would be perfectly useless to legislate; it would be simply depriving the respectable publican of the means of carrying on his trade, and giving it to a class of men in whose hands it would be exceedingly unsafely lodged.

2226. What class of men do you mean with whom it would be unsafely lodged?—Those people who keep beer-houses, and houses of that sort; these houses are decidedly and exceedingly a great curse to the country. I am quite of opinion that even now one beer-house does more mischief than any three public-houses we have.

2227. You are aware, of course, that that would shut up all grocers' shops also at nine o'clock who have a license for selling drink of any sort?—I would close them all.

2228. Do you think that would be any inconvenience to the class who purchase their provisions at those houses on Saturday night?—It might be an inconvenience at first, but I think where there is a question of great material good this inconvenience might be very fairly risked. After a very short time, they would all buy their provisions and make any arrangements they wanted to make earlier. I would certainly shut up all those places where spirits is sold. What you call purely grocers' shops for the sale of teas, and things of that sort; and where the drinking shop was totally distinct from the department for the sale of tea and similar commodities, I think might be treated in another way, and be exempt from the action of the present Bill; but I should be very glad to see all places, no matter under what name they went, where drink was sold closed on Saturday night at that hour.

2230. It has been stated that a great proportion of the shopkeepers in Dublin do not pay their workmen until eight or nine o'clock on Saturday night; is that the case to your knowledge?—I really cannot speak positively from experience. I have heard complaints frequently of some classes of employers paying their men in public-houses on Saturday nights; that I consider a most objectionable thing; it simply throws a poor man into the proximate danger of falling into intemperance before he goes home: he may resist the temptation, and he may not get drunk in the house that he is paid in, but he may get inflamed with drink and go to a less respectable public-house, spend a large portion of his week's earnings, and lose his reason at the same time. I am quite of opinion that the respectable members of the trade do all they can to discountenance intemperance. In all professions there are various grades, but there are some of them whom I am quite sure would be as careful to prevent drunkenness occurring in their own houses as they would be to prevent members of their own families getting drunk; if there were none but that class of members in the trade I think legislation would not be necessary; but when a man gets drunk on Saturday night in a respectable house he often goes to another house which does not rank on the same level and simply gets drunk.

2231. You do not think that it would be a hardship on the people who do not get their wages paid until late on Saturday evening, if the houses were not kept open to enable them to get some refreshment?—I think it would be a very great blessing for them to go home without getting any drink. My advice has always been, if you want some drink, get it into your own house, and have a friend to drink it with you if you so wish; it is very likely the man's wife would take care of him when he got home.

2232. A previous witness stated that the only convenient place that the labouring man in Dublin has in which to arrange with his wife, when he gets his wages on Saturday night, what clothes he will purchase and what other things he will require, is the public-house; do you agree with that?—I am not aware of that fact, and should be surprised at it. I should be more surprised if the wife was a consenting party to it; she might go there from compulsion, knowing that if she did not go there she would get no money at all; but if the fact be such, I think the sooner the practice be put a stop to the better. I know this as a positive fact, as regards the poor women, for when they are driven to extremes we are generally their last resource. I am continually told by those poor creatures that they are obliged to go after their husbands and through the streets to try and get some money from them on Saturday nights; and there is a case in my mind at this moment in which I know that a very decent young woman got herself into a habit of great intemperance from that very cause; the husband not going home after getting his wages, she, in order that she might have a chance of getting a portion of them, would follow him to the public-house, and the husband, playing the part of a good general, would endeavour to reconcile her to his being there, and in order to do so he would get more drink for the purpose of making her join him. The person to whom I refer was only a type of a class; she only went there of necessity; she had no chance of getting any money from her husband otherwise; and in order to buy her off her husband would treat her to drink, and that led to her contracting very intemperate habits; so that if it be the fact that they make those public-houses places of appointment in which to meet their families and make their arrangements for the disposal of their wages, I can only say that it is a very unfortunate thing.

2233. You think it would be better for themselves if they were deprived of that opportunity of doing so after nine o'clock on Saturday night?—I do.

2234. Mr. Pim.] You are aware that considerable exertions have been made in Dublin to promote the earlier closing of shops on Saturday night, are you not?—I am.

2235. With some effect, chiefly in shops in which articles of clothing and requisites of that sort are sold, rather than with regard to shops in which eatables are sold?—That is so.

2236. If the public-houses were closed at nine o'clock, as you suggested, do you think that that would have a tendency to assist that object?—Yes, decidedly.

2237. And do you think that the movement for the early closing of houses of business on Saturday is decidedly useful?—Decidedly so.

2238. We have been informed that there are many employers who do not pay their work-people until late on Saturday night?—That is so.

2239. Are you of opinion that the closing of public-houses at, say nine o'clock, would have the effect of inducing the earlier payment of wages?—I mentioned a short time ago that, in some instances, I knew of some of the smaller employers paying their men in public-houses; the arrangement we contemplate of closing at nine o'clock clock would compel them to pay their men earlier, for they would be aware that the public-houses would not be open at a late hour. Those who pay late are not a very large class. But with regard to the others, I could not say exactly how it would bear upon them. I am quite sure of this, that as it is for the interest of the employer that a good feeling should exist between himself and his workmen, if the workmen remonstrated and said that the late payments were a great inconvenience to them, after a while the payments would be made earlier.

2240. I have not gathered from you whether, in your opinion, there are a large portion of the working classes who would be in favour of the restrictions proposed by this Bill?—Habitual drunkards I am sure would be against the restrictions naturally; they would prefer the houses being kept open all night; but as far as I can judge from the opinions of those with whom I have conversed, I can say that I never heard that the poor men have the least objection to the restriction; I cannot say positively that they would be in favour of it, for I never heard an opinion upon the matter in that way, but I can give a negative opinion that I never heard any objection to it; I am quite certain, as I said before, that the female members of families would go in heart and soul for it; they would close them altogether if they could.

2241. You mentioned that there were crowds of persons round the public-houses in Kingstown, who were an annoyance to respectable females attending evening service on the Sunday; I suppose the necessity of attending to those public-houses prevents the families of the owners of those public-houses, and so on, from attending evening service almost completely?—The attendants of course could not do so; with us we do not attach the same importance to evening service as we do to morning service; all our people are bound under the strictest obligation of conscience to go to mass, but the evening service is a matter of pure devotion.

2242. Those who go to evening service have been, almost all of them, to the morning service?—As a matter of course I should say so; if a man was so lost to the obligation of his conscience as not to attend mass, he would never think of going to vespers.

2243. Do you not think that the hours of work of those persons who are obliged to attend to the public-houses, are very severe?—I think so.

2244. Have you formed any opinion as to whether the severity of the hours they are obliged to work, have seriously injurious effects upon them physically?—I have no hesitation in saying that it must have a very serious effect upon them; they are young men, perhaps young men coming in from the country, and if a boy is taken from school and employed from an early hour in the morning till a late hour at night, I think that would be very much calculated to break down his constitution; it is true that they have on Sunday from the early part of the morning until two o'clock; but boys and young men after a hard week's work would naturally wish to remain in bed on Sunday a little longer than on any other morning in the week, as it is the only morning upon which they can remain in bed; and by the time a lad has had his breakfast and been to mass, his time for fresh air is so very small, that he gets none of it; if that boy goes to one of our masses, where he might be supposed to get a sermon, he would be going home to his work almost at the very time when the house is open at present; so that I would say, practically speaking, he has no opportunity for open air exercise. Nominally he has until two o'clock on Sundays or three, but I think when you look at it in that way, you will see that he must have very little time for fresh air, if any at all.

2245. And you think that it is a very serious loss to him to be deprived of the weekly holiday?—I think so.

2246. You think it would require some very good reason to warrant their being employed?—I think so; and when the convenience of the public can be secured reasonably, I think a very good case should be made out before depriving him of that holiday.

2247. For the sake of allowing those who are young to have the benefit of the fresh air?—They are necessarily young in the beginning; I do not know exactly the number of public-houses in Dublin, or in Kingstown either, but I suppose on the average there may be probably three attendants to each; certainly I think there would be two in each of those houses, and I think that that would be below the average, so that upon the aggregate they would form a very considerable item in the population. Looking at it even from that point of view, I think that it would be a great blessing, and if they could be closed altogether, that would be the greatest blessing of all; but I should be afraid to enter into that, fearing that it would give rise to mischief in another way.

2248. Mr. Monsell.] Can you tell us whether there is much Sunday morning drinking in Dublin?—Yes, no doubt there is.

2249. Does that take place during the time in which the public houses are closed by law?—Yes, it does.

2250. How do you account for the fact that the authorities are unable to prevent that?—That is rather a dangerous question to ask me; I am sure that the authorities do their best; whether a more perfect means could not be adopted to increase the power of the authorities is a matter upon which I am not prepared to give an opinion.

2251. But if the authorities are not able to enforce the observance of the present law, do you think that any such law as that which is now contemplated to be introduced by this Bill would be really operative?—If this Bill became a law, and the authorities could not carry it out, I think it would be better to leave well enough alone; I am sure that means could be found.

2252. Mr. Dawson.] How is this drinking on Sunday morning provided for if the public houses are closed; is it drinking at home?—No; the public-houses are supposed to be closed, but are really in full, but disguised action.

2253. You mean to imply that the law is not carried out with regard to the closing of public-houses?—The law is not carried out with regard to the closing of public-houses.

2254. Are not those cases of infraction reported to the police?—I suppose so; I know nothing of the manner in which the police discharge their duties, but I suppose they are.

2255. You do not think that there is sufficient supervision at present?—There may be sufficient supervision, but certainly it is not effective.

2256. Mr. Stacpoole.] Could you suggest any means by which the authorities could carry out the regulations more fully?—I could not; anything that I could suggest would be so very crude that I think it would not be worth entertaining; what has struck me is, that I think before a house is licensed it should be reported upon by some competent person as being suitable for its purpose, because I know that in a great many of the cases some of the public-houses are so arranged that in case the police knock at the door, the proprietors have the means of allowing the people who are inside to pass out by the back door into another lane, so that by the time the police come in, there is no means of finding out that there has been a consumption on the premises.

2257. Are you not aware that the licensing magistrates at the quarter sessions always inquire whether a house is fit to be licensed before the license is granted to it?—I am not aware of that, but I suppose so. That there should be no such means of egress, I think, would be a very important element of their fitness, because if a house is so constructed that when the police are knocking at the door the people can pass out into the street, that house is not fit to receive a license in that state.

2258. Do you think that a house ought to be licensed unless it was properly built for the purposes of a public-house?—Certainly not, or unless it was properly reported upon by some competent person, so that if these people were in the public-house when the police came they should not be able to get out by a back way.

2259. That a public-house, in fact, should not have a back door?—I mean a back door leading into a public road. It is only fair to say that there is a class of houses in Dublin for whom this legislation is perfectly unnecessary, but there is another class for whom this legislation is most necessary, and with respect to which all the precautions that can be taken should be taken.

2260. Do you know whether the magistrates are in the habit of asking those questions that I have indicated?—No, I do not; it strikes me, if I might give an opinion with reference to beer houses, that so long as beer houses are left in their present condition, legislation is perfectly useless.

2261. You draw a distinction between beer houses and public-houses?—Yes, as I understand the law, the beer-house keeper gets his license from the Excise; no matter how often he is deprived of the license, he has simply to go to the Excise and pay his 1 £, and gets it again.

2262. You are of opinion that there should be some law that should prevent the Excise from using that power?—I think there should be a total change in the system of giving a license; I believe that after three convictions the keeper of a public-house is liable to have his license withdrawn from him, and that that would be to him a very serious matter; having probably paid a large sum on entering, but the beer-house keeper simply gets his license for 1 £, and merely has a cabin or a room, or whatever it may be, and he sells beer, and generally whisky; they do sell whisky, as a matter of fact; of course if they are caught selling whisky the penalty would be serious, but if they are brought before the magistrates for anything disorderly, and lose their license, they can go to the Excise and get their licenses renewed.

2263. You are of opinion that there should be some arrangement by which they should not have the power of going to the Excise for renewal?—I should be exceedingly glad indeed if the beer-houses were discontinued. I have had a very large experience of them at Kingstown, and I think that they are the greatest curse that we have.

2264. Mr. Murphy.] From the evidence that you have given I gather that you appear to think that the hours during which public-houses should be open should not be merely restricted to selling of spirits, but that the parties should be allowed to refresh themselves in the house; that they should be allowed to consume what they bought on the premises?—That is my opinion.

2265. Consequently, if an Act was passed allowing the public-houses to sell spirits, but prohibiting them from consuming them on the premises, do you think it possible that such an Act could be worked?—I think it would be quite useless.

2266. Have you seen or read the proposed Bill which is under consideration?—I have not.

2267. I will just draw your attention to the first proviso. The Bill enacts that spirits, wine, and beer may be sold between the hours of 2 and 4 in the afternoon, and between 8 and 9 in the evening of Sunday, but that they shall not be consumed on the premises; do you think that that could be carried out?—It will be very difficult indeed to carry out that law, and if I might make a suggestion I would say, that instead of having two distinct openings I would have but one opening, and simply let the purchasers either carry the drink away, or consume it there if they please.

2268. Your decided opinion is simply this, that there should be no restriction upon the consumption on the premises, and that a continuous period should be allowed for opening instead of an intermittent period?—Quite so.

2269. Now allow me to draw your attention to another proviso in the Bill, which is in effect a clause allowing any party having an eating-house to sell as much spirits as he likes during the hours in which the eating house is open, if the party only comes in and buys a little something to eat?—I should think that would defeat the object of the Bill altogether. The poor people could get all they wanted to eat up to seven o'clock.

2270. Are you of opinion that the introduction of this clause would render the Bill totally inoperative?—I should say so; you would be so far destroying the trade of the respectable publican, and making those eating-house places where they could simply carry on their illicit trade.

2271. With reference to the prevention of abuses in public-houses, I think you gave it as your opinion, founded on two or three questions which you were asked, that proper supervision and respectable houses if they could be established, would be the best possible remedy for the abuses that do take place at present?—I think so.

2272. You have also stated, that in your opinion public-houses should not be opened until 3 o'clock in the Sunday afternoon?—Yes.

2273. I take it for granted that your opinion is grounded on the practice which prevails in your district, that Divine services are not concluded until half-past 2 or 3 o'clock?—No, it goes on the supposition that our mass is over about 2 o'clock, and then when the people come out of the church they are open to the temptation that I have mentioned.

2274. Supposing

2274. Supposing that in other districts of the country the services were over at 1, or before, would this reason that you have assigned for having public-houses opened at 3 o'clock in your district, where the services are over at 2, be equally applicable to having them open at 2 o'clock?—Unless you wish to encumber the Bill by subdividing the provisions of it, I think that by opening them all at 3 o'clock, you would form a good standard, 2275. But supposing that in the majority of the cases all over the country, 1 o'clock is the usual hour of closing, and not 2 o'clock, would that not form a good argument for opening the public-houses at 2 o'clock?—I think that in the country districts, I should have very little hesitation in closing the houses altogether.

2276. That is another branch of the question altogether, could you give me a specific answer to the question?—With reference to the question of not opening them till 3 o'clock. I may say that I was a curate in Clontarf parish, to which there was a very large country district attached, and I know that the countrymen after coming from mass on Sundays would loiter about the public-houses; the mass would be over about half-past 1 o'clock, or a quarter to 2, and I have seen them going in there and sometimes coming out perfectly drunk, whereas if the public-houses were closed for an hour they might pass then by, so that even in those cases where the morning devotions would be over at 1 o'clock I should see no necessity of anticipating it by an hour earlier.

2277. Are you aware as a matter of fact, though not from your own personal knowledge, taking the country districts throughout Ireland, whether the service is ever kept up until 2 o'clock as a rule?—As a rule it is not, but it very frequently occurs that the service is not over until half-past 1.

2278. In what districts would that be generally the case?—In a great many of the suburban districts.

2279. Round about Dublin?—Yes, round about Dublin; I cannot speak from personal knowledge of the country districts, except of those where I have been myself; and I know that where I was for 13 or 14 years, I never got any breakfast until 2 o'clock on the Sunday, so that I was getting my breakfast about the time that some of my congregation would be preparing to get drunk.

2280. Do you speak from personal experience and knowledge of the habits of the suburban districts of Dublin?—Yes.

2281. You assigned three o'clock as the hour of opening the public-houses, on account of the services not being over until about two; but assuming that the service was over at one in the majority of places in the country at one o'clock, would not two be the proper hour for opening, upon the same principle as you laid down in reference to three o'clock?—Quite so; the ground that I place that opinion upon is simply to give the people the opportunity of clearing out of the neighbourhood of the public-house.

2282. It is almost unnecessary to ask you this question, having given your opinion that consumption should be allowed at whatever hour the houses are to be opened on Sundays; but as a matter of opinion grounded upon the previous evidence, supposing that an Act was passed, not allowing spirits to be consumed on the premises where they are sold, would not that lead to a kind of illicit trade springing up, and a substitution of other houses, for the purpose of tap-rooms?—I suppose that it would end in their purchasing spirits, and going next door to consume them. I think it would be far better to let them go into a house that was honestly recognised for the sale of drink, and have no contraband sale at all, because the moment a man is prohibited from doing that which he thinks he has a right to do, he feels almost impelled to violate the law, and his doing so puts him into the position of a smuggler, which is calculated to destroy his moral character.

2283. You stated that you thought that seven o'clock in the evening in summer, and five o'clock in the winter, would be in your judgment a proper hour at which to close the public-houses?—I am speaking from my own knowledge of Dublin and its immediate vicinity; I have had no experience of other parts of the kingdom.

2284. Your reason for that was grounded upon this, that they ought to be closed in day light, because a great many people would get drunk in the dark who would not like to be seen staggering home in the day light. Supposing you took day light as the rule, instead of fixing seven in the summer, and five in the winter, would that meet your view?—The only reason why I would suggest opening them at all would be the reason of necessity, that is to say, if I thought it could be done safely, I would suggest the total closing on Sunday: why I suggest seven o'clock as the hour for closing is, that that will make ample provision for the persons who would require refreshment in that way; an additional reason would be that they would not like to come out in the day and be seen drunk.

2285. You suggested the hour of seven as a kind of approximate hour?—Yes, exactly; and if they wished to enjoy a walk they could go and take it, and get home quietly at a reasonable hour, getting the refreshment they wanted.

2286. Have you considered the question of people going out from the city of Dublin, such as tradesmen, and their wives and children, for a walk after their dinner on a fine summer evening, and coming back to Dublin about half-past eight or nine by day light; do you think it would be a hardship upon such persons if, after coming back to Dublin from a long walk, they found the public-houses closed, and they themselves unable to get any refreshment?—I think it is not the habit of the tradespeople to take their wives and families to the public-house.

2287. But supposing he should want to go there himself?—He would get his refreshment on the road, and I think if he went home to his wife and family he would be much safer than he would be if he went to the public-house. The reason why I suggest this hour is, that if a man went into the country he could get what he wanted there. My experience tells me that those who become drunkards are not the people who make a meal of it. It is the men who go again and again, two, three, or four times in the day, and ultimately get a passion for drinking.

2288. Continuous tipplers?—Yes; so that if, for instance, a man was out in my neighbourhood, having walked there, he could get at once all that he would naturally want; and I think that if a man went to bed without getting anything after seven o'clock, he could not say that he was very much persecuted.

2289. But the ordinary class of people, such as labourers and members of the working class, as a rule in Ireland, do not drink with their meals?—

Rev. Canon McCabe.

5 May 1868.

Rev. Canon McCabe. They do not drink with their meals, so far as my knowledge goes.

5 May 1868. 2290. Supposing that it was the case that a large number of employers, small employers particularly, did not pay their wages until after nine o'clock on Saturday night, do you think that it would be a hardship to close the public-houses sooner than that?—I do not see any practical inconvenience that would arise from it.

2291. The markets, as I believe you are aware, remain open until 11 or 12 on Saturday night?—I am aware of that, and I take it for granted that your Bill does not interfere with that which may be necessary for a family to lay by provision for the week, but I think if a man is merely going for drink after nine o'clock, it would serve him neither in body nor soul.

2292. Are you aware that people go to the markets after nine or ten o'clock on the Saturday nights?—I am aware of that.

2293. Why is it that they go so late to market?—It may be that they are not paid in time enough to go their earlier, or, as is frequently the case, that the wife has been hunting her husband about the town, and has succeeded in finding him out about 10 o'clock, and got out of him enough to keep body and soul together for the coming week.

2294. Would you say that that was a general case?—I would not say that that was a general case, but it is an instance of what occurs.

2295. You would not lay that down as a rule, with regard to the people who go so late to the market as 10 or 11 o'clock at night?—No. Whether their going so late to the market is the result of their not being paid earlier or not I do not know.

2296. What do you consider is the cause of their going to the market so late as that?—I do not know. The men generally go to the barbers' shops, in order to get ready for the next day, and they make a little toilet in that way, which occupies time.

2297. With reference to their going to barbers' shops, have you ever heard that barbers' shops are in active request on Sunday mornings?—As barbers' shops?

2298. Yes?—I have heard that they are.

2299. Did it ever suggest itself to your mind, that they were in use for any other purpose on Sunday mornings?—I could not say that I had not heard so.

2300. Do you not think that it is a very natural thing that persons who wished to resort to an illicit traffic would go to such a place for such a purpose?—Very likely; a drunkard will stop at nothing to get drink.

2301. I suppose you have no notion of the number of the labouring classes in Dublin?—I could not give you any answer of that sort except from an idea of the number of people that I have had to do with myself in Francis-street, which would be 32,000 or 33,000.

2302. Those were the working classes?—They were generally.

2303. Have you included amongst those, tradespeople and labourers?—I have.

2304. Have you any idea what proportion of those 33,000 are committed, in the course of the year, for drunkenness?—I could not tell you that.

2305. I suppose the proportion is not very great; not 10 per cent., is it?—It would be the merest guess that I could give, for I could not tell you exactly at all. We have to look after those men when they run to excess; and the Commissioners, I should say, would not find the statistics which are before them very correct materials for them to judge of the extent of the drunkenness, because the police will not take up a man unless he is dreadfully drunk and giving annoyance, and has no person to take care of him; a man may be very far gone, and yet carry himself smoothly enough, and the police will let him alone.

2306. Major Gavin.] I think you stated that notwithstanding the closing of public-houses on the Sunday, there was a good deal of drinking going on at the present moment?—There is.

2307. Then I suppose that if we pass this Bill things would still continue as they are now in that respect?—That is more than I can say; whether more can be done in the way of restricting them or not, I do not know.

2308. The law is against their being opened now up to a certain hour, and you say that up to that time there is more drunkenness than at any other time?—It is a question for the executive to see whether they can render more effective their control over them.

2309. I suppose you are aware that the Roman Catholic Bishop in Tipperary has, by his own exertions, greatly put down drunkenness there?—That is so.

2310. In the same way that has been done in Wexford, has it not?—It has succeeded very well both in the archdioceses of Cashel and diocese of Wexford, but we could never succeed to that extent in Dublin or in the neighbourhood; we have a floating population, but in the country places the priest knows the people, and he knew their fathers before them, and he knows all their connections and he can personally influence them in a way that we cannot. For instance, in Kingstown, people come from all the four points of the compass; they are moving about continually, and so we could not exercise the same influence over them as the clergy in the country could.

2311. But, of course, there is no doubt that you do endeavour to do what can be done?—Everything is done that can be done, but when a man gets a passion for drink, and when he has the facility for gratifying that passion, though his resolutions may be strong, he yields to temptation ultimately.

2312. Do you suppose that those persons who surround the public-houses on Sunday evenings, as you have stated, belong to your own flock?—Some of them do; but a great many of them do not.

2313. Have you ever tried the extreme measure of giving their names?—In the neighbourhood of Dublin, we should consider that a very extreme measure; they might give our names to the Attorney General for prosecution, and that might be very inconvenient.

2314. Mr. Monsell.] You have stated that you are now parish priest of Kingstown, having been formerly connected with the parish of Francis-street in Dublin?—Yes, that is so.

2315. Supposing that the enactments of this Bill were, so far as regards towns at all events, having municipal bodies or Town Commissioners, to be permissive, do you consider, beginning first with Kingstown, that a body elected by so large a constituency as the Town Commissioners, would adopt the Bill or would reject it, supposing they had the choice?—I think that if it were made permissive, it would not be brought into action.

2316. I am speaking of the Commissioners who would would be elected subsequent to the Act coming into operation; do you consider that under those circumstances the Act would not be adopted?—I give it as my opinion that the Act would never be brought into force; and that follows from this, that the men who sell spirits are, generally speaking, very influential men, and the candidate for civic or municipal honours would certainly look about him twice before he would give offence to men who might put a serious stumbling block in his way, and who probably might be a competitor for a seat at the Town Commissioners' Board, and it would be thrown upon him an odious duty. People in small towns do not like to be called upon to do an ungracious thing to a neighbour.

2317. Would you give the same answer as regards Francis-street?—I would.

2318. Does not that show that public opinion cannot be very strong in favour of such a measure as this, when it cannot prevail against those personal considerations?—I do not think that those objections would exactly stand; the number of people in that trade is very large, and a very large number of them are exceedingly intelligent, and many of them are well-educated men; whether they are opposed to the Bill or not I do not know, but if they were opposed to the Sunday closing entirely, and if a man came to canvass them, they would say, "I will give you my vote provided you will set your face against carrying this Bill into action; if not, I will use my influence against you;" I know that it would simply be creating difficulties in the way of a candidate for the commissionership of a town, or for civic honours, and I think they would be very thankful to you for not putting them in the way of such opposition.

2319. Mr. O'Neill.] You stated that the respectable publicans were generally in favour of closing on Sunday?—I speak from facts that I have been told of, and from my own knowledge with regard to many of them, for I am quite sure that they would be very glad to do anything that would contribute to public morality, and that a very great many of them would close altogether if their next door neighbour did not open on Sundays, and so take their custom from them.

2320. Do you not think that that which you have just stated would a little mitigate against what you previously stated with reference to the difficulty of carrying out the Act if it were made permissive?—It would if the whole trade were composed of men of the character of which I have been speaking, but I am sorry to say that the trade is not composed exclusively of one class; there are many who would be unwilling to close, and would simply give any opposition that they could to those who would make a permissive law a law of obligation. Men do not like to be called upon to enact that which appears to be an ungracious thing to their neighbours, which such a measure would be to many.

2321. Mr. Murphy.] I take for granted that your opinion is that whatever rule of restriction, if any, was enacted with regard to public-houses, the same rule should be enacted with regard to all houses of that class?—Yes; if you make any exception in the rule you would simply be intensifying the evil that exists.

Dr. JAMES O'SHAUGNESSY, called in; and Examined.

2322. Chairman.] You are a Surgeon at Limerick, are you not?—Yes, I am.

2323. And you are also a magistrate, I believe?—Yes.

2324. How long have you been resident in Limerick?—For about 30 years.

2325. You are well acquainted with the population, are you not?—Yes, I am.

2326. Have you considered the question involved in this Bill, of further restrictions on the sale of intoxicating drinks on the Sunday?—Yes, I have.

2327. Have you formed any definite opinions upon that subject?—I have.

2328. May I ask you what they are; do you consider that it will be desirable totally to prohibit the sale of drink on Sunday or not?—I do.

2329. Do you also consider that it would be practicable?—I do.

2330. Would you be so kind as to give the Committee your reasons for thinking, in the first place, that it would be desirable to take each case separately?—Do you refer solely to the city or generally to the country around, with which I have a large acquaintance.

2331. To Ireland altogether, but of course I refer chiefly to your own locality, as being the district with which you are best acquainted?—If you will allow me to take the counties around where I have a large professional as well as visiting acquaintance, I will give you my opinion professionally, and also as a magistrate, that it would be desirable as well as beneficial to prevent altogether the sale of spirits on that day.

2332. Would you intend that also to apply to 0.55.

the city of Limerick?—Yes; it would perhaps be difficult to carry it out without additional powers, and perhaps without an increase of public expenditure, but I think it could be carried out, and I think it would be exceedingly beneficial to the condition of Limerick that it should be carried out.

2333. Why did you say that it would be very beneficial?—Because the present system is productive, to my certain knowledge, of very bad consequences to the public.

2334. What are those consequences; is drunkenness very prevalent in Limerick?—I did not mean to say so, but so far there is a good deal of drunkenness, and I think that the great portion of that drunkenness results from Sunday drinking.

2335. Do not you think the people in the city (to take that separately from the country) would feel it a hardship and an inconvenience if there were no place open where they could get any refreshment on a Sunday?—I do not think they would; I think it might be an inconvenience, but I think the great benefit arising from the closing would more than counterbalance that.

2336. Do you think that the public in general would be in favour of total closing on Sunday?—I think, as a rule, they would.

2337. What further expense do you consider would be required to be incurred in order to make the law effective?—I presume that there would be perhaps a greater number of constabulary required in whose hands the case would rest.

2338. Are you of opinion that it would be necessary, cessary, in the city of Limerick for instance, to maintain an increased force all the year through to maintain the law?—I think so, partly.

2339. Do you think that a change in the law would be necessary to give greater power to the magistrates?—I think the magistrates have power enough.

2340. Do the people in the city of Limerick go out into the country to any great extent?—Not to any extent; they do to the neighbourhood of Castleconnel, occasionally, but not to any great extent.

2341. Mr. Monseil.] I understood you to state that you considered that public opinion would be in favour of the total prohibition of the sale of spirits on Sunday?—I think so.

2342. Suppose the Bill were altered so as merely to make it a permissive Bill, do you consider that the Corporation of Limerick would adopt the provisions of the Bill?—Yes, I do.

2343. And that those who elect them, the burgesses, would sustain them in that?—I do.

2344. Has there been any diminution of drunkenness lately in Limerick?—Yes, there has.

2345. Would you mention to the Committee the circumstances under which that diminution has taken place?—Taking the last three months as compared with the three months before, that is, the month of January, February, and March, the number of cases that have come before the magistrates is very nearly half those for the three months before that; that is, for October, November, and December.

2346. And what has caused that diminution?—The cause to which it is attributed is entirely the fact that a mission was held by the Redemptorist Fathers, in Limerick, and that has produced a wonderful moral change, not alone as regards drinking, but as regards pure and moral effects upon families. I could mention many instances in which families have been restored to happiness and comfort which were in misery before that, and that drunkards have been known to go about and endeavour to enlist as many as they could of their former associates to return to temperance.

2347. Has there not been some society formed in Limerick with reference to taking certain steps against the opening of public-houses on Sunday?—Yes.

2348. Will you mention to the Committee what the rules of that society were?—I do not exactly know what the rules were; I know, as I said before, that the number of cases before the magistrates for the last three months, is about half what it was for the three months before.

2349. Before that time, I think, the cases of drunkenness in Limerick on Saturdays and Sundays, were very much more numerous than on other days?—The proportion was very nearly three to one on Monday mornings as compared with any other day in the week.

2350. What is the proportion now?—The same proportion, but the numbers are less.

2351. Was not there an attempt made to form a voluntary agreement among publicans in Limerick, against selling spirits on Sunday?—Yes, there was.

2352. And did not by far the greater number of the publicans agree to enter into those obligations?—I am not aware that there was an exception.

2353. Do you know why it was not carried out?—An infringement took place, we will say, in a certain locality.

2354. It was absolutely tried?—It was tried, and with benefit.

2355. The engagement was made, and was afterwards broken by certain parties?—It was; and an appeal was made to the Roman Catholic clergy by the parties who were suffering from the effects of the engagement being so broken, and they said that of course they must release them from the restriction, and things returned to their old state; but I am happy to say that a very large proportion of the grocers, about 80 respectable grocers in Limerick, though they have the power of opening, do not open at all; even those who have spirit licenses as well as grocery licenses do not open on Sundays.

2356. How long did the whole body of publicans preserve those obligations?—Not more than a month.

2357. Was there any inconvenience suffered by any class in Limerick during that period to your knowledge?—I should say, as far as I could see from my extensive intercourse with the poor, and I have very large reasons for mixing with them, both professionally and otherwise, very much the contrary, inasmuch as while the beer-houses were less frequented, the wives and children were less neglected; and I could never hear that there was any inconvenience arising from it.

2358. You heard no complaints?—I heard no complaints at all.

2359. It was not on account of any public opinion expressed by meeting, or in any other way, that the agreement was broken through?—Not by any means.

2360. Did you, on the other hand, hear a strong approval expressed of the course that had been taken?—I do not remember that I heard it much spoken of, except amongst those people who were the victims of it before; that is to say, the wives and families of the drunkards.

2361. Did you hear upon their part great satisfaction expressed?—Yes.

2362. With regard to country people coming into Limerick on Sunday, did you hear complaints upon their part that they were not able to get refreshment?—No, I never heard them complain. I may mention that I do not think the closing was universal; there may have been beer-shops and other places open where perhaps drink was got, and my not hearing of it would not be absolute proof in favour of it, inasmuch as there may have been some houses where they could have got it.

2363. Do you mean by that illicit houses?—No; I mean that as it was only an ordinary ecclesiastical order, perhaps the closing was not so generally observed as it would have been under legal order, and perhaps there were some houses open in which accommodation could have been got.

2364. Are you quite right in saying that it was an ecclesiastical order; was not it an agreement made perfectly voluntarily?—I think it originated just as much with the clergy.

2365. Did it not originate just as much with the Protestant clergy as with the Roman Catholic clergy?—I never heard of the Protestant clergy moving in it; it only reached me that the Roman Catholic clergy went and had the names of the different parties taken down who were to close. I never heard that the Protestant clergymen took any part in the movement.

2366. When you speak of the public opinion of Limerick, of course the vast majority of the people people are Roman Catholics; but the Protestants would be as anxious about this prohibition as the Roman Catholics are?—Yes; I believe they are very anxious indeed, quite as anxious as the Roman Catholics; but the Protestant clergyman's congregation is generally of that class that they do not require to have a restriction with regard to drink, but it is not so with the Roman Catholics.

2367. Speaking as a professional man and a magistrate, should you say that a large proportion of crime in Limerick may be laid to the account of drink?—I should say nine-tenths of the crime not only in Limerick, but also in Ireland, and not only general but agrarian, that now takes place, is the result of drink.

2368. Mr. O'Neill.] With reference to that voluntary arrangement for closing on Sundays, did the Protestant publicans agree to it as well as the Roman Catholic publicans?—I think that there is but one Protestant publican in Limerick, and he is one of the most temperate and temperance loving men in the whole city.

2369. With regard to the mission of the Redemptionist Fathers having been so successful in Limerick, do you know whether there is any other large town in the south of Ireland that has been making similar exertions?—I am not aware of any, except in those dioceses which you are aware of already, Cashel and Farnham.

2370. I was speaking of large towns?—No, I have not heard of any. I may say that it would be very hopeless and useless to do so in large towns like Dublin; I think it would be almost futile. Limerick is not sufficiently large to have a difficulty in carrying it out.

2371. You think Limerick is the largest town in which it could be carried out?—I think it is about the largest town in Ireland where it could be carried out successfully. I think it could not be so well carried out in Cork, or Dublin, or Belfast.

2372. Mr. Stacpoole.] Would you make any alteration in the system of licensing; would you take away from the excise the power of licensing?—I think so; that is the most important course; everything depends upon the character of the party who gets the license. In the inquiry before the magistrates we require to be exceedingly particular, and were it not for the assistance which we get from the constabulary, by their inspecting houses and their mechanical contrivances, we should never be able to carry out the law. There is, of course, a great deal of supervision in that way, which has led to a great deal of discussion on the bench, and our chairman, as well as our magistrates, take great interest in it.

2373. Is it the fact that if a publican misconducts himself, he merely has to go to the excise to get another license?—No, that refers to the beer-houses, but it does not refer to the licenses of grocers or spirit dealers.

2374. Do not those people who are merely allowed to sell beer sometimes infringe the law?—Not sometimes, but I believe they always do, and I believe it is the most destructive thing that can possibly be, and does more harm than anything else.

2375. You would put them under the same law as everybody else?—I would.

2376. Mr. Murphy.] Am I correct in assuming that the opinion which you have given has exclusively relation to total closing?—Yes.

0.55.

2377. And that it would be highly desirable?—Yes.

2378. Having the object in view of preventing as much as possible excess in Limerick?—Certainly.

2379. You are aware that the object of this Bill is to allow spirits to be sold during certain specified hours, but not to be consumed on the premises?—I am.

2380. Do you think it would be practicable to carry out such a measure as that?—I think that it would be perfectly Utopian and perfectly foolish to expect it. The moment a man goes in to purchase whisky, he may consume it, and the owner of the shop cannot prevent him from doing so. I have had the opinion of some in the trade upon that point, and they are perfectly hopeless about it.

2381. Is it your opinion that if the authorities attempted to enforce the proposed regulations in this Bill, in this respect, they would be able to do so?—I do not think so. I think it would be out of their reach. I do not think that all the powers in England would be able to do it.

2382. Do you think that what is proposed in this Bill would be totally inoperative?—Exactly.

2383. Are you equally of opinion that any restriction to be imposed upon public-houses, that is to say, houses kept by licensed vintners, should be applied to every house which sells fermented or alcoholic liquors?—Yes.

2384. No matter under what name the establishment may be kept?—Yes.

2385. Have you any idea what the proportion of what I may call the drinking population of Limerick is to the gross population?—No, I have not.

2386. It is almost unnecessary to ask you, after what was said about the good effect produced by the Redemptionist Fathers, whether, in your opinion, an Act of Parliament could do what they have done?—I do not think it could.

2387. That, in fact, any legislative enactment for the purpose of repressing drunkenness would be of no use unless it were supported by the moral opinion of the people themselves?—No; none whatever.

2388. Major Gavin.] I think you stated, in answer to Mr. Monsell, that you thought total closing on Sundays would be the best system?—That is my opinion.

2389. Do you not think that that class of people, seeing that in Limerick the gentry have a club-house to go into, and reading rooms, and billiard tables, where they can get refreshments, there would be a jealousy among the lower classes if they found that the class above them had privileges that they could not enjoy themselves?—I do not think so; I do not think that the poorer classes of Limerick would feel that there was class legislation, if we may call it so, because the members of the Limerick Club were allowed to enjoy themselves; I do not think that they would have the least feeling about it.

2390. But I do not restrict myself to the Limerick Club-house?—I do not think that anybody would feel that.

2391. I do not mean the lower class altogether, but there are clerks and tradespeople, who have made their money during the week, and who like to display, perhaps, a little hospitality on the Sunday, and to have a place to go into where they can have a little conversation, without getting drunk; you know it is the custom of Irish people not to drink in their own house?—My answer is, that I do not think there is any objection to the Bill on the grounds you mention.

Dr. J. O'Shaughnessy,
5 May 1868.

2392. That no jealous feeling would exist when the poorer class saw those above them enjoying themselves, when they could not do so?—The great bulk of the people would feel that the advantages to society were so great; and they would also feel that they had the opportunity on Saturday evening of purchasing as much as they might require for their comfort and sociability, and of enjoying it at their own houses with their families.

2393. But it is not the custom at present for people to do that?—I think it would be done. It would be one of the benefits arising from this law, if the houses were closed on Saturday night at nine or ten o'clock. I think it would be necessary to give them up to ten o'clock in the City, but not later. I think that they then would begin to feel that instead of just getting their glass at the public-house, they would get on the Saturday as much beer and spirits as they would require on Sunday, and use it with their families; because any other drinking beyond that arises from the impulse of the moment. A man meets another, and asks him to drink, and then there is drunkenness as a frequent result.

2394. Could you inform the Committee what time generally in Limerick the employers pay their workmen on Saturday?—A good many of the employers in Limerick pay on Friday.

2395. Are there any employers who pay as late as eight or nine o'clock on Saturday?—I think there are many of the small shopkeepers, who pay late on Saturday.

2396. As late as eight or nine o'clock?—Yes; the very class that Mr. Murphy spoke of, the shoemakers, pay late, not because of any unwillingness to pay earlier, but because they have the men coming in from their work.

2397. Would you not be an advocate for having the public-houses closed early on Saturday?—I think that it is most destructive to have them closed so late as 11 o'clock; I think 10 o'clock is the last moment the public-houses should be allowed to be open, and I have taken the opinion of a large number of the publicans of Limerick on the subject.

2398. Could you say what would be the feelings of the spirit grocers themselves?—They would be in favour of restriction on Saturday.

2399. And also in favour of the total closing on Sunday?—Yes, as a class, they would; there may be exceptions, but I think the majority, and more than the majority, the great bulk of them, would be in favour of it.

2400. You are, as we know, a member of the Saint Vincent de Paul Society, and therefore, as such, go about visiting a great deal among the poor; do you suppose that much poverty is produced in Limerick by a great deal of drinking on the part of the working man?—After an experience of many years, my opinion is that a great many cases of extreme poverty, particularly amongst the tradespeople, not amongst the labouring classes, have arisen from intemperance, I do not mean to include the labouring man, because I regret to say at present they have other causes of poverty besides that.

2401. And you as a member of the Society of Saint Vincent de Paul are called upon to assist those people in their poverty?—Yes, we have been.

2402. Do you not go about from house to house visiting?—Only when applications are sent in by parties who are in poverty, then we visit them after that.

2403. But you do not do it without knowing their circumstances?—No.

2404. Lord Claud Hamilton.] In paying those visits where you are so invited, you say you frequently trace the downfall of those persons to habits of intoxication?—Yes.

2405. That has been your experience?—Yes, it is.

2406. You are of opinion that the temptations which are now open to the public under the present state of the law, would be very much diminished by a change somewhat like that which is proposed by this Bill?—I am.

2407. And, in entertaining that opinion, you are speaking for yourself, and those with whom you have been acting?—Yes, I am.

2408. Major Gavin.] You stated, I think, that it would require a greater force of police, if this Bill were passed, to carry it out?—I did.

2409. Supposing that in Limerick, as was the case in Tipperary and Wexford, the clergy of both sides joined and exerted themselves to stop this drinking on Sundays, and watched or did what they could to prevent these houses being opened, do you not think that that would be sufficient?—No; not in a place so large as Limerick. I think it would be in very small towns and villages, but not in the City of Limerick, because although I believe the city to be the largest city in Ireland where it could be carried out, I think it would require a good deal of additional aid, for the constabulary already have a large amount of duty to discharge in Limerick; they have quite enough to do as it is, without throwing an additional onus upon them.

2410. You stated that it was the habit of people in Limerick to go out to Castleconnell, and other places on Sunday?—Yes, it is.

2411. Do you not think that those people would feel annoyed if they could not get any refreshment?—I think they might feel it a little, but I do not think it would cause much general public annoyance, inasmuch as great collateral benefits would arise to society.

2412. Are you of opinion that the total closing of public-houses on Sunday would be a benefit to a great number, and that the great body of the public would not object to it?—That is my opinion.

2413. Lord Claud Hamilton.] Is not a great portion of the laborious duty imposed upon the police now owing to drunkenness?—A portion of it is, but not a great portion.

2414. I was going to suggest that if the closing of the public-houses did give a great increase of labour at one end of their duties in respect of supervision, would they not have a less amount of labour at the other end in respect of the fewer cases of drunkenness they would have to deal with?—I think for some time it would require great vigour upon the part of the constables to prevent the infringement of the law; it is broken very much as it is, and I think for some time there would be so much infringement of the law there, that the police would have much difficulty in endeavouring to prevent it.

2415. Would it be infringed by the establishment of shebeen houses, or are you of opinion that

Dr. J.
O'Shaughnessy.
5 May 1858.

What licensed houses would break the law?—I think that both cases would arise.

2416. You do not think that the licensed houses would assist the police?—I dare say some of them would as much as they could.

2417. You do not think the police labour would be excessive, I suppose?—Yes; I think it would, the banks have been closing earlier, and the effects of that have been that the rush of business on the bank clerks has been excessive, because so many people came all at once, and perhaps it might be so under this Bill; but that will find its level in the course of time.

2418. Mr. Murphy.] Have you any idea with respect to the committals on Monday morning; how many of them arise from Sunday morning drinking, and how many from Saturday night drinking?—Yes I have; but that would not always be a fair test, because the stipendiary magistrate in some instances, I myself in some cases, would attend at the police court on the Sundays, and if there be a case in which there is no bad conduct, we try the case then.

2419. My question is this; you stated that the Monday morning committals, that is, the cases brought up on Monday morning for adjudging are greater than on any other morning in the week; have you turned your attention, or are you capable of telling the Committee what proportion of those cases, which are adjudicated upon on Monday morning, arise from offences committed on the Sunday night, and how many from offences committed on the Saturday night?—I think they would be about equal.

2420. You think that there are no more upon Sunday than upon Saturday?—I think Saturday quite comes up to Sunday, that is my general opinion.

JOHN LEWIS O'FERRALL, Esq., called in; and Examined.

2421. Chairman.] What office do you hold?—I am the Commissioner of Metropolitan Police in Dublin.

2422. I think when this Bill was introduced to the House of Commons last year, your attention was called to it by Lord Mayo, and you were requested to report upon it?—I was.

2423. Will you read that report to the Committee?—The first part of this report has reference to the spirit grocers, and those peculiar licences independent of publican's licences, and which do not immediately refer to this question. Then the report goes on: "With regard to the Bill now before Parliament for reducing the hours during which public-houses may keep open on Sunday, the Commissioners fear that the measure, as now framed, would not be successful in effecting the object it has in view. It proposes to limit Sunday trading to two periods; namely, the first from one to half-past two in the day; and the second from eight to nine in the evening, and in both instances to sale only, expressly prohibiting consumption on the vintner's premises. This would be practically closing public-houses altogether on Sunday; and were it possible to accomplish so laudable an object with the concurrence of a fully developed public opinion, and with a due regard to the interests involved, the measure would be a most desirable one; but there are many circumstances touching the question, and entitled to consideration, which do not appear on the surface. In the first place, the question of revenue arises, for if the trading hours of the publican be reduced on Sunday from nine hours in duration, as at present, to two and a half, and for sale only, the income of the publican must be largely reduced by this short time, as well as by the loss of the sale of the more costly warm drinks, which could only be consumed on his premises, such as those made with whiskey, wine, &c. &c. The value of his license becomes accordingly deteriorated, and he would naturally seek reduction from the excise, the privileges and advantages of his licence being no longer what they had been. So far for the question of revenue, which, however, in the interests of sobriety and good order, though not without difficulty, is not incapable of adjustment. But then comes the question, how far the interests of public morality would be advanced by this total closing through the operation of the proposed

Bill. Would no other places for drinking be surreptitiously called into existence. The drinking at all hours, now so openly carried on in many spirit-grocers' shops, and in most of the beer-houses, in direct violation of the conditions of their licenses, is proof how reckless people seeking drink usually are, and that there will not be wanting persons in total disregard of the law always ready to minister to this craving. The public-houses in Dublin are for the most part well conducted, the laws regulating them are sufficiently stringent; but were they to be superseded on Sunday by a number of unlicensed and irresponsible drinking places, as there is too much reason to fear would be the case, the evil of Sunday traffic, instead of being lessened, would be aggravated. There might be the show of good order for a time, but the Commissioners fear it would be only in appearance, and would not be lasting. The publican himself would not be slow to perceive this illicit traffic, and many, it is feared, would consider themselves justified in violating the law, permitting consumption during prohibited hours, and having recourse to many stratagems for the purpose. Indeed the Bill would appear, though not so intended, to encourage something of this kind by the provision (clause 2, sec. 1) to enable eating-house keepers and confectioners to sell spirituous liquors for consumption on the premises during the entire time that public-houses may now by law keep open for business on Sunday, but would be shut under the Bill, which, in effect, would be securing a monopoly to two classes of traders to the exclusion of the legitimate vintner, who, in order to protect his livelihood, has this strong interest in keeping within the law; but should this Bill become law, the Sunday traffic would pass (as already remarked) into the hands of a different, and as a rule, an inferior class; eating-houses would multiply almost indefinitely, and would in all probability become as great an abuse as beer-houses now are. These observations, it will be understood, apply only to the metropolis. How far the Bill might be desirable in the provinces the Inspector General of Constabulary will be able to say. As bearing on its application to country districts; it is understood that in the County of Tipperary, and in some other districts, public-houses are now closed altogether on Sunday. But this desirable effect has been accomplished, not through legal enactment but voluntarily, and is therefore likely to be durable as resting upon the concurrence of the people and the conviction of the publicans themselves of its advisability and propriety. It is, however, doubtful whether, if this Bill were passed, this concurrence and conviction would be found in the Dublin Metropolitan Police District. From what has been urged it will be inferred that the Commissioners are in favour of the voluntary system, under present circumstances; and they are so, as will be apparent from what has been advanced; and because their experience does not enable them to say that the subject is sufficiently ripe for such legislation as the Bill contemplates, or, in other words, that the classes who support public-houses, are convinced of the necessity of the proposed restrictions. What course then would be advisable to follow? The Commissioners would suggest that the object in view should be accomplished in a more gradual way through the medium of the municipal council, who, as the direct representatives of all classes of citizens, could move more effectually in the matter, and, through them, public opinion could be matured and brought to bear upon the question. The Bill then might invest the borough council with power to move the Lord Lieutenant in Council to sanction such limitation of the hours of Sunday trading as they might suggest, or total closing on that day. Brought about in this way, his Excellency's sanction would appear in the light of a recognition of the popular voice, and of giving force and validity to the views of the citizens generally. In the rural portions of the police district the same course might be adopted by the town commissioners, or grand jury, where the former do not exist. The Commissioners are fully alive to the importance of the subject. No country has suffered more from its drinking habits. The public-house has always, unfortunately, been immediately or indirectly identified with crime, whether political or agrarian. It has also been invariably the favourite rendezvous of all organizations, legitimate or otherwise; but, at the same time, the true remedy, the Commissioners submit, is to be found, not so much in repressive legislation, as in the moral conviction of the masses, of the evil and of the disastrous consequences which flow from it. Voluntary philanthropic efforts can best accomplish this. It is right to mention, in a candid examination of the subject, that the fair trader, the licensed publican, has been at a disadvantage. His legitimate business, which the law fully recognises, has been unduly trenched upon by the unscrupulous beer-house dealer and spirit grocer, who have been brought into existence for revenue purposes without reference to other consequences. The amendment of the law with respect to the two latter, referred to in the former part of this report, will remove this disadvantage, and the question of restricting Sunday business by the regular vintner will then be deprived of some of the difficulties which now beset it. Indeed, any alteration of the law, so far as Dublin is concerned, in the direction indicated by the Bill, pending the correction of the abuses now peculiar to beer-houses, &c., would be premature, and would, as already pointed out, fail, in the opinion of the Commissioners, at present to effect the commendable object which prompted the measure. There is another way in which the subject might be approached, and that is by the issue of a special license by the Inland Revenue, providing for the omission of Sunday, and limiting trading to week-days only. The license, of course, should be at a reduced rate. Many publicans, when the competition of beer-houses ceases, would probably avail themselves of it. It would prepare the way for more restrictive legislation subsequently." There are 73 public-houses that do not open on Sunday now.

2424. It is mentioned in that report that the question of the revenue would have to be considered, and that if public-houses were closed upon Sunday, as the value of their licence would be thereby diminished, they would probably seek, with some amount of justice, as appears to be inferred, a reduction in the rate of licence; can you say what is the price of a publican's licence at present?—I think it varies according to the value of the house; it is so much on the value of the house.

2425. About what is it?—I should say on the average somewhere about 10 guineas. The amount varies from 2*l.* 4*s.* 1*d.* under 10*l.* value, to 11*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* on 50*l.* value or upwards.

2426. It has been mentioned by the president of the Licensed Vintner's Society, that publicans pay enormous sums for the goodwill of a house which has a license, and that is part of the capital they have invested. If a man has invested 10*l.* for his license, and 50*l.* or 100*l.* for his house, surely the fact of shutting him upon one day out of seven would have a very small effect upon the value of his licence?—He would have so far a claim; he would have more than a seventh of his business reduced, Sunday being the best day for business in the week. £. 500 is sometimes paid for a licensed house.

2427. But is there any ground for thinking that it would be no longer worth his while to pay for a license?—It would not make very much difference to the value of the license.

2428. I think then we may consider that that would not be an important consideration?—No doubt; but, in considering the subject, the question of revenue forms an element, and there are several publicans in the police district, whose chief business is done on Sunday. This will be apparent from the fact that there are in the suburban parts of it 57 public houses frequented by persons from the City on Sundays, and deriving their chief support therefore from Sunday business.

2429. The objections of the Commissioners, as I understand them, to the Bill, which we are reporting on, are, in the first place, that the clause allowing the sale of drinks in eating-houses and confectioners, would lead to immense abuses, in fact, it would merely substitute eating-houses for public-houses; am I right in that?—Yes.

2430. And their second objection to the form of the Bill is, that the restriction with reference to consumption on the premises would lead to similar abuses?—Yes, it is.

2431. Am I right in concluding that those two objections are, so to speak, to the form of the Bill, and not to the principle of increased restriction on the sale of drinks altogether on Sunday, and, in fact, that those two objections might be removed by changes in the form of the Bill?—I consider that there would be no objection to a Bill of that kind, if there were reasonable grounds to conclude that it might be carried out.

2432. You are of opinion that there is no objection to the Bill, as regards diminishing the facilities for drink, if it could be reasonably expected

J. L.
O'Ferrall,
Esq.
5 May 1868.

pected to be carried out?—If it did not increase illicit drinking; but that always produces more disorder and more crime than the drinking in public-houses.

2433. These two objections could be got rid of by a change in the Bill, could they not?—Yes; but the effect would be to make the law much more penal; and there is a great difficulty in enforcing a penal law, not only as regards the persons who are subjected to it, but on the part of the magistrates who have to enforce it.

2434. The last objection which I think you mentioned in that report is, that under the proposed change, there would be a great deal of illicit drinking amongst the spirit grocers and other houses on the Sunday?—That is, that spirit grocers and beer dealers should be reformed before anything is done with reference to the time of closing the public-houses.

2435. As far as the purposes of this Bill are concerned, which has merely reference to the sale of drinks on the Sunday, could not that objection be met by a clause simply extending the provisions of the Bill to all sales of drinks on Sunday; such a clause would put beer-houses, and licensed grocers, and every other person who deals in intoxicating drinks, so far as regards the Sunday, upon exactly the same footing as the publicans?—No; because the spirit grocers and beer dealers sell contrary to the law, and in violation of the law, because, though they have the right to sell, they have only the right to sell a certain quantity, and that not to be consumed on the premises; and they frequently sell in violation of the law, to be consumed on the premises, while their houses are closed, and the police have no authority to enter and so to convict them. The more you increase the difficulty of getting liquor in proper places, the more people you throw into their houses.

2436. That is into their shut-up house?—Yes, into their shut-up houses; the only time the police get in is when the door opens; they then walk in, and if they find any consumption going on, then they have a case.

2437. But as far as consumption in the houses of licensed grocers is concerned, there would be no difficulty in putting them on the same footing as the licensed vintners?—No; for then if they violated the law conviction would follow.

2438. But at present there is a difficulty in proving a violation of the law in their case, because the police cannot enter their houses?—Under the Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 64, the police can enter, "at any time or hour," at which the house is kept open for sale. But when drinking is going on inside, while the house is shut, this creates a difficulty, because they are not retailers for consumption on the premises, and therefore are free from the law which the vintner is subject to.

2439. And the same observation applies to the sale of drinks upon unlicensed premises; it has been stated that the milk-shops sell intoxicating liquors?—The police have the power of entering by taking a warrant. If a police-constable has reason to believe that spirits are sold without a license in any place, he may lay an information and take out a warrant.

2440. But can he get a warrant for entering the shop of a licensed grocer where he has reason to believe that spirits are sold at improper hours?—There is no limitation with reference to the hours of sale in the case of the spirit grocers, because liquor is not sold for consumption on the premises.

2441. Do you mean that the spirit-grocer may sell between eleven on Saturday night and two on Sunday?—He may sell at all hours of the night.

2442. Is there no law against the licensed grocer selling spirits not for consumption on the premises between eleven on Saturday night and two on Sunday afternoon?—I think not.

2443. Is not there a common law against their selling at all on the Sunday?—I do not think it applies to provisions, or anything in the nature of provisions; that is, the Act of William the Third.

2444. Then, in point of fact, are the Committee to understand that there is nothing to prevent a licensed grocer keeping his shop open the whole of Saturday night and Sunday morning?—He can keep the shop open, but to consume the liquor he must take it into a private room.

2445. But he may keep his shop open for the sale of spirits, and any man may buy that spirits and take it into the street and drink it?—But he must sell a certain quantity.

2446. What quantity?—A very small quantity if it is not consumed on the premises.

2447. Does that take place in fact in Dublin now?—Very largely; the whole of the illicit drinking in Dublin is in beer-houses and at spirit grocers as they are called; it is not every grocer who has a license of that kind.

2448. Mr. Murphy.] I believe by the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 38, s. 3, the grocers are not entitled to sell less than one pint, and not to be consumed on the premises, but there is no limitation with reference to the hour of opening or closing?—But the provisions have been altered. I think under the 8 & 9 Vict., they can sell a less quantity; the quantity has been reduced, any quantity of spirits may be sold, even a glass.

2449. Chairman.] With regard to beer-houses, what does their license empower them to do?—Their license empowers them to sell a certain quantity of beer not to be consumed on the premises; there are two beer licenses; there is the wholesale beer license and a retail beer license. Here is the paragraph in this report, with regard to spirit grocers, which we have been just discussing.

2450. Will you be kind enough to read it?—"With respect to the retail sale of spirits, &c., under a wholesale license the Commissioners are of opinion that the following amendments would be desirable as providing checks that would tend materially to restrict infraction of the license by confining the business within the legitimate bounds which it prescribes. As detailed in the report of the Commissioners of the 13th ultimo, the houses referred to are of two classes, namely, spirit grocers and beer dealers; spirit grocers are regulated by the Act 8 & 9 Vict., c. 64. This Act should be amended by providing, first, that the hours during which spirit grocers should keep open for business should be the same as those during which houses licensed for the retail of liquors." "Public-houses may now, by law, keep open, and should be liable to the same penalties for being open during prohibited hours." That would be alone the first important step. "Secondly, that any spirit grocer allowing consumption on his premises, delaying to admit or harbouring tipplers, should be liable to a fine not exceeding 5 l. and forfeiture of license. For these offences the penalty is now under the

J. L.
O'Ferrall,
Esq.

Act mentioned, not exceeding 2*l*., and forfeiture of license." Every time they are convicted they lose their license, but they can only be fined 2*l*.; the magistrate, however, generally cautions for the first offence, and the fine is 10*s*. for the second. I doubt whether he ever gets up to the 2*l*. Thirdly, that any spirit grocer convicted of any of these offences should not be eligible to obtain a new license for twelve months after forfeiture; Fourthly, that a license to carry on the trade of a spirit grocer in any house or premises under the yearly value of 30*l*. should only be issued by the inland revenue upon the production of a certificate from the superintendent of police of the district, of good character of the applicant and suitability of the premises, and before annual renewal a certificate also, as in the case of the vintners, of the good conduct of the house during the preceeding year; the object of fixing upon 30*l*. is to draw a distinction between the respectable traders, such as the Messrs. Kinahan, Andrews, and others, and those who violate the conditions of their license. The same class of license is common to all members of the trade. Fifthly, that the transfer of a spirit grocer's license should only be made by the Inland Revenue upon the production of a certificate from the superintendent of police of the district that no offences for hearing or penalties inflicted were then pending. The Beer Dealers' Act is the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 35. As the Act stands, it will be perceived that sections 3, 4 and 5, provide for not granting licenses or renewals of licenses without certificate of justice; that persons applying for certificate should give notice to the police, and that the police might object to the issue of certificate. But unfortunately while the Act was passing through the House, section 14 was added, providing that the production of the certificate should not be necessary before obtaining a license, in the case, among others, of the wholesale beer dealers, and as the Act of 26 & 27 Vict. c. 33, still more unfortunately prescribes as of right the grant of a retail beer license to the holder of a wholesale license, the sections above referred to, as must be apparent, became null and void, and the most important of all checks, namely, the certificate, fell to the ground. The amendment of the Act in this respect is all that is now required with one other provision, namely, that one conviction for delaying to admit, harbouring tipplers, or consumption on the premises, should cancel not merely the wholesale or the retail license, but both where the two are held together."

2451. Then, in point of fact, a beer-house may be kept open day and night also?—Beer-houses are subject to the same hours as vintners.

2452. Then, in fact, the difficulty is this: that though you may prohibit the selling of spirits equally in grocers' shops and in public-houses, your objection is, that there is no power of enforcing the prohibition against the grocers?—Yes.

2453. Does that at present apply to the hour at which the others are obliged to be closed from 11 on Saturday night till 2 on Sunday?—The consumption on the premises applies to all hours.

2454. They may sell a small quantity of liquor?—Yes, they may.

2455. And a man may take it into the street and drink it?—Yes.

2456. It has been stated that there is a great deal of drinking, and a great deal of drunkenness on Sunday morning in Dublin during the hours when the sale is prohibited in public-houses?—That is so.

2457. Can you, from your connection with the police, state from what houses that arises?—From beer dealers and spirit grocers.

2458. Which should you say chiefly?—I should say the spirit grocers; they sell the most spirits.

2459. And are not liable to a penalty for selling it, apparently?—No, they are not liable to a penalty for selling it, but only for allowing it to be consumed on the premises.

2460. In fact the police are at this moment powerless to prevent this drinking during those hours?—They are, to a great extent, from the difficulty they experience in proving sale; that is, that they had seen payment of the money for the drink consumed on the premises.

2461. Am I right in presuming that the very strength of that objection to the present Bill, in the report is that you are powerless to prevent improper drinking from 11 on Saturday evening till the afternoon on Sunday, if the closing was extended to any other hours on the Sunday there would be just so many more hours in which you would be as powerless to prevent illicit drinking, as you are at present?—No, the more you curtail the legal hours of drinking, that is to say, the hours in which the public-houses may be opened, the greater desire there would be for drinking, and therefore the more those houses which will supply it, will be frequented.

2462. That will hold good of the converse, will it not, that the more you diminish the hours during which the drink is to be had, the more you will diminish the illicit drinking?—No, because drinking is carried on very largely in beer-houses, while the licensed public-houses are closed, and to a great extent that is understood to be the case on Sunday morning.

2463. Therefore the objection is simply that the rest of the day that was closed would be as bad as the Sunday morning, and not worse?—A great number of people now will wait until the public-house is open before they will go anywhere to drink, because it is only disreputable people who frequent those beer dealers and spirit grocers at a late hour at night and early in the morning; but if the public-houses were closed all day many people who have been in the habit of drinking at a proper hour would go to the spirit grocer, or the beer shop.

2464. Does the experience of the police confirm the opinion that the greatest amount of drunkenness occurs at a late hour of the evening, that is to say, between 9 and 11 o'clock, on Saturday and Sunday evenings?—I would not like to give an answer to that question, without consideration, but I could send you returns to show you what the fact was with reference to that; we could easily show that, because when a man is arrested the hour at which he is arrested is put down in the charge sheet. See Return (C.) in Appendix.

2465. It has been given as a strong reason for limiting the hour for the sale of drink upon Sunday evening, that no perceptible inconvenience would be felt by the better classes of the working classes, if the hours for the sale of drink were considerably curtailed on Sunday evening, whilst at the same time it would considerably tend to diminish drunkenness?—I would have no objection to the hour being restored to what it was within the last few years, namely, 9 o'clock.

2466. Would

J. L.
O'Ferrall,
Esq.

5 May 1868.

2466. Would you go further and say, you think it desirable that it should be changed till 9 o'clock, instead of being 11, as at present?—I would not express any opinion upon that, because I do not know how far it might tend to increase the profits of the spirit grocers; I would certainly say it would be undesirable to do so, until those two licenses were placed under better control than they are at present. We understand that no increase in drunkenness took place after those two additional hours had been granted; in fact the number of cases were less. It has been said, and with some appearance of truth, that on Sunday evening a large number of excursionists arrive in Dublin about 10 o'clock, and that those people would be subject to very great inconvenience if public-houses were closed.

2467. What class of excursionists would they be?—What we understand by the respectable lower classes, who go to the country on Sundays.

2468. Do they take their families with them?—Very many of them do, and very many do not. And then the question arises with reference to what constitutes a traveller. Of course, as the law at present stands, a traveller may be entertained in a public-house at any hour; he has the right by law to be entertained at any hour; and the question arises, whether a citizen of Dublin, going to the country in the morning and coming back in the evening, is to be looked upon as a traveller.

2469. I believe there has been a decision upon that point, has there not?—I am not able to say; but I understand that a great difference of opinion exists with reference to what constitutes a traveller; some people holding that it is necessary to go a certain distance. If the public-houses were closed, and the persons going from Dublin in the morning and returning from the country in the evening were entitled to go into public-houses after the legal hour, then any person wishing to get drink might go into a public-house and claim to be a traveller after that hour.

2470. You stated, I believe, that if that privilege rested with the excursionist as a traveller, everyone who wanted drink would be a traveller; would not that apply after 11 as well as after 10 o'clock?—I think that after 11 o'clock very few people drink, comparatively speaking, except at an odd time in the beer-houses.

2471. That is to say, very few people drink after 11 o'clock because the public-houses are closed; but would not very few drink then if they were closed at 10?—No; we think that that hour makes all the difference, and that they would try to get drink at spirit grocers.

2472. Is the difference an important one?—Yes; because 11 o'clock is the hour fixed by the law.

2473. But supposing that the hour was not 11 o'clock, your argument would fail. Your argument is, because that is the hour fixed by law, they would continue to get drink up to that time?—If a person cannot get drink at a public-house, and is disposed to get drink, he will get it elsewhere, and then he may get drunk.

2474. Am I right in inferring that all the opinions expressed in the report you have read refer to the existing state of the licensing law?—Yes.

2475. And that therefore we may assume that all those opinions might be subject to modification if the licensing law was changed?—Yes.

2476. And even the opinions with regard to clauses prohibiting consumption on the premises, and those respecting eating-houses and confectioners, might be changed if the law relating to licenses was changed?—I think it would be impossible to answer that question, because until this change had been in operation sometime it would be very hard to give an opinion by which I could be bound.

2477. My question was, would it not be possible that all their opinions might be changed, seeing that they turn upon that great point with regard to licensing, not that they would be changed?—I could not answer that question with certainty.

2478. The Commissioners have made the suggestion that whatever changes were desirable in this direction might be made with advantage in Dublin, through the Municipal Corporation memorialising the Lord Lieutenant, and the Lord Lieutenant having power to enforce such changes?—That was merely to let the change come from the public, as it were, and not from authority, when it is often better received.

2479. Would not that, which is almost a fatal objection in the opinion of the Commissioners, namely, the difficulty with regard to the licensing system, render even a permissive law objectionable if the law was so changed by the Lord Lieutenant of the country, at the request of the Municipal Council, without effecting this change in the licensing system?—Yes, it would be unsatisfactory until the licenses were altered.

2480. Can you inform the Committee at all how long this question of the anomalous condition of the licensing system in Dublin, and in Ireland generally, has been under the attention of different Governments?—Both the Acts that now exist are recent.

2481. One of them is eight years old?—Yes; it takes a certain number of years before you know the working of an Act.

2482. And you have now clearly ascertained that the working of it is bad?—Yes, we have ascertained that the condition of the licensing system is certainly so.

2483. Have the Government, as far as you know, taken any steps to amend the condition of the licensing laws in Ireland?—I do not know; it is years since this was submitted to the Government.

2484. Then if it is desirable further to limit the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday, is it not a poor answer to be told that that must wait for a change in the licensing system, which is entirely another question, and one which has been for years under the consideration of successive Governments, who have done nothing towards remedying it; that great public advantage is to be postponed indefinitely until that is done?—I do not know whether the Government have ever considered the desirability of altering the system of licensing; and it is the point whether it is not desirable that under existing circumstances certain previous circumstances should affect the question.

2485. My point was, whether it was desirable in itself that this legislation should be suspended, because certain changes in the law which are desirable are not likely to be made?—No; because the measure will not produce its desired effects until those changes take place.

2486. Supposing it is desirable further to limit the hours for the sale of intoxicating drinks on the Sunday, and that such a Bill was passed, and the

J. L.
O'Ferrall,
Esq.

5 May 1868.

the result of that Act proved that such limitation was desirable, but that it failed of producing the good effect which was anticipated, in consequence of defects in the licensing laws, do you not think that that would probably have strong effect in leading to a change in the licensing law?—Certainly, it would cause that change immediately. I can see no reason why the change has not taken place now or did not take place last Session.

2487. Then if we passed this Act, or some Act like this, we may probably be told that our doing so, has had the very desirable result of producing an amelioration in the licensing system in Ireland?—Certainly, but you would increase the evil; you would do evil that good might come from it; you would increase the evil which has been done under those two uncorrected Acts this year in order that they might be corrected next year.

2488. That is to say, we should put the evil in a clearer light, in order that it might be more clearly seen?—You would increase the extent of it.

2489. You would put the evil in a clearer light, and probably cause its entire reformation?—It might be so.

2490. Are you able to give any opinion as to the licensing system in Ireland; supposing the licensing system were put upon a good footing in Ireland, would any further restrictions with regard to the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday be desirable, or not?—I cannot give any opinion as to whether they would be desirable, but I should think that there could be no objection to re-establishing the old Act of William the 4th, which limited the hour to nine o'clock on Sunday, and that would be a diminution of two hours on that day and two hours on Monday morning. It worked very well for many years, but it was changed in the interest of the trade. We did not object to it at the time. The Wine Licenses Act, passed in 1860, which extended the time to eleven on Sunday night, and from seven on Monday morning, to public-houses, allowing consumption of wine on the premises where sold under this special Act to that hour (eleven) on Sunday night, and from seven on Monday morning.

2491. Do you think it would be possible to put the licensing system in Ireland on a satisfactory footing?—It ought to be; there is nothing impossible in it if you have time to set about it.

2492. Have you sufficiently considered the question to be able to say in what respect you think the licensing system in regard to Dublin ought to be regulated, so as to do away with the evils you have pointed out?—The question of keeping up the revenue arises, and the question of revenue has been at the bottom of all the present evils, because those evils did not exist some years ago, but they have increased greatly, owing, I think, to a desire to increase the revenue. I doubt very much whether a satisfactory regulation could be carried out without a considerable sacrifice to the revenue. If the beer dealer carried out his business legitimately, many persons would prefer dealing with the beer dealer to going to public-houses; that is, if he did not consume on his premises, or keep a disorderly house.

2493. Do you think it would be possible to give the police the same power with regard to all houses where intoxicating drinks are sold?—I think there would be a very great objection on the part of the spirit grocers: I may say that the wealthiest grocer in Dublin sells spirits; he is a man whose business is probably worth many thousands a year, and he would think it very hard that the police should be entitled to visit his house at any hour without any pretext except that he chose to suspect something wrong.

2494. How would you propose to remedy the evils you have pointed out without such change in the law with regard to the present abuses?—By giving the police the power to object to the certificate which should be made necessary, and which power they have now in the case of the publican, limiting, as stated in the report, the certificate to houses of the yearly value under 30*l*.

2495. In fact, your proposal would be that in order to get what I think is called an excise license, whether a spirit grocer's license or a beer dealer's license, a man should be required to bring a certificate from the magistrate?—Yes; the magistrate seeks his information from the police.

2496. And you would suggest that the man should not get his license without such a certificate?—Yes, exactly; and in the event of the license being cancelled, it should not be renewed for 12 or 6 months, or whatever time was thought desirable.

2497. And would you also propose that the same restriction as to hours should apply to all persons selling intoxicating drinks under those various licenses?—Beer dealers and those having wine licences are at present limited to the publicans' hours.

2498. Mr. Murphy.] I think I understand you as stating that since the Act of 1860, which extended the hour to 11 o'clock on Sunday night, there were rather less cases of drunkenness than there were; I think you stated that drunkenness had not increased?—Yes; we shall be able to give by Thursday the numbers preceding 1860 and 1861, which will show that they have rather decreased after the Act had been passed. In 1859, the year before the Act was passed, the total number of cases of drunkenness was 10,330; in 1860, the year in which the Act passed, the total number was 9,787; and in 1861 the total number was 9,203.

2499. The increase of the hour did not create an increase in drunkenness?—Not immediately after the Act.

2500. Are you prepared to state what the effect of it has been up to the last year?—The returns will show that. We can give you any returns if you will only give us notice. Vide returns marked A and B.

2501. You are clearly of opinion that this Bill which is under the consideration, the purport of which, I believe, you are aware of, would probably be totally inoperative, so far as producing any appreciable result went, in preventing drunkenness, unless a similar course were taken, if possible, with other places where drink is sold, with respect to the limitation of their hours?—Our opinion was, that a Bill of this kind would increase the illegitimate business of the trade while it would diminish the legitimate trade.

2502. If any Bill was to be passed restricting the hours of sale on Sundays beyond what they are at present, in your opinion, would it be advisable not to allow drink to be consumed on the premises where bought, or would it be better to allow the consumption to take place where the spirits were sold?—The opinion of the police is, that that if they were limited to sale only, the Bill would to all intents and purposes be inoperative.

2503. I think you also give it to be your opinion that this Act would not be desirable, under existing circumstances?—No, in reference to these points.

2504. And that the effect of it would be to do evil that good might possibly come of it; it is scarcely necessary to ask you whether you consider that a proper principle of legislation?—No; I might add to that, that this defect in licensing might be corrected this very Session, and that if this Bill passed this Session, at the same time these two licenses which we consider productive of evil might be corrected, and all might go on together.

2505. Major Gavin.] Are you of opinion that the total closing of public-houses on Sunday would be desirable?—No; a day may come when it may be done, but I do not think at the present moment, or speaking for the present generation, that it could be done.

2506. Do you think that the closing of public-houses earlier on Saturday night would be beneficial?—It would certainly be beneficial in one way; it would prevent a great deal of drunkenness, and prevent a great deal of disorder in families, two evils which would arise; but whether the evils that would arise on the other side might not be equally great, I do not know.

2507. We have had evidence before us that some of the traders in Dublin do not pay their workmen at night until eight or nine o'clock; do you know if that is so?—It is said so. I have no personal knowledge of the fact.

2508. Are you, from your experience, of opinion that if it was made the law to close the public-houses at nine o'clock on Saturday night, would you say that that would be objected to?—I do not think it would. Under the present state of the other existing laws, I think that drunkenness would be probably greater; in those wholesale houses of course the drinking would be greater. The illicit trade would be greater, and the legitimate trade would be less.

2509. You fear that there would be barbers' shops and shebeen houses established?—The beer dealers can do any amount of business now.

2510. But supposing we closed every house now at nine o'clock for the sale of liquor, is it your opinion that it would encourage shebeen-houses?—Yes.

2511. It was stated here by a reverend gentleman that, though, as the law stands at present, it directs that the public-houses shall be closed up to 2 o'clock on Sundays, yet he says there is more drinking during the time that they are supposed to be closed than at any other time?—I do not think that is practicable; it is said in some districts that there is more drinking at that hour, but I do not think it is the fact; (vide Return marked C.) it is mostly in spirit grocers' shops and beer-houses; it is not in public-houses, or in places where anybody has authority to enter, and where the police can catch them; but they take care to look out and see if there is any policeman there, and, generally speaking, in that way there is no means of proving the offence.

2512. It was stated that it did occur in public-houses where they often had two doors, so that when the police were watching at one door they went out at the other?—In some public-houses that has occurred, and they were summoned, and the keepers were convicted, but, at the same time, the magistrate will not inflict more than one penalty in each case, and for three convictions they forfeit their license.

2513. Your opinion is that drinking does not take place to such an extent as that?—I think it does in spirit dealers' and beer-houses; I think there is drinking there going on to a very great extent now. I would suggest that the penalty for drunkenness on Sunday should be increased from 5s., as at present, under 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 38, to 10s.

C. Field,
Esq.
1868.

2514. Chairman.] You are well acquainted, I think, with the legislation respecting the sale of liquors in the State of New York?—I cannot say that I am well acquainted with it; I have been so much occupied that I cannot say that I have paid much attention to the subject; but I have resided there 30 years. At the present moment liquors are not allowed to be sold in the city of New York on the Sabbath at any time.

2515. Does that extend to the city only, or to the state?—To the city only, I think.

2516. How long has that been the case?—For two or three years, I think.

2517. And what was the state of the law before that?—I could not tell you the exact state of the law; but the people who had licenses to sell, sold at all times.

2518. Can you state how that change in the law has worked?—As I understand, we have had a very much less number of arrests by the police since that has been in force than we had before.

2519. Are you referring to arrests for drunkenness, or arrests of all sorts?—Arrests of all sorts.

2520. Are you aware whether it has led to any extensive evasion of the law?—It is said that a great many people cross the river, which is only about a mile in width, into New Jersey, and there spend the Sabbath, for the purpose of procuring drink.

2521. Has it led to any extensive evasion of the law in New York City?—Not that I know of; but I would suggest, if there is time to do so, that the Committee should send to New York, to the British Consul. The reports are published in full, of the results of the law, by the Police Commissioners, who have the management of it. It has been canvassed, for and against, on both sides, and you could have an exact statement of its results. It produced a great deal of excitement at one time, as the Irish population, and the Germans, to a great extent, were against it.

2522. Is there a great Irish population in New York?—Yes, there is.

2523. Do you know how large?—I cannot give the number.

2524. Do you think the Irish were opposed to it?—I think the Irish and Germans were, especially the lower classes.

2525. Mr. Monsell.] Still, notwithstanding the opposition, as I understand you to say, the effect of the law has been salutary?—Yes, it has been so.

2526. Lord Claud Hamilton.] Those restrictions were imposed by the principal authorities of New York, were they not?—No, by the State.

2527. Then, I presume, they applied to the whole of the New York State?—No; there was a special law made for what is called the metropolitan district, which includes the city of New York.

2528. And before this restriction, was there no limitation of the hours for the sale of liquors on the Sabbath?—None at all, that I am aware of.

2529. Since that law has been in operation, you say it has diminished very much the work of the police, as is shown by the number of cases reported, have there been attempts made to alter that law, or has it been adopted without opposition?—There have been great legal efforts to get a change made, and it has been contested very strongly in our courts. It has been stated that it was not constitutional, but it has been sustained by the highest courts.

2530. Should you say that the public opinion against it is as strong now as when it was first proposed?—I have no doubt that, if you put it to the vote in New York, the result would be against the law, because we have such a great majority of foreigners always coming in, but the native-born citizens are decidedly in favour of the law.

2531. I think I understand you to state, that the statistics of the police would show a most marked diminution of crime, and acts of violence, and drunkenness, since the restrictions have been imposed?—That is what I have been informed of, but my attention has never been called to it closely.

2532. Mr. Murphy.] Have you really formed any opinion at all, as to whether the habits of the people, in consequence of this law, have been changed, or whether it has had any effect in stopping excess of drinking, as drinking, whether there is less drunk in New York now than there was?—Decidedly, in a marked degree.

2533. How do you arrive at that conclusion?—Because they cannot get drink, it is not for sale, and they have to go out of the metropolitan district to get it; either they cross the river into the other state, or they go out of the town.

534. There is a great facility for crossing the river, is there not?—Just so; you can cross for a few pence; it is about a mile across the river.

535. And any people who want to get drinks on the Sunday, go there and get it, as a matter of course?—They go there, or they go elsewhere out of the metropolitan district.

536. And those people who are resident in Brooklyn and in New York proper, go to New Jersey to get drink?—Yes, they do.

537. Do you think that if those parties who go to New Jersey to get drink, had not the present facilities of going to New Jersey, public houses would be opened to supply the wants of those who required drink?—I think the police would stop any such houses at once.

538. Is the police force so large as to be able to do that?—The police are a very large and efficient body; they are appointed by the State, and that they are independent of the voters of New York.

539. Supposing that there was not sufficient superintendence to prevent illicit drinking, what would be the case then; I am speaking merely in respect to secret drinking?—We have a party in New York which sees that this law is enforced, and which works with the police; and they find a place opened on Sundays, they go and make a complaint to the authorities, and have it shut up.

540. Major Gavin.] Has your attention ever been called to the drinking on a Saturday night; suppose that people are paid their wages in America on Saturday, in the same way that they are paid here?—A great many of the large establishments have adopted the plan of paying on Monday morning. They say, if they pay on Saturday, the men are tempted to spend a great deal of their money on Saturday night; and so they adopt the principle of paying on the Monday.

541. Is that found to be preventive of drinking on the Saturday night?—I have heard some establishments say that it was very beneficial, and that it was a great improvement to pay them on the Monday.

542. And there has not been any great increase of drinking in New York on Saturday nights any more than on any other nights?—I think there is more on Saturday night than on any other night, because the plan of paying workpeople on the Monday morning is not, as a general rule, adopted, although it has been adopted by many; but I think you will find that there is more drinking on Saturdays than on other days; the shops are kept open later, and people are out later.

The Very Rev. Dr. FITZGERALD, called in; and Examined.

2559. Chairman.] WHAT position do you fill in Limerick?—I am Administrator of the parish of St. John's, Limerick.

2560. Do you know what the population of the parish of St. John's, Limerick, is?—I should say about 10,000.

2561. It comprises a very large part of the town of Limerick, does it not?—Yes, it does.

2562. You have considered, I believe, very much this question of closing public-houses on Sundays?—Yes, I have.

2563. Or rather, I should say, stopping the 2543. And it is your opinion that the closing of public-houses early on the Saturday would be a great means of checking drunkenness on the Saturday night and on the following day?—The public-houses are not closed till midnight on Saturday; they are all closed at 12 o'clock on Saturdays and Sundays.

2544. But still there is more drinking on Saturday than on other nights?—Yes, it is a sort of holiday with us; a great many of the establishments stop work at 12, and some at two o'clock.

2545. And you find no difficulty at all in carrying out the law in New York on Sunday?—None at all.

2546. Do the people generally aid in carrying it out?—Some people do, and some do not. A great deal of money has been spent in our courts to get a decision from the courts that the law is unconstitutional.

2547. I suppose each public-house has a license, has it not?—Yes.

2548. And are there such things as illicit houses; that is to say, houses selling liquors without a license?—The police keep a close watch to prevent such houses being opened.

2549. Such a thing does occur sometimes as an illicit sale of liquors?—No doubt; it is just the same as stealing; you cannot always prevent a breach of the law.

2550. Mr. Murphy.] Are there any other houses in New York besides what we call public-houses which are houses whose trade is confined exclusively to the sale of liquors; are there such persons as spirit grocers, who have a license to sell spirits?—There are many grocers who sell spirits, wine, and beer.

2551. Have those grocers a license to sell wine and beer?—I think no one can sell wine without a license.

2552. Have they a license to sell spirits as well as beer and wine?—Yes, they have.

2553. Are they obliged to be closed on Sundays?—They are all closed on Sundays except the hotels.

2554. The law extends to them just as it does to ordinary public-houses, which sell nothing but spirits?—Exactly.

2555. Mr. Pim.] Is there any restriction on week days with reference to the hours of closing the public-houses?—No, not that I know of.

2556. The public-houses might be kept open the whole night, then?—Certainly.

2557. And you state that it is the habit to close the public-houses at 12 o'clock on Saturday night?—It is the law to do so.

2558. Previously to that law, would they keep them open to any hour?—They would keep them open as long as there was anybody to take the drink.

sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday?—Yes; I have considered that question.

2564. What is your opinion about that?—My opinion is, that it would be a great advantage to close the public-houses on Sundays.

2565. Altogether?—Yes, altogether; I think that most of the offences of our people, whether against order, or morality, or religion, and whether those offences are punishable by the civil law or not, are traceable, more or less, to the vice of intemperance.

2566. Can you say whether there is more drinking

The Very
Rev. Dr.
Fitzgerald.

12 May 1868.

drinking on Sundays than on other days in the week?—I am sure there is.

2567. Would you inform the Committee with regard to the opinion of the people at Limerick on the matter, what in your belief would be the judgment of the majority of the inhabitants?—The subject has not been brought in any prominent way before the public, and therefore I cannot say that there is any strong active public opinion on the merits of the question; but I believe that, if the matter were referred to the citizens, a decided majority of the inhabitants, of the ratepayers, and of the burgesses, would be in favour of Sunday closing.

2568. I do not know whether there have been any petitions from Limerick on one side or the other, in reference to this matter?—There were no petitions from Limerick on one side or the other.

2569. There is one class of people whose attention must have been called to it by their brethren in the trade, namely, the publicans themselves?—The subject has been a good deal before the publicans themselves, and I have spoken myself to nearly all the publicans in St. John's parish, but not much to those in the other parishes of the city.

2570. Mr. Monsell.] How many publicans are there in your parish?—I think about 50, and these might be divided into three classes; one class completely in favour of Sunday closing, just as I am myself.

2571. Chairman.] What proportion would those bear to the whole class of publicans?—I have not made any close calculation, but I think one-third of them would be in favour of Sunday closing. Many of the trade in my parish, and throughout the city, are people who would be willing to sacrifice their Sunday profits in the interests of religion and morality. Then there is a second class who really would have a conscientious difficulty in opposing the law, but who would not feel themselves bound to come forward and petition for the law. If you add these classes together you will have three-fourths of the publicans in my parish who would either desire that law, or who would accept the law willingly.

2572. And there would remain a small number that you have not mentioned, who, I presume, would be opposed to it?—A very small number; I think the number in my parish who would actually petition against the Bill would be very small indeed; I should be surprised if there was any petition at all from Limerick against the Sunday closing.

2573. Are you aware whether members of the trade of publicans in other towns have been anxious to get up petitions against the Bill?—I am not aware of any agitation, either for or against the Bill.

2574. Are you quite certain of one thing, that there has been no agitation against it on the part of the publicans in Limerick?—I am quite certain that there has been no successful agitation against it.

2575. With regard to the labouring classes in Limerick, have you spoken to them on the subject of Sunday drinking, or are you in a position to state what the opinion of any large proportion of them is upon the subject?—I cannot say that I have consulted them on the subject, but I can form a fair idea of their opinions from my general knowledge of their character and dispositions. I think that the majority of the labouring classes would, if consulted in their rational mood, and in their normal state, decide in favour of a measure which was sure to remove the occasion of many evils to themselves and their families. If, instead of consulting individuals, you take the opinion of families, and in a question affecting the interest of all alike this would be only fair, I am sure that there would not be a second opinion on the subject; all would be in favour of the Sunday closing.

2576. Am I right in understanding that, in your opinion, the majority of the heads of families—the men, if consulted calmly on the subject, would be in favour of closing?—I think if you called a public meeting of citizens generally, or of any particular class of citizens, the decision would be in favour of the Sunday closing.

2577. With those views, would you be in favour of making the total closing on Sunday, or the degree of closing, permissive by Act of Parliament, to be put in force by the votes of the majority of the householders in the city of Limerick?—I would be in favour of a Permissive Bill; but as to the mode of taking the opinion of the citizens, that is a question of detail on which I do not feel myself competent to make any suggestion to the Committee.

2578. Am I right in understanding you to state, that in taking the opinion of the citizens you would not think it necessary to take the opinion of the members of the families, but would be content to leave it to the opinion of the men of the community?—Yes, I would be content to leave the question to the men of the whole community, or to the men of any class of the community, or to any body, such as the corporation which is influenced by public opinion. By any of these courses you meet the objection that the law, however good, is not in harmony with public opinion.

2579. And you think that if the test could be applied in any one of these ways, public opinion in Limerick would be in favour of total closing?—That is my opinion.

2580. I want to take you through the different objections which are made to the Bill. In the first place, may I ask, would you consider it necessary that the restrictions should apply to all classes of houses in which intoxicating drinks were sold, as in public-houses, spirit grocers, beer-houses, and eating-houses where they sell drink, and confectioners, or any other shop which were licensed to sell drink?—Yes, certainly; to all houses where the abuses of which I complain would arise, that is, all houses where people would be tempted to spend the money which was necessary for the support of their families.

2581. Then, in the first instance, do you think that there is any considerable proportion in Limerick of the lower classes who are dependent on eating-houses for their meals on Sundays?—I think there are none, or, at least, very few; I think I may say that there are none.

2582. For instance, the class of clerks in mercantile establishments, and assistants in shops where do they generally get their meals?—They live with their families, or at their lodgings.

2583. And with their families, or at their lodgings, they get their meals?—Universally; I hardly know an exception to that rule; there may be exceptions, but I know of none.

2584. With regard to that class which exists largely elsewhere, namely, Sunday excursionists, is it the practice of the working classes, or those a little little above them in Limerick, to go out into the neighbourhood with their families to enjoy themselves in the summer?—We have that class, but not to a great extent; the excursionist season is short with us, and the number of those who avail themselves of it is comparatively small; and with regard to the tradesmen and labourers, I think that such of them as can afford this enjoyment to their families are just the members of their class who are least in the habit of frequenting public-houses on Sundays, and who, from their general habits of foresight and economy, would be most likely to make their arrangements beforehand; they are also the persons who are most keenly alive to the evils of the public-house, and who, therefore, would be only too glad to be free from the slight burden of a law which removed from the younger members of their families the occasion of so many evils and miseries. It cannot be denied that the law would entail some inconveniences, but the points to be considered are, what comparison do these partial inconveniences bear to the general good, and also what are the opinions of the classes who would be seriously affected by the law; I mean those whose profits or whose enjoyments would be necessarily lessened. Applying these tests, I give, myself, no doubt what would be the result in the city of Limerick; and as I am dealing with facts, I wish the Committee to understand at my evidence is to be applied solely to the community with which I am acquainted.

2585. Are you aware whether there is any considerable class of men in Limerick less amenable to good order than the others, either foreign sailors coming into the port, or stray workmen, who you think would, if deprived of the opportunity of drinking in public-houses, seek in some way of getting drink, either by unlicensed houses or by some other illegitimate means?—I think it is very difficult to reclaim an habitual drunkard, and I think any legislation would fail in that point, but I am dealing with the class, who drink not from habit or from malice prepense, but rather through human weakness, or from their naturally social dispositions; I think that such a law as is proposed, would have the most powerful effect upon that class, but with reference to habitual drunkards, they would find some way for the indulgence of their sinful propensities.

2586. Do you know whether there is any considerable amount of drinking which goes on during the prohibited hours on Sunday morning in Limerick?—I think there is after 11 o'clock on Saturday night; but this takes place at a time when public opinion cannot be brought to bear on the offenders.

2587. What are those hours?—From 11 o'clock at night till the morning the people are drinking at the public houses, and are allowed to remain there; if you have a complete Sunday closing, very often offences would be committed in the afternoon, and public opinion could be brought to bear upon the individual, and the grocers themselves could be brought to bear upon each other in regard to infractions of the law; that was stated to me by some of the grocers whom I consulted on the subject.

2588. What do you consider is the worst period for drinking on Sunday; is it the last hour in the evening?—Yes, I think so, the later the hour the greater the evil, because public opinion cannot be brought to bear upon the offender at that time.

2589. Would it be a considerable gain if public-houses were closed, say at eight or nine on Sunday evenings?—Decidedly; any curtailment, I think, would be a gain to the cause of morality, religion, and order, but I would be for complete closing, leaving the application of the Bill to some local body.

2590. Would you prefer leaving the application of the Bill entirely voluntary, that is, leaving the hours as at present, from two to eleven, but subject to any curtailment, or to total closing by the free action of some local body?—I would be for total closing, leaving the application of the law to some local body.

2591. Mr. Monseil.] It has been stated here by one of the witnesses, that the true remedy was to be found, not so much in the present legislation as in the moral conviction of the masses, of the evil and disastrous consequences which follow from drunkenness; do you consider that the course you suggested would be the best mode of giving effect to the general public opinion of the masses of the people, and that if there were to be no power placed in the hands of that majority, to control the vicious minority, the vicious minority would go on selling drink, and drunkenness continue?—Certainly.

2592. Therefore, however strong public opinion may be in the place on the part of the majority, a small minority, if uncontrolled by legislation, would have the power of defeating the object which the moral majority desired to effect?—Certainly, that was felt some time ago, when a movement in favour of voluntary closing was originated. The great body of the publicans were willing to join the movement, but it was felt that the minority, however small, could defeat any such movement, and therefore the project was abandoned.

2593. On the other hand, you would be entirely opposed to imposing any restrictions that were not supported by the public opinion of the locality in which they were introduced?—Yes; I think it is an evil to pass a law which will not be sustained by public opinion.

2594. Would you consider that if, for instance, the municipal body in Limerick were given the power to adopt a law enforcing the closing of public-houses, and they were to exercise that power, there would be any danger of the licensed public-houses being superseded on Sundays by a number of unlicensed and irresponsible drinking places?—I think that with increased activity on the part of the police, and also with a desire on the part of the trade to protect themselves, the evil could be met; and there would also be the force of public opinion.

2595. You mention, I think, that you had gone round amongst the publicans of your parish, and that you know tolerably well their opinion?—I did that two years ago.

2596. Supposing it were left to the publicans themselves to decide as to whether this law should be adopted, how do you think they would decide?—I am quite sure the majority of the publicans in my parish would, in the interest of religion and morality, make a sacrifice of their gain, and I have reason to think that the same feeling does prevail amongst publicans in the other part of the city, but this I know only through others.

2597. Are you aware whether there was any declaration upon the subject of closing public-houses on Sunday made by any number of the,

Roman

The Very
Rev. Dr.
Fitzgerald.

1868.

Roman Catholic Bishops in Ireland?—I am aware that there was.

2598. Will you be so good as to read that declaration?—"To Members of Parliament representing Irish Constituencies.—We, the undersigned Archbishops, Bishops, and Clergy of Ireland, most respectfully intimate to the Irish Members of the House of Commons, that we believe it would be highly conducive to public order, to morality, and to religion, if the Sunday traffic in intoxicating liquors were prohibited by law; we therefore entreat their support of Mr. Somes' motion on the 6th May next for effecting that object."

2599. Lord Claud Hamilton.] I think the signatures appended to that declaration are those of the leading Bishops of Ireland?—Yes, they are these:—"Paul Cullen, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin; Joseph Dixon, D.D., Archbishop of Armagh and Primate; D. O'Brien, D.D., Bishop of Waterford; M. O'Hea, D.D., Bishop of Ross; John Kilduff, D.D., Bishop of Ardagh; P. Durcan, D.D., Bishop of Aconry; Francis Kelly, D.D., Bishop of Derry; Hamilton Verschoyle, D.D., Bishop of Kilmore; L. Gillvoly, D.C., Bishop of Elphin; T. Furlong, D.D., Bishop of Ferns; John MacEvilly, D.D., Bishop of Galway; William Whelan, D.D., Bishop; William Meagher, V.G., P.P., of Dubin; B. Woodlock, Rector of the Catholic University of Ireland; James Canon Redmond, P.P., Arklow; James Murray, D.D., Secretary to the Archbishop of Dublin; A. O'Connell, D.D., P.P., of St. Mary's, Dublin; M. Quinn, D.D.; John Spratt, D.D., Provincial of Ireland."

2600. Mr. Murphy.] How many Roman Catholic Bishops are there in Ireland?—Twenty-eight.

2601. Mr. Pim.] You stated that you thought if the thing were left to the decision of the town council they would decide in favour of closing?—That is my opinion.

2602. I wished to ask you whether you thought that the municipal body would feel that the responsibility of the decision of such a large public question was too heavy for them, and would object to such a responsibility being thrown upon them?—I think they would not.

2603. Lord Claud Hamilton.] You have spoken with regard to public opinion, I should like to know your view with respect to the majority of female opinion. Do you not think that the majority of the mothers, wives, and sisters of the men in your parishes would be glad to see the temptation removed?—Almost universally.

2604. Do you not think that the removal of the temptation and the evils that ensue from it, would tend greatly to advance female comfort and domestic enjoyment?—Certainly.

2605. And you can have no doubt that female comfort and domestic enjoyment do tend to advance the religious, educational, and social advancement of the population?—Certainly; for example, the duties of parents towards their children would be better attended to. Frequently at present parents cannot send their children to school, and cannot attend Divine service themselves, for want of clothes. Not only does the intemperate man neglect Divine service himself, but, indirectly, he is the cause of similar neglect on the part of his wife and children.

2606. You have stated that you think female opinion would be universally in favour of such closing, and that it would tend to the moral and social elevation of the people?—I have not the least doubt of it.

2607. You stated that you presumed that the habitual drunkard would, somehow or other, find means of indulging in his vicious propensity; do you not think, from your observation, that those habits of the habitual drunkard are very much acquired from the neglect of the Sabbath, rather than from any excess on week days?—Yes; those men on Saturday have the prospect of an idle day before them, so they go to the public-houses after their work, without the intention of committing any excess, but they stay longer than they intended; and, in consequence of this, they neglect Divine worship on the Sunday, and are often unable to return to their work on Monday. I am convinced that the passing of this law would lessen the number of such cases. I think it would be impossible to exaggerate the public good that would result from the total closing of public-houses on Sunday, if the movement was sustained by public opinion.

2608. Mr. Stacpoole.] This paper was signed by 11 bishops and archbishops, but had the remainder of the 28 bishops you spoke of been asked to sign it?—I am sure they could not have been, because I do not see the name of my own bishop. I know he would have signed it, because he put me in motion to speak to the publicans some years ago in reference to the voluntary movement. I do not know any ecclesiastic or bishop that would be against this movement, or in fact any religious man in the community.

2609. Mr. Murphy.] You stated that the population of St. John's parish had 10,000?—More or less.

2610. Are you prepared to form an opinion as to what proportion the working men and the labouring classes bear towards the total population?—I have not any statistics, and I should therefore be very unwilling to give an opinion. I know that my parish comprises some of the poorest parts of the city, such as are usually inhabited by the labouring classes.

2611. Consequently, the greater proportion of that population of 10,000 would be formed of the labouring classes?—I think the greater part of the labouring classes live in my parish, but I should be sorry to give an opinion as to what proportion they bear to the rest of the population.

2612. Of course they bear a greater proportion to the population of your parish than they do to the population of any other?—With the exception of perhaps St. Mary's.

2613. Would you say that one-half were of the labouring classes and small tradesmen?—I think so.

2614. Generally speaking, are those classes industrious, well-ordered, and honest labouring men?—I think they are fairly so.

2615. Have you been able at all to form an opinion, not particularly, but generally as to what the proportion of drunkards is amongst them, as compared with the rest of the population?—I cannot give you the least idea of that.

2616. You could not say whether there are more or less; the majority, I presume, are not drunkards?—I am sure they are not.

2617. I may take it for granted that a very large minority of them are drunkards?—I think the habitual drunkards are a very small minority only.

2618. Now we will come to another class; are there a great number of tipplers who are not drunkards?

drunkards?—I think there are many who drink on Sundays and Saturdays who do not commit the sin of drunkenness, but who still spend more than is good for themselves or their families.

2619. Is that a large proportion?—I think there is a large proportion of that class.

2620. What do you call a large proportion?—I have a great difficulty in getting into any question of statistics.

2621. I was asking a general question; you must know the proportion perfectly well?—I should say a large number of them go to the public-houses on Sunday, but what proportion they bear to the rest of the community I cannot say.

2622. Do they commit excess on Sundays?—Not perhaps against the Divine law, but they sin against their families. They do not commit the theological sin of drunkenness, but they sin against society.

2623. Any one who spends money which he ought not to do does that; but is there any such marked abuse of drinking amongst a larger section of that population as would direct public attention to it?—I think there is.

2624. What proportion of them?—I cannot say that.

2625. Supposing the population of labouring men is five thousand, would you say that the proportion is one-fifth or one-tenth?—I would rather not hazard an opinion where I have no reliable data.

2626. You surely can form some opinion from your knowledge of those classes. I do not want the statistical number, but what proportion of these men numbering, we will say, 5,000, go habitually to public-houses on Sunday, and spend more money than they ought to?—I really could not say that.

2627. I may take it for granted that they are a minority of the population?—Yes.

2628. A large minority of that population?—Yes.

2629. Are you prepared to say whether drunkenness has been decreasing for some years past?—I think there is a great decrease since last Christmas; that is the result of a religious movement on the part of the Redemptorist Fathers.

2630. Can you carry your mind back to the extent of three or four years?—I should think it was rather on the increase up to that time.

2631. From four or five years previously?—Yes.

2632. But during the last few months, owing to this impression made upon them by the Redemptorist Fathers, there has been a change?—The temperance movement has been very successful.

2633. Lord Claud Hamilton.] They specially turned their attention to that?—They specially turned their attention to that; it was a mission to the labouring classes, and they have formed a permanent organisation, so as to preserve the fruits of the mission.

2634. Mr. Murphy.] Your decided impression is, that the remedy for this evil would be a total closing?—I am decidedly in favour of total closing; I think great good would result from it to the community.

2635. Do you not think that if there was only a partial closing on Sundays, opportunities would be afforded of procuring drink to that particular class whom you would be desirous to improve?—I think that any curtailment, as I have stated already, would be an advantage, but complete closing, I think, would be the best measure.

2636. The complete closing on Sunday of every house that sold liquor?—Of every house where those abuses were likely to arise.

2637. But we cannot well designate them. If one class of houses were closed and another class were left open, would not those parties who wished to procure drink go to those houses?—That case is contemplated in my answer.

2638. Major Gavin.] I think you were a long time in St. Mary's parish, were you not?—I was.

2639. I think, as far as my knowledge enables me to say of Limerick, St. Mary's and St. John's are the parishes where the greater number of workpeople reside?—Yes, in those two parishes.

2640. From your experience of those two parishes, can you say whether the distress which has prevailed considerably there for the last three or four years, has been principally brought on by excess in drinking?—I think that distress in many cases does arise from drinking in the way I have already stated, that is to say, that people waste their earnings in the public-houses, and then the poverty of the family follows, and also, in many cases, the loss of their employment.

2641. They generally get their wages paid on the Saturday, and, as I believe, the evil commences on the Saturday, does it not?—Yes.

2642. And continues on the Sunday?—Yes.

2643. And do you think that if the houses were closed earlier on the Saturday, that practice would be checked?—I think it would be a decided advantage to close early on the Saturday.

2644. Now, on the other side of the question, do you suppose that if all the public-houses were closed on the Sundays, and closed earlier on Saturdays, there would be a feeling of jealousy on the part of the middle classes when they saw that the gentry and those above them were able to enjoy themselves in clubs and hotels?—I do not think that they would when the matter was explained to them, and when they saw it was done for their advantage. I think that the labouring classes would themselves desire to remove the temptation from themselves; and the end of this law, if passed, would be, not to remove from them any reasonable enjoyment, but to remove from them an occasion of evil to themselves and their families.

2645. You are quite convinced that religion has made such an impression upon them, that they would see the necessity of aiding and assisting the law, the carrying out of which would be an advantage to themselves and their families?—I think that that, combined with the influence of public opinion, would lead them to labour, and labour successfully in that way.

2646. Do you think there would be any difficulty in carrying out, if the Bill was passed, the total closing in Limerick and its neighbourhood?—I think that there would be no serious difficulty in carrying out the law.

2647. We have had evidence that, in the event of such a law passing, it would require an increase of police?—It might require an increase of police; but, I think the difficulty could be surmounted by increased vigilance on the part of the police, and by increased activity on the part of the directors of public opinion.

2648. And you have no doubt that if a Bill was passed for totally closing public-houses on Sunday, it would meet with the general approval of the people of Limerick?—I think so; my suggestion would test that; if the Bill be permissive, then the people would have an opportunity of accepting it, or of rejecting it, according to their own judgment and wish.

2649. Chairman.] You have been pressed to give an opinion with regard to what was the definite proportion of the labouring classes who were habitually tipplers, or who habitually spent more money in drink than they ought to, having due regard to their social duties; and you declined to give any opinion as to what proportion came under that description. Still, would you say that a large proportion of the working-classes, to your knowledge, not perhaps habitually, but occasionally, do waste a considerable part of their earnings, more than they themselves afterwards, in their calmer moments, would approve of, in public-houses on Sundays?—I am quite certain of that.

2650. Major Gavin.] I think you stated that you were afraid drinking had increased in Limerick in the last four years?—I rather think so.

2651. Mr. Pollard-Urquhart.] What time on Saturday evening are the wages generally paid in Limerick?—I think they are generally paid at two o'clock; in many cases they are paid on Fridays. I am confident that all the employers would be quite ready to regulate the hour of payment, so as to meet the wants of those in their employment.

2652. It has been stated by other witnesses that early closing on Saturday evening might put people to inconvenience and difficulty in getting change for their wages in the public-houses; do you think that would be likely to happen?—No; because I think there is hardly an employer in Limerick who would not pay on Friday, if it was for the convenience of the people to do so, and, as a matter of fact, very many of the employers at present do pay on Fridays.

2653. Mr. Murphy.] Are you aware whether there are any shops in Limerick called spirit grocers, grocers who have a license to sell spirits?—Yes, there are.

2654. Are you aware that the law prevents them from selling spirits for consumption on the premises?—I am.

2655. Has it come to your knowledge at all that, notwithstanding that, they do sell drink for consumption on the premises?—I have heard that, but I am not prepared to prove it.

2656. Do you think it likely, if a law was passed closing public-houses altogether, and leaving those houses open to sell not for consumption on the premises, that that class of persons would take advantage of the law, and sell?—I should advocate the universal application of the law, and close them all.

2657. You would close spirit grocers, and all?—Yes.

2658. Even although spirit grocers were not licensed to sell for consumption on the premises?—Yes.

DUBLIN METROPOLITAN POLICE.

STATISTICS of DRUNKENNESS in the DUBLIN METROPOLITAN POLICE DISTRICT, from 1859 to 1866 inclusive; distinguishing Sunday Cases and Monday Cases in each Year from 1862.

YEARS.	Number Arrested in each Year.	Number Arrested from 7 p.m. each Saturday to 10 a.m. each Monday in the Year.	Number Arrested from 12 each Saturday Night to 12 each Sunday Night in the Year.	REMARKS.
1859 - -	10,330	- -	- -	Under the Wine Licenses Act, passed in 1860, two hours on Sunday night, and two on Monday morning, were added to the legal hours on those days, thus restoring to public-houses the hours prescribed by the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 68, passed in 1833.
1860 - -	9,787	—	—
1861 - -	9,203	—	—
1862 - -	11,730	4,610	2,816
1863 - -	13,657	5,568	3,400	The Beer House Act, 27 & 28 Vict. c. 35, was passed in 1864. The evils resulting from the reckless drinking carried on in beer-houses on Saturday nights and Sunday mornings having been urgently pressed on the attention of Government, this Act was passed.
1864 - -	17,150	6,541	4,141
1865 - -	16,192	5,628	3,226
1866 - -	11,321	4,685	2,712

The decrease in 1865, and subsequent years, may be ascribed to the Beer House Act in some measure, and also to the exigent duties of the police in regard to the political movement which for the last three years has existed in Ireland.

ADULTERATION. Adulterated stuff that would be sold illegally if public-houses were totally closed on Sunday, Barry 1851, 1852.

B.

Barry, Garrett. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is President of the Cork Vintners' Society, 1810—Great room for improvement in the state of the vintners' trade at Cork, when the society was formed about eleven years ago; successful efforts of the society to improve the value of licenses, and to put down shebeen-houses, 1811-1832. 1899-1905—Exceedingly injurious effect of the Bill upon numerous public-houses in the suburbs of Cork, whose principal trade is on Sunday; great injury also to the licensed houses generally, 1833-1842. 1898. 1908-1933—Grounds for concluding that the Bill will not prevent or diminish Sunday drinking, as illegal traffic in drink is sure to arise, and to a most injurious extent, if the law is made more penal, 1843-1859. 1895-1898.

Non-objection to the old law being reverted to by which the hour of closing on Sunday was nine o'clock, 1861, 1862. 2002, 2003. 2039-2042—Advantage of the hours of opening being continuous rather than intermittent, 1863—Objections to closing at an earlier hour than eleven on Saturday evening; inconvenience to the working classes on account of the late hour at which wages are paid, 1864-1870. 1877-1882. 1890-1894. 1977, 1978—Conclusion as to drunkenness having decreased in Cork of late years, 1871-1874. 1883, 1884—Duty of the secretary of the Cork Vintners' Society in regard to the suppression of disorderly or illegally-conducted public-houses, 1875, 1876.

Very little drunkenness in Cork on Sunday as compared with Saturday evening, 1885-1889. 1908-1912—Great difficulty of preventing, through means only of the police, all illicit trade in liquor, 1899-1907—Sense in which it may be said that the proposed restrictions would involve confiscation, 1932, 1933—Question considered whether the Bill would really cause material injury to the brewers and distilleries, and to the farmers, as was stated at a meeting in Cork, 1934-1940—Nature of the claim of publicans to keep their houses open on Sunday whilst other shops are closed, 1941-1943. 2009-2011.

Information on the subject of certain petitions from Cork, one in favour of and one opposed to the Bill; comment upon the mode in which signatures were procured to the former, 1944-1963. 2023-2027—With regard to the very long hours of labour of publicans and their assistants in Cork, witness questions whether there is much complaint made on the subject, 1964-1974—Inconvenience to excursionists if the hours are restricted as proposed by the Bill, 1975.

Further statement as to drinking on Sunday taking place chiefly at suburban or rural public-houses, and not in the City of Cork, 1979-1981. 1984—Amendments required in the licensing law rather than in the Sunday trade in liquors, 1982, 1983—Examination as to the grounds for concluding that, if the Bill be passed, it will be much more difficult to put down shebeen-houses and illicit trading than it is at present, 1985-2001. 2012-2022. 2028-2030—Increased difficulty of suppressing shebeen-houses if the public-houses were closed on Saturday at nine o'clock, 2004-2008—Expediency of Sunday closing, if adopted, being extended to eating-houses, and to hotels where there is a public bar, 2031-2034—Doubt whether there is more drinking on the afternoon or the evening of Sunday, 2035-2044.

Beer. Impracticability of providing that beer only should be sold on Sunday and not spirits, Wigham 107—Doubt whether publicans would properly carry out a regulation that beer might be supplied on Sunday whilst whisky was forbidden, De Gernon 191-193. 249—Increasing consumption of beer and porter in Ireland, ib. 260—Much less risk of intoxication if beer only were allowed to be sold on Sunday, ib. 267, 268—Objection to a provision that beer may be sold on Sundays; cover thereby for the sale of whisky, Ryan 359-363; Rev. Dr. Leahy 482-485; Sullivan 541.

Beer Houses. Low character of the beer-houses in Dublin, a different system of licensing being much required as a means of improving them, or of doing away with them, Ralph 615-618; Pillsworth 681. 700—Exceeding mischievous operation of beer-houses in Dublin, so that witness would abolish them altogether, M'Cabe 2206. 2260-2263—Great want of an improved system as regards beer-house licenses in Liverpool, O'Shaughnessy 2373-2375.—See also Licenses.

Belfast. Detailed information, as obtained from police sources, relative to the large amount of drunkenness in Belfast, and the injurious effect of drunkenness in leading to crime, Lindsay 811, 812—Very large population of Belfast, and extent of the area of the borough, ib. 813-816—Evidence as to the very strong and widespread feeling in Belfast in favour of the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday; belief that at least three-fourths of the inhabitants would approve of compulsory prohibition, ib. 816. 828-840. 869-874. 898—Circumstance of 146 public-houses being closed voluntarily on Sunday out of a total of 535 public-houses, ib. 816. 869—Unanimity of a large public meeting held in March 1867 in favour of total closing, ib. 817-819. 871-874—Large proportion of public-houses in the town, ib. 819. 889—Limitation of late of the number of licenses issued, the number of public-houses having been excessive, ib. 819.

Large number of cases of drunkenness dealt with by witness every Monday morning, the majority of these arising from excess on Saturday night, J. C. O'Donnell, 929-931. 974-976. 1027-1029—Impossibility of a general and voluntary closing of public-houses in Belfast on Sunday being effected by the Roman Catholic clergy, ib. 958-960—Explanation on the subject of the transfer of public-houses in the town, large sums being sometimes given for the license, or rather for the good-will, ib. 1034-1039—Considerable sum represented by the actual cost of the license, ib. 1042-1046—Large sale of drink in unlicensed houses: penalties in such cases, ib. 1042-1046.

See also Licenses.

Berkeley, The Rev. Lowry Edmonds. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Presbyterian minister at Lurgan, 1316—Unanimous opinion of the Presbyterian body in the North of Ireland in favour of the compulsory prohibition of the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday, 1317-1321. 1374, 1375—Little, if any, inconvenience to the working classes in the North of Ireland in being prevented from purchasing beer on Sunday for consumption with their meals: practice generally of the people not to drink at home, but only in the public-houses, 1322, 1323. 1333-1336. 1349—Desire of the people to be protected from the temptation of open public-houses on Sunday, 1324. 1344—Feeling of many publicans in favour of total closing, 1324.

Limited inconvenience in the case of travellers through Sunday closing, 1325—Expediency, if the houses be open at all, of only one period of opening and the shorter the better, 1326-1329. 1356-1358—Very demoralising effect of the public-houses in rural districts in the North through being open on Sunday, 1327-1329—Importance of the houses closing on Saturday at nine o'clock, 1329, 1330—Injurious operation of the system of excise licenses, 1331, 1332.

Advantage of a day of rest in the case of the numerous persons employed in the public-houses on Sunday, 1337-1343—Decided improvement upon the present system by requiring that drink sold on Sunday must not be consumed on the premises, 1344-1355. 1371, 1372—Objection to eating-houses being allowed to sell drink on Sunday any more than public-houses, 1359—Little, if any, jealousy to be felt by the lower classes through the middle and upper classes having opportunities of obtaining drink at clubs, &c., 1360-1370.

Bill of 1867. Majority of Irish members on the Division in 1867 for going into Committee of the House on the Bill of that year, Wigham, 37-39.

C.

Carey Michael. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is member of the Town Council of Dublin, and is President of the Licensed Vintners' Association of Dublin: is well conversant with the habits of the working classes, 1488-1493—Statistics showing a considerable decrease of drunkenness in Dublin during the last three years, 1494-1496—Application by the licensed vintners in 1860 for an extension of the time of opening their houses from from 9 to 11 on Sunday evening, the houses of the spirit grocers and beer-sellers having been open till the latter hour, 1497. 1501, 1502. 1531.

Desire of the licensed vintners to prevent excess in the sale of drink, so that there has been less drunkenness since the public have resorted more to their houses and less to the beer-shops and spirit grocers' shops on Sunday night, 1497. 1502—Constant evasion of the law as to drink sold by spirit grocers not being drunk on the premises: power also of the spirit grocers to keep open all day on Sunday by paying a small fine, 1497-1500. 1503-1509. 1602-1606—Belief that the passing of the Bill would have very injurious results, and that illicit trade in drink would greatly increase, 1510-1512.

Anxiety of the publicans of Dublin to keep the trade respectable, and to prevent drunkenness, further adverted to, 1510. 1528, 1536-1540—Large number of operatives in Dublin to whom total closing on Sunday would cause much inconvenience and discontent, 1511. 1525-1527—Decided objection to the proposition that liquor sold on Sunday must not be drunk on the premises: constant evasion and bad moral consequences sure to follow any such requirement, 1513-1516. 1530—Ruinous effect of total closing upon the public-houses in the suburbs or rural districts about Dublin, 1517-1522—Facility of evading the provisions of the Bill by taking out revenue licenses: question hereon whether these licenses might not without difficulty be brought under the Bill, 1522-1524. 1545-1549.

Objection not only to total closing on Sunday, but to any limitation of the present hours, even though spirit grocers were included in the prohibition, 1529-1533—Doubt as to the feeling in rural districts upon the question of Sunday restrictions, 1534, 1535—Decrease of drunkenness in Dublin further adverted to, 1541-1544—Long hours of labour of the assistants in witness's employment: objection to any legislative interference, 1550-1552. 1616-1620.

Admission that witness has not always been opposed to Sunday closing, nor always considered it impracticable, 1553, 1554—Belief as to the Bill having an injurious effect upon the trade of the distillers and brewers, 1555-1560—Statement as to the claim of public-houses to be open on Sunday, though other shops are obliged to be closed, 1561-1563. 1610-1615—Less drunkenness in Dublin than in London, Liverpool, and other large towns, 1564, 1565—Grounds for a statement that all the police magistrates of Dublin are opposed to the Bill, 1566-1569.

Comment upon the manner in which petitions have been got up in favour of the Bill, 1570, 1571—Explanation as to the petitions against the Bill, and as to the amount of success attendant upon the exertions used by the Vintners' Association to promote opposition to the Bill, 1571-1589—Prejudicial effect upon licensed vintners if licenses were made uniform: large capital sunk by the vintners in their houses, 1590-1595. 1640, 1641—Approval of the hours of opening on Sunday being from two to nine, 1596—Great inconvenience if the public-houses were closed earlier on Saturday night, as wages are often paid at a very late hour, 1597-1601.

Objection to the proposal that publicans should be rendered responsible for drunkenness on their premises, 1607-1609—Necessity of all houses where liquor is or may be sold being subject to the same regulations as to Sunday closing, 1621-1624. 1633-1639—Dissent from the view that further restrictions would be any benefit to the working classes in a moral sense, or would diminish drunkenness, 1625-1632.

Cashel Diocese. Voluntary closing on Sunday for some years past of all the Roman Catholic public-houses in Cashel diocese, under an ecclesiastical law; some Protestant publicans have also closed voluntarily, De Gernon, 130-132. 202, 203—Exceptional instance of a Roman Catholic public-house in the diocese not closing on Sunday, ib. 207, 208—Belief that the publicans generally comply strictly with the regulations of the Archbishop, ib. 261-263.

Outline of the steps taken by witness during the last eleven years for the propagation of temperance in his diocese, Rev. Dr. Leahy, 382—Gradual manner in which witness introduced the Sunday temperance law into the diocese, under which ecclesiastical law there is no sale of liquors on Sunday, except in the case of travellers and in cases of necessity, ib. 382-386—Since 1861 the law has been in full force throughout the whole diocese, ib. 384—Exceedingly beneficial operation of the law in diminishing intemperance, and in improving the moral habits of the people, ib. 389 et seq.—Exceptional instance of a Protestant public-house in the diocese kept open on Sunday, ib. 395.

Detailed statement in further explanation of the various means adopted by witness in the introduction and the enforcement of the Sunday temperance law in his diocese, Rev. Dr. Leahy, 406—Single instance of witness having had to speak publicly of any person for infringement of the law, ib. 409—Statistics of the amount of drunkenness on Sunday before and since the introduction of witness's measure; very gratifying diminution since 1861, ib. 410-413. 418, 419. 470—Increase in the rate of wages

Cigar Divans. Cigar divans should be included in the proposed restrictions, Barry 2034.

Class Legislation. Probability of the proposed enactment creating some dissatisfaction on the ground of its being class legislation: witness would not sympathise with this complaint, Ryan 324, 325. 343-345—Objection made to the Bill on the score of its involving class legislation, Keegan 2160—Doubt as to any jealous feeling arising that the Bill involves class legislation, O'Shaughnessy 2389-2392. See also Club Houses.

Clergy. See Roman Catholic Clergy. Voluntary Closing.

Club Houses. Question considered whether the same prohibition should not apply in the case of clubs as of public-houses; doubt as to habits of intoxication in the former case, Wigham 124-126—Expected jealousy among the lower classes if public-houses were closed on Sunday whilst club houses were open, ib. 1299-1304—Little if any jealousy to be felt by the lower classes through the middle and upper classes having opportunities of obtaining drink at clubs &c., Berkeley 1360-1370; Miller 1726-1728. 1792-1798.

See also Class Legislation.

Compulsory Restrictions. Difficulty in effecting by Act of Parliament the same regulations as by voluntary and by ecclesiastical law, De Gernon 188-190—Valuable effect anticipated from the compulsory closing of public-houses on Sunday, even though the people did not voluntarily agree to such closing, ib. 235, 236—Evidence strongly in favour of an Act of Parliament for the closing of public-houses throughout Ireland on Sunday; belief that it could be easily enforced if the authorities were but vigilant, Rev. Dr. Leahy, 400-404. 422 et seq—Doubt as to the general adoption of a law if permissive, whereas if compulsory it would be effectually carried out with the aid of the clergy, ib. 480, 481. 486-493.

Willingness of the people to be influenced by their clergy in regard to the voluntary closing of public-houses on Sunday; very general dissatisfaction and evasion if there were a compulsory measure, Porter 1394-1397. 1471-1476. 1486, 1487.

Confiscation. Sense in which it may be said that the proposed restrictions would involve confiscation, Barry 1932, 1933. See also Loss of Trade.

Consumption on Premises. Importance, if the public-houses are to continue open for a few hours, of a requirement that the liquor must not be drunk on the premises; doubt as to this leading to club-drinking in private houses, Ryan, 304. 319-323. 326-330; Sullivan 527-533. 540. 558-566. 570-574; J. C. O'Donnell 990-1010—Means of carrying out a provision, that drink sold on Sunday should not be drunk in the public-houses, Ralph 593-596. 604. 628-633. 639-645.

Vigilance necessary in order to prevent consumption on the premises on Sunday, J. C. O'Donnell 941, 942—Improbability of rooms or houses being provided near the public-houses in order to facilitate the consumption of drink if forbidden at the latter after purchase, ib. 943, 944. 993-1010—Decided improvement upon the present system by requiring that drink sold on Sunday must not be consumed on the premises, Berkeley 1344-1355. 1371-1372.

Objections to the proposal that drink may be sold but not consumed on the premises on Sunday, Rev. Dr. Leahy 457-459; M'Cabe 2264-2268. 2282—Grounds for preferring that liquor should be sold to be drunk on the premises rather than elsewhere, Pillsworth 681; Lyon 742-751—Inoperativeness of any law requiring that drink sold on Sunday must not be drunk on the premises; Lindsay 864-868. 875-878; Hamilton 1097-1099. 1105. 1127-1130; O'Shaughnessy 2379-2382; O'Ferrall 2502.

Obstacle to any enforcement of the regulations that liquor, when sold, must not be consumed on the premises, H. O'Donnell 1184-1189. 1264, 1265—Expected evasion of the requirement that liquor sold on Sunday must not be drunk on the premises, Porter 1450-1454—Decided objection to the proposition that liquor sold on Sunday must not be drunk on the premises; constant evasion and bad moral consequences sure to follow any such requirement, Carey 1513-1516. 1530; Corr 1710-1716; Keegan 2159. 2168. 2177—Great difficulty in requiring spirits not to be consumed on the premises; constant evasion of this regulation at the spirit grocers, Healy 2057. 2064-2069. 2078-2083. 2117-2119. 2132-2137.

Cork. Apprehension lest the closing of public-houses in Cork on Sunday would induce people to lay in a stock of whisky on Saturday instead of their sending for beer on Sunday, Lions Cork—continued.

Lyons 704-706. 743—Occurrence of drunkenness in Cork chiefly in the public-houses, and not at the houses of the people, ib. 708—Feeling opposed to total closing on Sunday, but not to restricted opening, ib. 747. 798-803—Strong feeling in Cork against the Bill, Carey 1577.

Great room for improvement in the state of the vintner's trade at Cork when the Cork Vinters' Society was formed about eleven years ago: successful efforts of the society to improve the value of licenses and to put down shebeen-houses, Barry 1811-1832. 1899-1905—Statement as to drinking on Sunday taking place chiefly at suburban or rural public-houses, and not in the City of Cork, ib. 1833-1842. 1908-1933. 1979-1981. 1984—Conclusion as to drunkenness having decreased in Cork of late years, ib. 1871-1874. 1883, 1884—Duty of the Secretary of the Vintner's Society in regard to the suppression of disorderly or illegally conducted public-houses, ib. 1875, 1876—Very little drunkenness in Cork on Sunday as compared with Saturday evening, ib. 1885-1889. 1908-1912.

Very little drinking in Cork on Sunday, Healy 2052—Explanation relative to the large reduction in the cases of drunkenness during an exceptional period when the public-houses were closed at six on Sunday, ib. 2104. 2105. 2111—Increased consumption of beer and spirits, though the drunkenness has not increased, ib. 2122-2129—Conclusion that the Bill would be of no material benefit to the general public in Cork, whilst it would be grossly oppressive to a very large class, ib. 2146-2149.

Memorial of magistrates of the Douglas Petty Sessions praying that the public-houses be closed at 8 p.m. daily, App. 136.

Corr, Richard. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Superintendent of the Dublin police; has had 30 years' experience in the force, 1642-1645—Decrease of drunkenness in Dublin within the last few years, 1646, 1647—Less drunkenness on Sunday than on other days, the cases dealt with on Monday arising chiefly on Saturday night, 1648-1652—Objection to closing the public-houses in Dublin on Sunday, as the result would be a large amount of illicit drinking, 1653-1655. 1683, 1684—Approval of the hours of opening being from three to nine, and of all houses where liquor is sold being included in this regulation, 1656-1661.

Objection to publicans and spirit grocers being required to close earlier than half-past ten on Saturday night, as marketing is largely carried on up to that time, 1662-1668. 1703-1709—Great evil under the present system of revenue licenses to spirit grocers and beer-sellers, as facilitating excessive drinking at prohibited hours; expediency of one uniform system of license, 1669-1682. 1685-1689—Facility presented to Fenian agents through the public-houses being open on Sunday, 1690-1692.

Objection to the proposal that the publican should have larger authority and be more fully accountable upon the question of selling drink in excess to anyone, 1693-1702—Large evasion of the Bill, and very objectionable practices, if it be enacted that drink sold on Sunday is not to be consumed on the premises, 1710-1716—The hours of opening should be continuous, 1714.

Country Districts. Opinion that in country districts the sale of drink on Sunday may be altogether prohibited with advantage and without any serious hardship, Lyons 711-715. 736. 774. 785-792—Much greater facility in carrying out a prohibition upon Sunday trade in liquors in rural districts than in towns; advantage in such districts of the moral influence of the Roman Catholic clergy, J. C. O'Donnell 962-969. 1016-1029—Less objection to total closing on Sunday in the county than in Cork, Hamilton 1125, 1126—Doubt as to the feeling in rural districts upon the question of Sunday restrictions, Carey 1534, 1535.

Crime. Conclusion that if the Bill be passed there will be a great decrease of intemperance, and that the public morals and public safety will be largely benefited, Wigham 72-85—Important diminution of crime as well as of drunkenness in Cashel diocese, where the public-houses are voluntarily closed on Sunday, Rev. Dr. Leahy 446—Very demoralising effect of the public-houses in rural districts in the north through being open on Sunday, Berkeley 1327-1329—Belief that nine-tenths of the crime throughout Ireland may be attributed to drink, O'Shaughnessy 2367.

D.

Dance-Houses. Absence of abuse at dance-houses on Sunday; very few of these in the Cashel diocese, De Gernon 239-244; Rev. Dr. Leahy 467-469.

De Gernon, Christopher. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a resident magistrate in Tipperary, his district being all situated within the Roman Catholic archdiocese of Cashel, 127. 129—Voluntarily closing on Sunday for some years past of all the Roman Catholic public-public-houses in Cashel diocese, under an ecclesiastical law; some Protestant publicans have also closed voluntarily, 130-132. 202, 203—Freedom from drunkenness and violence on Sunday throughout the county of Tipperary since the closing of the public-houses, 132. 204-206—Resort of large numbers to the public-houses who would not endeavour to obtain drink in other ways if the present facilities were withdrawn, 134, 135.

Facilities through means of the public-houses for the spread of disaffection and of Fenianism, 136-139. 168-170. 197, 198—Concurrence in a certain petition from Clonmel that the Bill should not include Good Friday and days of thanksgiving of the Roman Catholic Church as well as Sunday, 140-142—Advantage if the fairs and markets now held on holidays were transferred to the next working day, 142, 143—Conclusion that the voluntary closing system in Tipperary is agreeable to the great majority of the population, 144.

Necessity of very harmonious co-operation between the clergy of different denominations before the system in force in Tipperary could be extended to the rest of Ireland, 145, 146—Belief that it would be more conducive to the public good if the restriction were made complete on Sunday, instead of two or three hours being allowed for the purchase of beer and spirits not to be consumed on the premises, 147—Satisfactory comparison of Tipperary with other counties owing to the ecclesiastical law now in force in the former, 148-157. 202-206.

Conclusion that very little abuse would arise through persons assembling to drink in private houses if public-houses were closed, 158-167. 213-215—Information as to the way in which the lower classes in Tipperary spend their time on Sunday since the closing of the public-houses, 171-185—Less abuse in connection with card-playing in private houses than in public-houses, 182-185. 245—Exception made in favour of persons who travel seven miles on Sunday, 186, 187—Difficulty in effecting by Act of Parliament the same regulations as by voluntary agreement and by ecclesiastical law, 188-190.

Doubt whether publicans would properly carry out a regulation that beer might be supplied on Sunday whilst whisky was forbidden, 191-193. 249—Less reason for endeavouring to close public-houses on fair days and market days than on Sunday, 194-196—Obstacle to public-houses being closed at harvest time, 199-201—Exceptional instance of a public-house in the diocese of Cashel not closing on Sunday, 207-208—Absence of inconvenience or injury through persons suddenly requiring stimulants on Sunday on the score of health, 209-212.

Opinion further expressed in favour of total closing of public-houses on Sunday, provision being made to meet the case of travellers, 216-219—Belief that the practice of clubbing together for the purchase of drink would but slightly increase if public-houses generally were closed on Sundays, 220-224—Doubt as to people resorting to confectioners' shops and eating-houses for the sake of drink if they could not obtain it at public-houses; the former places should, however, be embraced in the same law as the latter, 225-234. 256-258.

Valuable effect anticipated from the compulsory closing of public-houses on Sunday, even though the people did not voluntarily agree to such closing, 235, 236—Impression that there are not so many shebeen-houses in witness's district as there used to be, 237, 238—Absence of abuse at dance-houses on Sunday; very few of these in the district, 239-244—Slight difficulty likely to arise in the case of travellers on Sunday through the public-houses being closed, 246-248.

Further statement as to the prejudicial effect of public-houses with reference to Fenianism, 250, 251—Improvement if instead of the Bill providing for the public-houses being open from two till four in the afternoon and from eight till nine in the evening, there were but one period of opening, or from three to five; 252-255. 280—Doubt as to the exception allowed in Cashel diocese in the case of travellers being largely made use of, 259. 264-266—Increasing consumption of beer and porter in Ireland, 260.

Belief that the publicans generally comply strictly with the regulations of the archbishop, 261-263—Much less risk of intoxication if beer only were allowed to be sold on Sunday, 267, 268—Similar excise license granted to all classes of public-houses and to confectioners' shops, 272-274—Very little official experience of witness in connection with large towns, 275-279.

Distillers and Brewers. Belief as to the Bill having an injurious effect upon the trade of the distillers and brewers, Carey 1555-1560—Question considered whether the Bill would really cause material injury to the brewers and distillers, and to the farmers, as was stated at a certain meeting in Cork, Barry 1934-1940.

Drogheda. Opposition in Drogheda to the Bill, Carey 1587, 1588.

Drunkenness. Conclusion that if the Bill be passed there will be a great decrease of intemperance, and that the public morals and public safety will be largely benefited, Wigham

Drunkenness—continued.

Wigham 72-85—Opinion that the habits of the people of Ireland, with regard to drunkenness, have improved within the last thirty years, Ryan 309-312—Views of certain of the police authorities of Belfast as to the large amount of drunkenness consequent upon the opening of the public-houses on Sunday from two to eleven o'clock, Lindsay 824-827, 853-855—Decrease of drunkenness in Cork owing to the increased provisions, Hamilton 1109, 1110.

Great improvement within witness's experience in the moral habits of the lower classes; much less intemperance than formerly, Porter 1389-1393—Statement that the amount of intoxication upon Sunday is not a crying evil, and is not on the increase, Miller 1746. 1765—Doubt whether there is more drinking on the afternoon or the evening of Sunday, Barry 2035-2044—Decrease of drunkenness upon the extension of the hour from nine to eleven o'clock, O'Ferrall 2466. 2498-2500—Difficulty in reclaiming habitual drunkards by legislative restrictions; belief that the number of this class would be lessened by Sunday closing, Fitzgerald 2587, 2588. 2607.

Dublin. Statistics of the amount of drunkenness in Dublin since the year 1862; large proportion of cases which occur on Sunday, Wigham 42-49—Considerable diminution apparently in the number of cases since 1865; explanation on this point, ib. 50-54.

Conclusion that the proposed restrictions upon the sale of liquor on Sunday will lead to a great amount of secret or illicit drinking in Dublin, and will have no effect in diminishing drunkenness, Porter 1377 et seq.; Carey 1510-1512; Corr 1653-1655. 1683, 1684; Keegan 2153-2158. 2163-2167—Belief that there is an enormous amount of illicit traffic in Dublin, Porter 1409. 1429-1432—Considerable decrease of drunkenness in Dublin during the last three years, Carey 1494-1496. 1541-1544—Less drunkenness in Dublin than in London, Liverpool, and other large towns, ib. 1564, 1565—Grounds for a statement that all the police magistrates of Dublin are opposed to the Bill, ib. 1566-1569.

Decrease of drunkenness in Dublin within the last few years, Corr 1646, 1647—Less drunkenness on Sunday than on other days, the cases dealt with on Monday arising chiefly on Saturday night, ib. 1648-1652—Strong feeling on the part of the tradesmen of Dublin against the Bill, Keegan 2152. 2181-2188—Considerable amount of illegal drinking on Sunday morning in Dublin, ib. 2153. 2163-2167.

Decrease of drunkenness in Dublin, as the people have become more educated and better off, McCabe 2197-2199—Considerable amount of drunkenness still to be seen on the evenings of Saturday and Sunday, ib. 2200-2203. 2214—Belief as to there being much illicit drinking in Dublin before two o'clock on Sunday, ib. 2216-2219—Temporary success of an attempt to close voluntarily the public-houses in Thomas-street on Sunday, ib. 2219, 2220—Inadequacy of the present supervision in regard to the sale of drink on Sunday morning, ib. 2248-2255. 2271. 2306-2308.

Witness submits a report of the Dublin Police Commissioners upon the present Bill; various reasons assigned therein for the conclusion that the Bill will not effect the object for which intended, O'Ferrall 2422, 2423—Statement that illicit drinking in beershops, &c., in Dublin, already very prevalent, would be much increased if there were increased restrictions upon the hours of opening of public-houses, ib. 2423. 2429 et seq. 2508-2513.

Return containing statistics of the number of drunken cases in each of the years 1862-66, and to 31st May 1867, distinguishing the number on Sunday, App. 133—Details in connection respectively with public-houses, spirit grocers, and beer dealers, ib. 134—Statistics of drunkenness in each year from 1859 to 1866, distinguishing Sunday cases and Monday cases in each year since 1862, ib. 135—Number of drunken cases from 6 p.m. on Saturday, 2nd May, to twelve at night on Sunday, 3rd May, 1868, ib.

E.

Eating-houses, &c. Doubt as to people resorting to confectioners' shops and eating-houses for the sale of drink, if they could not obtain it at public-houses; the former places should, however, be embraced in the same law as the latter, De Gernon 225-234. 256-258—Prohibition in Cashel diocese upon the sale of liquors in eating-houses and hotels as well as public-houses, Rev. Dr. Leahy 455.

Concurrence of opinion in favour of including eating-houses, refreshment rooms, &c., in the law as to Sunday closing; evasion and dissatisfaction if all plans for the sale of drink are not treated alike, Pillsworth 699, 700; Hamilton 1100-1102. 1106; H. O'Donnell 1163. 1193-1195; Berkeley 1359; Carey 1621-1624. 1633-1639; Miller 280-I.

Statement in favour of eating-houses being still allowed to be open on Sunday, and to supply drink; check through the license upon any abuse, J. C. O'Donnell 945-953. 980 —Belief that but little inconvenience would arise if the Dublin eating-houses were only open from two to five, as regards the sale of drink, H. O'Donnell 1196-1202. 1229-1250 —Question as to the mode of dealing with the eating-houses further considered; probable evasion of the law if allowed to be open longer than public-houses, even though subject to penalties for selling drink after a certain hour, ib. 1229-1241. 1265-1267. 1283-1292. 1305-1311 —Little, if any, inconvenience in Armagh, Lurgan, &c., through people not being able to frequent eating-houses on Sunday, Miller 1729. 1740, 1741.

Ecclesiastical Law (Voluntary Closing). Non-adoption in other dioceses of the same plan of voluntary closing as in Cashel diocese, the bishops being apprehensive of failure, Rev. Dr. Leahy 420, 421.

Employés (Public-houses, &c.) Very long hours of daily labour of assistants in public-houses and grocery establishments, so that a curtailment of the hours on Sunday, or total closing on that day, would be a great boon to a numerous class, Sullivan 552-555. 567; Ralph 646-662; Lyons 784. 793-797; H. O'Donnell 1166-1183. 1270-1281; Berkeley 1337-1343; Healy 2113-2115; McCabe 2241-2247 —In some instances the grocery houses in Dublin are open from four in the morning till eleven at night; the majority open at seven in the morning, H. O'Donnell 1168-1173.

Doubt as to the expediency of any legislative measure for the protection of those employed in public-houses, as regards their hours of labour, Porter 1441-1444 —Long hours of labour of the assistants in witness's employment; objection to any legislative interference, Carey 1550-1552. 1616-1629 —With regard to the very long hours of labour of publicans and their assistants in Cork, witness questions whether there is much complaint made on the subject, Barry 1964-1974.

Evasion of the Law. Belief that the practice of clubbing together for the purchase of drink would but slightly increase if public-houses generally were closed on Sundays, De Gernon 158-167. 213-215. 220-224; Pillsworth 692-699; Lindsay 925 —Belief that if compulsory closing were made general by law, there would be but little evasion on the part of the people, Ryan 294 —Very little evasion of the voluntary law in force in Cashel diocese, Rev. Dr. Leahy 394.

Probability of some evasion of a law for compulsory closing, though many houses would observe the law, Pillsworth 680 —Doubt as to any benefit arising from the existing restrictions, as those who are inclined to drink contrive to do so at illicit hours, Porter 1380-1382 —Belief that the middle and lower classes would readily conform to a law which was meant for their good, Fitzgerald 2644-2648.

Fairs and Markets. Advantage if the fairs and markets now held on holidays were transferred to the next working day, De Gernon 142, 143 —Less reason for endeavouring to close public-houses on fair days and market days than on Sunday, ib. 194-196.

Fenianism

Fenianism. Facilities through means of the public-houses for the spread of Fenianism, De Gernon 136-139. 168-170. 197, 198. 250, 251; Ryan 372—Absence of Fenianism in Wexford, owing partly to the closing of public-houses on Sunday, Ryan 372-379—Doubt as to the opening of public-houses on Sunday having any effect in facilitating disaffection to Government, Porter 1484, 1485—Facility presented to Fenian agents through the public-houses being open on Sunday, Corr 1690-1692.

Fernes Diocese. Voluntary closing on Sunday in the Roman Catholic arch-diocese of Fernes, Wigham 113. 115-117—Operation of the system of voluntary closing of public-houses on Sunday in the diocese of Fernes through the influence of the Roman Catholic bishop, Ryan 284, 285—Very beneficial operation of the system, ib. 285 et seq.—Closing of the public-houses in Fernes diocese on holidays as well as Sundays, owing to the influence of the bishop, ib. 288-291—Satisfaction of the people with the system in question, the publicans also being well pleased with the arrangement, ib. 293.

Field, Cyrus. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Prohibition in force for the last two or three years upon the sale of liquors in New York on Sunday; very salutary operation thereof in diminishing drunkenness and crime, 2514 et seq.—Effectual check through the New York police upon the illegal sale of drink on Sunday, 2537-2539. 2548, 2549—Considerable drinking on Saturday night in New York, the public-houses being open till twelve o'clock; advantage hereon in wages being paid by some employers on Monday, 2540-2544.

Fitzgerald, The Very Rev. Dr. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is administrator of St. John's parish, Limerick, comprising a population of about 10,000 persons, 2559-2561—Opinion strongly in favour of the total closing of public-houses on Sunday; great moral benefits anticipated, 2562-2565. 2584. 2607. 2634, 2635—Greater amount of drinking in Limerick on Sunday than on any other day, 2566—Very general feeling in Limerick in favour of Sunday closing; belief that a large majority would sanction the adoption of a permissive Bill on the subject, 2567 et seq.

Necessity of the proposed restrictions being applied to all places where abuse is likely to arise from the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday, 2580-2583. 2634-2637. 2653-2658—Limited inconvenience to be experienced by the excursionist class at Limerick in the event of total closing, 2584—Any inconvenience or disadvantage would be far outweighed by the great advantages, 2584. 2607—Difficulty in reclaiming habitual drunkards by legislative restrictions; belief that the number of this class would be lessened by Sunday closing, 2585-2588. 2607.

Improvement upon the present system of the houses closed at eight or nine on Sunday, 2588, 2589. 2635—Further approval of a permissive Bill, and of its application being left to local bodies and to public opinion, 2589-2596. 2601, 2602. 2646-2648—Important declaration by the Roman Catholic clergy and hierarchy of Ireland in favour of total closing on Sunday, 2597-2600. 2608—Unanimity of female opinion in favour of Sunday closing, 2603-2606—Admission that the drunkards in witness's parish form a very small minority of the population; there is, however, excessive drinking on Sunday, 2609-2628. 2649, 2650.

Decrease of drunkenness in Limerick since the temperance movement on the part of the Redemptorist Fathers, 2629-2633—Frequency of poverty as a result of excessive drinking, 2638-2640—Decided advantage of earlier closing on Saturday, 2641-2643—Belief that the middle and lower classes would readily conform to a law which was meant for their good, 2644-2648—With regard to the difficulty of earlier closing on Saturday on the score of the late payment of wages, this would soon be obviated, 2651, 2652.

France. Satisfactory operation of the system in France of giving powers to liquor vendors to enforce order in their houses, Porter 1400. 1410-1414—Different circumstances of France and of Ireland as regards the opening of places for refreshment on Sundays, there being numerous working-men in France who labour on Sunday, ib. 1478-1481.

G.

Good Friday. Concurrence in a certain petition from Clonnel that the Bill should not include Good Friday and days of thanksgiving of the Roman Catholic Church as well as Sunday, De Gernon, 140-142.

H.

Hamilton Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Resident magistrate at Cork; has had considerable experience also in other parts of Ireland, 1061-1066—Opinion that the total closing of public-houses on Sunday would lead to much inconvenience, and would be justly objected to by the working classes, 1067-1071. 1124. 1153—Approval of a reduction of the present hours of opening; the limit might be from two to eight in summer, and from two to six in winter, 1070-1076. 1103. 1111. 1138, 1139. 1152—Question considered as to the necessity for the houses being opened so early as two o'clock; convenience in the case of men who want beer at dinner or after dinner, 1076-1085—Expediency of the same regulations being applied in Limerick as in Cork, 1087.

Greater evil arising from the late hour of closing on Saturday evening than on Sunday; very beneficial result if the hour for closing on Saturday were nine o'clock, 1089-1092. 1104. 1112. 1115. 1120-1123. 1133-1137. 1152—Objection to intermittent hours of opening on Sunday, 1093, 1094. 1131, 1132—Inoperativeness of any law requiring that drink sold on Sunday must not be drunk on the premises, 1097-1099. 1105. 1127-1130—Objection to any distinction in favour of eating-house keepers; evasion in such case of the object sought to be attained by closing public-houses 1100-1102. 1106.

Little, if any, inconvenience in the case of travellers and excursionists under the hours of closing contemplated by witness, 1107-1109. 1140-1147—Decrease of drunkenness in Cork owing to the increased price of provisions, 1109, 1110—Difficulty in Cork of carrying out a relaxation in favour of travellers, 1119—Less objection to total closing on Sunday in the country than in Cork, 1125, 1126—Practice of soldiers in Cork to frequent the public-houses on Sunday more than on other days, 1148-1151—Very few shebeen-houses in Cork, 1154.

Harvest Time. Obstacle to public-houses being closed at harvest time, when there is much excessive drinking, De Gernon 199-201.

Healy, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a grocer, spirit dealer, and licensed vintner at Cork, 2045, 2046—Considers that the Bill would be exceedingly injurious to the publicans in the districts around Cork frequented by excursionists on Sunday, 2047-2053—Very little drinking in Cork on Sunday, 2052—Belief that the proposed restrictions on Sunday would lead to much illicit traffic, and to the formation of shebeen-houses of a very low character, 2054, 2055. 2078-2084. 2110-2112. 2132-2140—Expediency of Sunday restrictions embracing other places besides public-houses where drink is sold, hotels being excepted as regards travellers, 2056. 2076, 2077. 2091-2093.

Great difficulty in requiring spirits not to be consumed on the premises; constant evasion of this regulation at the spirit grocers, 2057. 2064-2069. 2078-2083. 2117-2119. 2132-2137—Approval of the hour of closing on Sunday being nine o'clock; statement hereon that witness closes at eight o'clock, and is preparing to close altogether, 2058, 2059. 2084-2090. 2094-2103.

Great hardship to the working-classes if publicans and spirit grocers were obliged to close early on Saturday, as the late payment of wages would interfere with purchases; approval however of ten o'clock as the hour for closing, 2060-2077. 2084. 2106-2109. 2116-2121. 2142-2145—Explanation relative to the large reduction in the cases of drunkenness during an exceptional period when the public-houses were closed at six on Sunday, 2104, 2105. 2111—With regard to the long hours of labour of publicans' assistants, some relief on Sunday would doubtless be desirable, 2113-2115.

Contemplated closing of spirit grocers' shops at the same hour on Saturday as public-houses, 2118-2121—Increased consumption of beer and spirits in Cork, though drunkenness has not increased, 2122-2129—Conclusion that the Bill would be of no material benefit to the general public in Cork, whilst it would be grossly oppressive to a very large class, 2146-2149.

Health. Absence of inconvenience or injury through persons suddenly requiring stimulants on Sunday on the score of health, De Gernon, 208-212.

Hotels. Contemplated exception of hotels, unless where there were public bars, from the restriction as to sale of drink on Sunday, H. O'Donnell 1292. 1306, 1307; Barry 2033—Expediency of hotels being excepted as regards travellers, Miller 1792-1798; Healy 2092.

HOURS OF SALE (PUBLIC-HOUSES, &c.):

Regulation under Perrin's Act in 1833, by which the hours of sale on Sunday were from two to eleven o'clock, Wigham 4-6—Appointment in 1834 of a Committee to inquire into the operation of Perrin's Act, a further Act on the subject having been passed in 1836, which limited the hours of sale from two to nine o'clock, ib. 7-12. 57-67—Re-extension of the time of sale from two to eleven o'clock, under the operation of the Wine Licenses Act of 1860, ib. 13-18.

Improvement if instead of the Bill providing for the public-houses being open from two till four in the afternoon, and from eight to nine in the evening, there were but one period of opening, or from three to five, De Gernon 252-255. 280—Opinion that if any open time be allowed the best hours are from two to four, Ryan 302, 303; Sullivan 526—Abuse arising under the Beer Act of 1860, through the extension of the time of opening till eleven o'clock, Ryan 311.

HOURS OF SALE (PUBLIC-HOUSES, &c.)—continued.

If the houses are to be kept open for a limited time the best hours are from three to six, Ralph 597. 694—Opinion that the best hours are from two to four, or from three to five, Pillsworth 682.

Approval of some further limitation of the hours of opening of public-houses on Sunday; instead of from two to 11, the hours might be from three to eight, Lyons 719-732. 788—Expediency of the same hours, or from three to eight, being applied to all houses where intoxicating liquors are sold in any shape, ib. 752-759. 775.

Advantage of the hours of opening on Sunday being continuous rather than intermittent, Lyons 782, 783. 787. 804, 805; Hamilton 1093, 1094. 1131, 1132; Porter 1444-1449; Corr 1714; Miller 1741-1743; Barry 1863; McCabe 2267, 2268.

Opinion favourable to closing public-houses on Sunday excepting for one hour in the afternoon, when the drink sold should not be consumed on the premises, J. C. O'Donnell 932-939. 985, 986. 970-974. 1032—Approval of a reduction of the present hours of opening, the limit might be from two to eight in summer, and from two to six in winter, Hamilton 1070-1076. 1103. 1111. 1138, 1139. 1152—Question considered as to the necessity for the houses being opened so early as two o'clock; convenience in the case of men who want beer at dinner or after dinner, ib. 1076-1085.

Conclusion of the grocers assistants of Dublin that if the public-houses were open from two to five or six, and if eating-houses were similarly dealt with, no inconvenience of any moment would arise, whilst much benefit would result, H. O'Donnell 1165 et seq. Statement as to nine o'clock having been the hour of closing in Dublin on Sunday until 1860, ib. 1177-1180. 1256. 1268, 1269—Witness repeats that he is in favour of the hours for opening on Sunday being from two to five or six; he does not recommend total closing, ib. 1305-1315—Expediency, if the houses be open at all, of only one period of opening, and the shorter the better, Berkely 1326-1329. 1356-1358.

Doubt as to any benefit by closing earlier than eleven on Sunday night, Porter 1463-1465—Objection not only to total closing on Sunday, but to any limitation of the present hours, even though spirit grocers were included in the prohibition, Carey 1529-1533—Non-objection to the old law being reverted to, by which the hour of closing on Sunday was nine o'clock, Carey 1596; Barry 1861, 1862. 2002, 2003. 2039-2042.

Statement in favour of the hours of opening being from three to nine, and of all houses where liquor is sold being included in this regulation, Corr 1656-1661—Approval of the hour of closing on Sunday being nine o'clock; statement hereon that witness closes a eight o'clock, and is preparing to close altogether, Healy 2058, 2059. 2084-2090. 2094-2103—Evidence in support of the recommendation that the public-houses should be closed till three on Sunday, and should then be open till seven in summer and till five in winter, McCabe 2206-2213. 2272-2289.

Non-objection to a return to the former law by which the hour of closing on Sunday was nine o'clock; probable inconvenience, however, in the case of excursionists and others, O'Ferrall 2465-2473. 2490—Improvement upon the present system if the houses closed at eight or nine on Sunday, Fitzgerald 2588, 2589. 2635.

Adoption of motion, "that the hours for the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday, and the other days enumerated in the Bill, be from two p. m. till seven p. m.," except in certain towns, Rep. vii.—Resolution that in certain towns, as defined in the Bill, the hours be from 2 p. m. till 9 p. m., ib.

I.

Illicit Traffic. Belief that the passing of the Bill would have very injurious results, and that illicit trade in drink would greatly increase, Porter 1377 et seq.; Carey 1510-1512; Corr 1653-1655. 1683, 1684; Keegan, 2153-2158. 2163-2167; O'Ferrall 2423. 2429 et seq.—Injurious effect upon legitimate traders, whilst illegal traffic would be fostered by a prohibitory enactment, Porter 1455-1462.

Opinion that a large illicit traffic would not result from earlier closing on Saturday, and total closing on Sunday; attempt, however, would probably be made to open shebeen houses, Miller 1763, 1764. 1771-1775. 1801-1805.

Grounds for concluding that the Bill will not prevent nor diminish Sunday drinking, as illegal traffic in drink is sure to arise, and to a most injurious extent if the law is made more penal, Barry 1843-1859. 1895-1898—Great difficulty of preventing through means only of the police all illicit trade in liquor, ib. 1899-1907—Belief that the proposed restrictions on Sunday would lead to much illicit traffic, and to the formation of shebeen-houses of a very low character, Barry 1985-2001. 2012-2022. 2028-2030; Healy 2054, 2055. 2078-2084. 2110-2112. 2132-2140.

K.

Keegan, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Secretary to the United Trades Association of Dublin, 2150, 2151—Strong feeling on the part of the tradesmen of Dublin against the Bill, 2152—Conclusion that the proposed restrictions upon the sale of liquor on Sunday will lead to a great amount of secret or illicit drinking, and will have no effect in diminishing drunkenness in Dublin, 2153–2158. 2163–2167—Large numbers of the trading class of Dublin who go into the suburbs on Sunday, and to whom the proposed restrictions would cause great inconvenience and irritation, 2153.

Very injurious effect of the proposed requirement that liquor sold on Sunday must not be consumed at the public-houses; grounds for this opinion considered, 2159. 2168–2177—Strong objection by the working classes to being compelled to drink at their homes; question considered as to the data for such objection, 2159, 2160. 2168–2177—Objection made to the Bill, on the score of its involving class legislation, 2160—Grounds for concluding that the working classes of Dublin are not, as a rule, drunkards, 2161, 2162.

Admission as to a large class of persons being induced to indulge in drink on Sunday merely by the temptation thrown in their way, 2178–2180—Explanation that witness has no direct authority to represent the opinions of the Dublin trades, 2181–2188—General feeling of the trades as to the immense inconvenience to be caused by closing earlier than the present hour on Saturday night; late payment of wages adverted to hereon, 2188, 2189.

Kilmore Diocese. Voluntary closing of public-houses on Sunday in the Roman Catholic archdiocese of Kilmore, Wigham 114.

Kingstown. Hardship if the public houses at Kingstown and elsewhere were closed all day on Sunday, M^cCabe 2204, 2205. 2210. 2222—Obstacles to any effectual check by witness to intemperance at Kingstown, ib. 2310–2313.

L.

Leahy, the Most Rev. Dr. Patrick. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Roman Catholic Archbishop of Cashel, 381—Outline of the steps taken by witness during the last eleven years for the propagation of temperance in his diocese, 382—Gradual manner in which witness introduced the Sunday temperance law into the diocese, under which ecclesiastical law there is no sale of liquors on Sunday, except in the case of travellers, and in cases of necessity, 382–386—Since 1861, the law has been in full force throughout the whole diocese, 384—Definition of a traveller as a person who had gone seven Irish miles from home, 387, 388—Exceedingly beneficial operation of the law in diminishing intemperance, and in improving the moral habits of the people, 389 et seq.

Very general feeling of the people, and of the public-house keepers, in strong approval of the prohibition upon the sale of liquors on Sunday, 391–393. 447—Very little evasion of the law, 394–396—Less strict compliance with the law in Tipperary than in other towns, 394—Exceptional instance of a Protestant public-house in the diocese kept open on Sunday, 395—Opinion of Protestant magistrates in the diocese, and of Protestants generally, as well as Roman Catholics, in favour of the law introduced by witness, 395. 492, 493.

Impossibility of efficiently carrying out an ecclesiastical or voluntary law in all the dioceses in Ireland; difficulty wherever there are large towns, 397–399. 434, 435—Evidence strongly in favour of an Act of Parliament for the closing of public-houses throughout Ireland on Sunday; belief that it could be easily and effectually enforced if the authorities were but vigilant, 400–404. 422 et seq.—Slight difficulty anticipated in the case of travellers, as an exception under a compulsory law, 403, 404. 437.

Detailed statement in further explanation of the various means adopted by witness in the introduction and the enforcement of the Sunday temperance law in his diocese, 406.

Absence of large towns in other dioceses, as well as Cashel, 407, 408—Single instance of witness having had to speak publicly of any person for infringement of the law, 409—Excellent observance of the Lord's Day throughout the diocese as compared with its former desecration, 409. 438–441. 477–479—Statistics of the amount of drunkenness on Sunday before and since the introduction of witness's measure; very gratifying diminution since 1861; 410–413. 418, 419. 470.—Increase in the rate of wages, whilst drunkenness has been decreasing, 414–417.

Non-adoption in other dioceses of the same plan as in Cashel, the bishops being apprehensive of failure, 420, 421—With regard to the unsatisfactory result of compulsory Sunday closing in Scotland, the same inference must not be drawn as regards Ireland, on account of the different character and habits of the two people, 424, 425—

Opinion

Opinion that in towns too many public-houses are licensed, 426—Similar excesses consequent upon partial opening of public-houses on Sunday, as upon opening for the whole day, 427-430.

Absence of increase of private or home drinking since the closing of the public-houses, 442-444—Increased temperance on week-days as well as on Sunday, 445—Important diminution of crime as well as of drunkenness, 446—Decided objection to the provisions of the present Bill, by which the public-houses are to be open for two or three hours on Sunday; necessity of total closing, 450. 456-463. 482-485. 494. 495—Belief that after a time the people would generally become fully reconciled to total closing under Act of Parliament, 451, 452.

Less evil if people were to drink at home on Sunday than if they drank at public-houses; belief that there would not, however, be any increase of private drinking, 453, 454. 473-476—Prohibition in Cashel diocese upon the sale of liquors in eating-houses and hotels, as well as public-houses, 455—Objection to the proposal that drink may be sold, but not consumed, on the premises on Sunday, 457-459—Slight mischief apprehended as regards the loss of trade by publicans under a compulsory enactment, 464. 471, 472.

Non-increase of shebeen-houses in Cashel diocese since the voluntary closing of public-houses, 465, 466—Very few dancing-houses in the diocese, 467-469—Doubt as to the general adoption of a law if permissive, whereas, if compulsory, it would be effectually carried out, with the aid of the clergy, 480, 481. 486-493—Objection to permission to sell beer on Sunday, on account of the facility to people to procure whisky also, 482-485.

Licenses. Similar excise license granted to all classes of public-houses, and to confectioners' shops, De Gernon 272-274—Explanation of the present practice in witness's district in regard to the granting of licenses; expediency of limiting the number, Ryan 305. 313-317—Opinion that in towns too many public-houses are licensed, Rev. Dr. Leahy 426—Witness considers that if the licensing system were altered it would be very desirable to prohibit the sale of liquor in public-houses in Dublin on Sundays, Ralph 580-589. 635, 636—Suggestion that there be but one form of license for the sale of spirits and beer, whether by publicans or by grocers, and that the amount be assessed according to the valuation of the premises, ib. 605-610. 615-634.

Explanation of the practice at Belfast in the licensing of public-houses by the recorder, and by the magistrates respectively; frequent sale of the license by auction, Lindsay 889-897. 906, 907—Opinion in favour of licenses being granted only by one court, that of the recorder, ib. 918, 919—Explanation that witness would, on the whole, prefer that licenses should be granted by the magistrates in conjunction with the recorder, instead of by the recorder alone, ib. 1060—Particulars relative to the course of procedure in the issue of licenses at Belfast; anomaly of the twofold jurisdiction exercised in the matter by the recorder, J. C. O'Donnell 971-973. 987-989. 1033.

Injurious operation of the system of excise licenses, Berkeley 1331, 1332—Approval of licenses for the sale of beer, spirits, &c., coupled with strict requirements as to the character of the persons to whom granted, and enlarged powers in their hands for the preservation of orders in their houses, and for refusing to supply drink in excess, Porter 1399-1401. 1410-1414. 1425-1428. 1433-1439—Suggestion that licenses in Dublin should be granted by the divisional justices, instead of by the recorder or court of quarter sessions, ib. 1415-1419—Facility of evading the provisions of the Bill by taking out revenue licenses; question hereon whether these licenses might not without difficulty be vintned under the bill, Carey 1522-1524. 1545-1549—Prejudicial effect upon licensed vintners if licenses were made uniform; large capital sunk by the vintners in their houses, ib. 1590-1595. 1640, 1641.

Great evil under the present system of revenue licenses to spirit grocers and beer sellers, as facilitating excessive drinking at prohibited hours; expediency of one uniform system of license, Corr 1669-1682. 1685-1689—Undue facility with which licenses are obtained in Ireland; check applied in the district about Lurgan, Miller 1753-1755—Great benefit to be derived from increased care in the granting of licenses, ib. 1790, 1791—Amendments required in the licensing law rather than in the Sunday trade in liquors, Barry 1982, 1983.

Expediency of amendment in the practice in Dublin of granting licenses; evils of the system of excise licenses, McCabe 2256-2263—Careful inquiry at Limerick before licenses are granted, O'Shaughnessy 2372—Claim of the publican to some reduction on the cost of a license if prohibited from selling drink on Sunday, O'Ferrall 2423-2428—Evils of the present system by which spirit grocers and beerhouse keepers are licensed to sell drink; expediency of placing the licenses on an improved footing, ib. 2450-2460. 2666.

Disapproval of the passing of the Bill, unless at the same time, or previously, the system of licensing is altered, and grocers' shops and beerhouses are placed on a proper footing, O'Ferrall 2466. 2474-2489. 2501-2504—Difficulty in amending the system

Limerick. Necessity of an increased police force in Limerick, in order to carry out further restrictions on the sale of drink on Sunday, O'Shaughnessy 2337-2339. 2408, 2409, 2413-2417—Explanation relative to the great diminution lately in the amount of drunkenness at Limerick, ib. 2344-2350. 2369-2371—Statement as to the voluntary closing for a time of the public-houses on Sunday, and as to the absence of any serious inconvenience or complaint during this period, ib. 2351-2365. 2368.

Greater amount of drinking in Limerick on Sunday than on any other day, FitzGerald 2566—Very general feeling in Limerick in favour of Sunday closing: belief that a large majority would sanction the adoption of a permissive Bill on the subject, ib. 2567 et seq.—Belief that a majority of the publicans would willingly accept a law enjoining total closing, ib. 2569-2574. 2592. 2595, 2596—Admission that the drunkards in witness's parish form a very small minority of the population; there is however excessive drinking on Sunday, ib. 2609-2628. 2649, 2650—Decrease of drunkenness since the temperance movement on the part of the Redemptorist Fathers, ib. 2629-2633.

Lindsay, Robert. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a merchant and manufacturer at Belfast, and an alderman and magistrate of the borough, 806, 807—Is strongly in favour of the total closing of public-houses on Sunday; and considers it quite practicable to carry out a law to that effect, 808-810. 860-862—Detailed information, as obtained from police sources, as to the large amount of drunkenness in Belfast, and the injurious effect of drunkenness in leading to crime, 811, 812—Instance of the excellent effect of closing the public-houses as a check upon rioting, 812.

Very large population of Belfast, and extent of the area of the borough, 813-816—Circumstance of 146 public-houses being closed voluntarily on Sunday, out of a total of 535 public-houses, 816. 869—Feeling of many of the publicans in favour of compulsory closing, ib.—Injurious operation of the spirit-grocers' shops, spirits being largely sold in them in the night-time, and consumed on the premises in evasion of the law, 816, 817. 854. 879-884.

Evidence as to the very strong and wide-spread feeling in Belfast in favour of the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday; belief that at least three-fourths of the inhabitants would approve of compulsory prohibition, 817-824. 828-840. 869-874. 898.—Unanimity of a large public meeting, held in March 1867, in favour of total closing, 817-819. 871-874—Large proportion of public-houses in the town, 819. 889—Views of certain of the police authorities of Belfast as to the large amount of drunkenness consequent upon the opening of the public-houses on Sunday from two till eleven o'clock, 824-827. 853-855.

Very limited amount of inconvenience which might result from total closing on Sunday. small per-centage of the population in whose case inconvenience might arise, 841-847. 856-859—Limitation of late of the number of licenses issued, the number of public-houses having been excessive, 819—Consideration of the measures desirable for preventing the abuse which now arises from the sale of whisky by spirit grocers; witness would suggest that every spirit-grocer's license should be withdrawn, 854. 863-866.

Opinion in favour of the public-houses being closed from eight o'clock on Saturday evening till Monday morning, 860-862—Uselessness of a measure allowing the sale of drinks on Sunday not to be consumed on the premises, 864-868. 875-878—Considerable sacrifice made by those publicans who now close voluntarily on Sunday, 885-888. 899-901. 908-913—Explanation of the practice in the licensing of public-houses by the recorder, and by the magistrates respectively; frequent sale of the license by auction, 889-897. 906, 907.

Probable establishment of an increased number of tea and coffee-houses if public-houses were closed throughout Sunday, 902—Apprehended evasion of the law in the event of a provision that travellers may be supplied with liquor at public-houses or at eating-houses, 903-905. 914-917. 920, 921. 924—Opinion in favour of licensing being granted only by one court, that of the recorder, 918, 919—Great boon to the labouring classes if Sunday closing be enforced, 922—Inconsistency in not closing public-houses as well as bakers' shops and butchers' shops, 923—Belief that working people would not establish Sunday drinking clubs in the event of the public-houses being closed, 925.

[Second Examination.] Explanation that witness would on the whole prefer that licenses should be granted by the magistrates in conjunction with the recorder, instead of by the recorder alone, 1060. Loss

Loss of Trade. Slight mischief apprehended as regards the loss of trade by publicans under a compulsory enactment as to Sunday closing, Rev. Dr. Leahy 464. 471, 472; Pillsworth 674-678—Considerable sacrifice made by those publicans who now close voluntarily on Sunday, Lindsay 885-888. 899-901. 908-913—Ruinous effect of total closing upon the public-houses in the suburbs or rural district about Dublin, Carey 1517-1522—Nature of the claim of publicans to keep their houses open on Sunday, whilst other shops are closed, Carey 1561-1563. 1610-1615; Barry 1941-1943. 2009-2011—Exceedingly injurious effect of the Bill upon numerous public-houses in the suburbs of Cork, whose principal trade is on Sunday; great injury also to the licensed houses generally, Barry 1833-1842. 1888. 1908-1933. 1979-1981—There are in the suburbs of Dublin 57 public-houses deriving their chief support from Sunday business, O'Ferrall 2428.

Lyons, Francis. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Mayor of Cork, 701—Apprehension lest the closing of public-houses in Cork on Sunday would induce people to lay in a stock of whisky on Saturday, instead of their sending for beer on Sunday, 704-706. 743—Occurrence of drunkenness in Cork, chiefly in the public-houses, and not at the houses of the people, 706-708—Numerous cases of drunkenness for trial on Monday morning, these arising however more from excess on Saturday evening than on Sunday, 709, 710.

Opinion that in country districts the sale of drink on Sunday may be altogether prohibited with advantage, and without any serious hardship, 711-715. 736. 774. 785-792—Belief that in Cork and other large towns it would be impracticable to stop the sale of spirits, beer, &c., and that it would moreover be attended with considerable hardship, 716-718. 736-741. 765-770. 774—Approval of some further limitation of the hours of opening of public-houses on Sunday; instead of from two to eleven, the hours might be from three to eight, 719-732. 738.

Advantage if public-houses were closed earlier on Saturday evening, or at nine o'clock, 732-735. 760, 761—Grounds for preferring that liquor should be sold to be drunk on the premises, rather than elsewhere, 742-751—Feeling in Cork opposed to total closing on Sunday, but not to restricted opening, 747. 798-803.

Expediency of the same hours, or from three to eight, being applied to all houses where intoxicating liquors are sold in any shape, 752-759. 775-781—Improvement if wages were paid on Friday, 762, 763—Effect of the increased price of whisky in diminishing the amount of drunkenness, 771-773—Approval of the public-houses being open for one continuous period, rather than for intermittent hours, 782, 783. 787. 804, 805—Hardship to those employed in public-houses through not being at leisure on Sunday, 784. 793-797.

M.

McCabe, The Rev. Edward (Canon). (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was for about nine years parish priest of St. Nicholas, Dublin, where there is a very large labouring population; is now parish priest of Kingstown, 2190-2196—Decrease of drunkenness in Dublin, as the people have become more educated and better off, 2197-2199—Considerable amount of drunkenness still to be seen on the evenings of Saturday and Sunday, 2200-2203. 2214—Hardship if the public-houses at Kingstown and elsewhere were closed all day on Sunday, 2204, 2205. 2210. 2222.

Evidence in support of the recommendation that the public-houses should be closed till three on Sunday, and should then be open till seven in summer and till five in winter, 2206-2213—Expediency of removing temptation from that large class who are led to indulge in drink merely from social habit, 2214, 2215—Belief as to there being much illicit drinking in Dublin before two o'clock on Sunday, 2216-2219—Temporary success of an attempt to close voluntarily the public-houses in Thomas-street on Sunday, 2219, 2220.

Belief that, a reasonable hour being allowed for refreshment, the working classes would, as a rule, willingly submit to increased restriction on Sunday, 2221, 2222. 2240—General feeling of the women in favour of increased restriction, 2221. 2240—Great mischief consequent upon the sale of drink late on Saturday evening, 2223—Statement strongly in favour of public-houses, beer-shops, and spirit-grocers' shops being closed on Saturday at nine o'clock; belief that but limited inconvenience would arise on account of the late payment of wages, 2224-2239. 2290-2296.

Exceedingly mischievous operation of beer-houses in Dublin, so that witness would abolish them altogether, 2226. 2260-2263—Great importance of some restriction upon the hours of opening in the interests of those employed in public-houses, 2241-2247—Inadequacy of the present supervision in regard to the sale of drink on Sunday morning, 2248-2255. 2271. 2306-2308—Expediency of amendment in the practice of granting licenses; evils of the system of Excise licenses, 2256-2263.

Dissent from the proposal in the Bill that drink sold on Sunday must not be drunk where it is purchased, 2264-2268. 2282—Objection to two different periods of opening on Sunday, 2267, 2268—Necessity of including eating-houses in the operation of the

Bill, 2269, 2270—Further statement as to the reasons for postponing till three o'clock the hour of Sunday opening, 2272-2281—Statement in further support of closing the houses at seven o'clock in summer, 2283-2289.

Impracticability of carrying out in Dublin or Kingstown the system of voluntary closing adopted through the influence of the clergy in the archdioceses of Cashel and Wexford, 2309, 2310—Obstacles to any effectual check by witness to intemperance at Kingstown, 2310-2313—Doubt whether the provisions of the Bill would be adopted if it were permissive to municipal bodies to take action in the matter, 2314-2320—Necessity of all houses where intoxicating drinks are sold being subject to the proposed restrictions, 2321.

Miller, Moore. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Resident magistrate at Armagh; has been in the county since 1846; 1717-1719—Considers it desirable that all houses for the sale of intoxicating drinks should be totally closed on Sunday 1720 et seq.—Evasion of the law, and dissatisfaction to publicans, if refreshment houses were open whilst public-houses were closed, 1724, 1725. 1757-1761—Belief that the lower classes would not be dissatisfied because the upper classes would still have an opportunity of obtaining drink at their clubs or at hotels; the latter should supply only to travellers, 1726-1728. 1792-1798.

Exception contemplated in the case of travellers; this could be carried out without difficulty, 1729-1732—Little, if any, inconvenience in Armagh, Lurgan, &c., through people not being able to frequent eating-houses on Sunday, 1729. 1740, 1741—Slight inconvenience anticipated as regards excursionists into the suburbs of towns if the public-houses were closed, 1733-1739. 1776-1785—Advantage, if the public-houses be open at all of the period of opening being continuous rather than intermittent, 1741-1743.

Much more intoxication on Saturday evening than on Sunday, it being exceedingly desirable to close the public-houses earlier on Saturday, say at seven o'clock, 1744-1751. 1765-1775—Statement that the amount of intoxication upon Sunday is not a crying evil, and is not on the increase, 1746-1765—Consideration as to the time of payment of wages on Saturday night, with reference to the question of the time of closing the public-houses and spirit-grocers' shops, 1748-1751. 1786-1789. 1806—Undue facility with which licenses are obtained in Ireland; check applied in the district about Lurgan, 1753-1755.

Belief that a large illicit traffic would not result from earlier closing on Saturday, and total closing on Sunday; attempts, however, would probably be made to open shebeen-houses, 1763, 1764. 1771-1775. 1801-1805—Great benefit to be derived from increased care in the granting of licenses, 1790, 1791—Approval of the refreshment rooms at railway stations being still open on Sunday, as being intended for travellers, 1807-1809.

Monday (Excess of Drinking). Apprehended increase of drinking on Monday if the public-houses are entirely closed on Sunday, Porter 1405, 1406. 1422-1424.

N

New York. Prohibition in force for the last two or three years upon the sale of liquors in New York on Sunday: very salutary operation thereof in diminishing drunkenness and crime, Field 2514 et seq.—Effectual check through the police upon the illegal sale of drink on Sunday, ib. 2537-2539. 2548, 2549—Considerable drinking on Saturday night, the public-houses being open till twelve o'clock: advantage hereon in wages being paid by some employers on Monday, ib. 2540-2544.

North of Ireland. Long period for which in the north of Ireland there has been a movement in favour of Sunday closing, Wigham, 97, 98—Unanimous opinion of the Presbyterian body in the north of Ireland in favour of the compulsory prohibition of the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday, Berkeley 1317-1321. 1374, 1375—Little, if any, inconvenience to the working classes in the north of Ireland in being prevented from purchasing beer on Sunday for consumption with their meals: practice generally of the people not to drink at home but only in the public-houses, ib. 1322, 1323. 1333. 1349.

Number of Public-houses. Opinion in favour of limiting the number of licenses and of public-houses, Ryan 305.

O

O'Donnell Hugh. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is manager of a wholesale grocery and spirit establishment in Dublin, represents on the present occasion the grocers' assistants of Dublin, 1157-1161—Opinion of the assistants that if eating-houses and beer-houses are restricted in the same way as public-houses, total closing on Sunday may fairly be enforced, 1162-1165—Increased number of eating-houses and beer-houses, and consequent evasion of prohibitory regulations, if total closing on Sunday refers only to public-houses, 1163. 1193-1195.

Conclusion of the grocers' assistants, that if the public-houses were open from two to five or six, and if eating-houses were similarly dealt with, no inconvenience of any moment would arise, whilst much benefit would result, 1165 et seq.—Very long hours of daily labour of assistants in public-houses and grocery establishments, so that a curtailment of the hours on Sunday would be a great boon to a numerous class, 1166–1183. 1270–1281—Statement as to nine o'clock having been the hour of closing on Sunday until 1860; 1177–1180. 1256. 1268, 1269—Obstacle to any enforcement of the regulation that liquor when sold must not be consumed on the premises, 1184–1189. 1264, 1265.

Belief that but little inconvenience would arise if the Dublin eating-houses were open only from two to five as regards the sale of drink, 1196–1202. 1229–1250—Absence of any sensible inconvenience to travellers and excursionists by closing the public-houses at five or six, 1203–1207. 1226–1228—Less inconvenience of total closing on Sunday in a place like Sligo than in Dublin, 1208–1213. 1224, 1225—Advantage if on Saturday evening the public-houses were closed at ten, 1214–1223. 1251, 1252—Question as to the mode of dealing with the eating-houses further considered: probable evasion of the law if allowed to be open longer than public-houses, even though subject to penalties for selling drink after a certain hour, 1229–1241. 1265–1267. 1283–1292. 1305–1311.

Expected jealousy among the lower classes if public-houses were closed on Sunday whilst club-houses were open, 1253–1255. 1299–1304—Suggestion that on week-days public houses should be closed at ten instead of eleven, 1257–1262—Contemplated exemption of hotels, unless where there were public bars, from the restrictions as to sale of drink on Sunday, 1292. 1306, 1307—Practice of soldiers in Dublin to frequent the public-houses on Sunday more than on other days, 1296–1298—Witness repeats that he is in favour of the hours for opening on Sunday being from two to five or six; he does not recommend total closing, 1305–1315.

O'Donnell, John Charles. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is resident magistrate at Belfast, 926–928—Large number of cases of drunkenness dealt with by witness every Monday morning, the majority of these arising from excess on Saturday night, 929–931. 974–976. 1027–1029—Opinion favourable to closing public-houses on Sunday except for one hour in the afternoon, when the drink sold should not be consumed on the premises, 932–939. 985, 986. 970, 971. 1032—Suggestion that on Saturday evening the public-houses should be closed at nine, on account of the excessive drinking after that hour, 938. 974–976. 1027–1032.

Dissatisfaction apprehended if total closing on Sunday were compulsory, 940—Vigilance necessary in order to prevent consumption on the premises on Sunday, 941, 942—Improbability of rooms or houses being provided near the public-houses in order to facilitate the consumption of drink, if forbidden at the latter after purchase, 943, 944. 993–1010—Statement in favour of eating-houses being still allowed to be open on Sunday and to supply drink; check, through the license, upon any abuse, 945–953. 980.

Limited extent to which the closing of public-houses in Belfast on Sunday would be inconvenient as regards the travelling class; difficulty of any distinction in favour of this class, 954–956. 977–982—Impossibility of a general and voluntary closing of public-houses in Belfast on Sunday through the interference of the Roman Catholic clergy, 958–960—Much greater facility in carrying out a prohibition upon Sunday trade in liquors in rural districts than in towns: advantage in such districts of the moral influence of the Roman Catholic clergy, 962–969. 1016–1026.

Particulars relative to the course of procedure in the issue of licenses at Belfast: anomaly of the two-fold jurisdiction exercised in the matter by the recorder, 971–973. 987–989. 1033—Further statement in favour of the requirement that drink sold on Sunday should not be consumed on the premises, 990–1010—Contemplated closing of spirit-grocers' houses as well as of public-houses, 1013–1015.

Explanation on the subject of the transfer of public-houses in the town, large sums being sometimes given for the license, or rather for the good-will, 1034–1039—Considerable sum represented by the actual cost of the licenses, 1042–1046—Large sale of drink in unlicensed houses; penalties in such case, 1047–1050—Severe penalties inflicted for party cries, this offence being chiefly owing to drunkenness, 1051–1054—Improbability of any increase of shebeen-houses if the Bill be passed, 1055–1059.

O'Ferrall, John Lewis. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Commissioner of Metropolitan Police of Dublin, 2421—Submits a Report of the Commissioners upon the present Bill; various reasons assigned therein for the conclusion that the Bill will not effect the object for which intended, 2422, 2423—Claim of the publican to some reduction in the cost of a license, if prohibited from selling drink on Sunday, 2423–2428—Apprehension, lest the Bill would lead to a great increase of illicit drinking in beer-houses and spirit-grocers' grocers' shops, there being great facilities for evasion of the law by these places, 2423. 2429 et seq.

Increased resort to spirit-grocers and beer-sellers, accordingly as the hours of opening of public-houses are restricted, 2429-2436. 2461-2463. 2471-2473. 2501—Suggestions by the Dublin Commissioners for an amendment of the present system in regard to the sale of spirits by spirit-grocers, 2450—Evils of the present system by which spirit-grocers and beer-house keepers are licensed to sell drink; expediency of placing the licenses on an improved footing, 2450-2460. 2466—Non-objection to a return to the former law by which the hour of closing on Sunday was nine o'clock; probable inconvenience however in the case of excursionists and others, 2465-2473. 2490.

Disapproval of the passing of the Bill, unless at the same time, or previously, the system of licensing is altered, and grocers' shops and beer-houses are placed on a proper footing, 2466. 2474-2489. 2501-2504—Statement as to a decrease rather than an increase of drunkenness having followed upon the extension of the hour from nine to eleven o'clock, 2466. 2498-2500—Difficulty in amending the system of licenses, without injuring the revenue, 2491, 2492—Suggestion that a magistrate's certificate should be necessary before the grant of a license to a spirit-grocer or beer-house keeper; penalty desirable upon the cancelling of such license, 2493-2496.

Inoperativeness of the Bill, if it limits the houses to the sale of drink, without allowing it to be drunk on the premises, 2502—Opinion that total closing on Sunday could not be carried out at the present time, 2505—Doubt lest the earlier closing of public-houses on Saturday night would produce more harm than good, 2506-2508—Further statement that illicit drinking in beers-hops, &c., in Dublin, already very prevalent, would be much increased if there were increased restrictions upon the hours of opening of public-houses, 2508-2513—Suggestion that the penalty for drunkenness on Sunday be increased from 5 s. to 10 s.; 2513.

O'Shaughnessy, Dr. James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a surgeon and a magistrate at Limerick, and has resided there for thirty years, 2322-2325—Considers that the total closing of public-houses on Sunday would be extremely beneficial in Limerick, and in the counties around, and would not cause much inconvenience, 2326-2335. 2340. 2376-2378. 2410-2412—Feeling of the people, as a rule, in favour of total closing, 2336. 2341-2343. 2366. 2410-2412—Necessity of an increased police force in Limerick, in order to carry out further restrictions on the sale of drink on Sunday, 2337-2339. 2408, 2409. 2413-2417.

Explanation relative to the great diminution lately in the amount of drunkenness at Limerick, 2344-2350. 2369-2371—Statement as to the voluntary closing for a time of the public-houses on Sunday, and as to the absence of any serious inconvenience or complaint during the time, 2351-2365. 2368—Belief that nine-tenths of the crime throughout Ireland may be attributed to drink, 2367—Careful inquiry at Limerick before licenses are granted, 2372—Great want of an improved system as regards beer-house licenses, 2373-2375.

Uselessness of the provision of the Bill, that drink sold on Sunday must not be consumed on the premises, 2379-2382—Necessity of restrictions, embracing all houses where intoxicating drinks are sold, 2383, 2384—Inoperativeness of the Bill, unless supported by the moral opinion of the people themselves, 2386, 2387—Doubt as to any jealous feeling arising, that the Bill involved class legislation, 2389-2392.

Importance of the public-houses being closed on Saturday at ten o'clock, 2393-2397—Feeling of a large number of the publicans and spirit-grocers of Limerick in favour of earlier closing on Saturday, 2397-2399—Conclusion as to intemperance being a very general cause of poverty, 2400-2406—Impression that cases of drunkenness in Limerick are more numerous on Saturday than on Sunday, 2418-2420.

Penalties. Importance of severe penalty in the event of publicans abusing their licenses, or of the public being violent, in order to procure drink, Porter 1462. 1482, 1483—Suggestion that the penalty for drunkenness on Sunday be increased from 5 s. to 10 s., O'Ferrall 2513.

Permissive Law. Improbability of a general adoption of a permissive law, Rev. Dr. Leahy 480, 481. 488-490—Doubt whether the provisions of the Bill would be adopted, if it were permissive to municipal bodies to take action in the matter, Mr. Cane 2314-2320—Evidence in approval of a permissive Bill, and of its application being left to local bodies and to public opinion, Fitzgerald 2567 et seq.; 2601, 2602. 2646-2648.

Perrin's Act (1833). Closing of public-houses on Sunday in Ireland previously to Mr.

Mr. Perrin's Act, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 68, under which Act the sale of liquors on Sunday was legalised from two o'clock to eleven o'clock, Wigham 3-6—State of public opinion before the passing of Perrin's Act adverted to; increase of drunkenness after the passing of the Act, ib. 89-93. 99, 100.

Petitions. Influential movement set on foot in Dublin in 1866 in favour of total closing on Sunday; numerous signed petitions subsequently adopted, Wigham 24-34. 68-71. 86-88—Very few petitions against the Bill for Sunday closing, ib. 35, 36.

Comment upon the manner in which petitions have been got up in favour of the Bill, Carey 1570, 1571—Explanation as to the petitions against the Bill, and as to the success attendant upon the exertions used by the Vintners' Association to promote opposition to the Bill, ib. 1571-1589—Information on the subject of certain petitions from Cork, one in favour and one opposed to the Bill; comment upon the mode in which signatures were procured to the former, Barry 1944-1963. 2023-2027.

Pillsworth, Patrick. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Grocer and spirit merchant in Dublin; is owner of three public-houses there, 663-669—Closing of witness's houses on Sunday; failure of an attempt by him to induce several other dealers to keep their places permanently closed on that day, 670-673—Doubt as to closing on Sunday causing any very serious loss to the owners of public-houses, 674-678—Probable evasion of a law for compulsory closing, though many houses would observe the law, 680—Expediency of a provision that drink sold on Sunday must not be consumed on the premises, 681.

Mischievous operation of the beer-houses in Dublin, 681. 700—If open for a limited time on Sunday, the best hours are from two to four or from three to five, 682—Slight inconvenience, through inability to procure drink for supper on Sunday, 683—Expediency of only one form of license, 684-689—Limited extent to which persons would club together to drink elsewhere if the public-houses were closed, 692-699—Expediency of eating-houses being controlled by the Bill, as regards the sale of liquor on Sunday, 699, 700.

Porter, Frank Thorp. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was magistrate at the head police office in Dublin for twenty years, 1376—Is opposed to any restriction relative to the opening of public-houses on Sunday; considers that in Dublin an immense illicit traffic would spring up, and that there would be as much intoxication as at present, 1377 et seq.—Doubt as to any benefit arising from the existing restrictions, as those who are inclined to drink contrive to do so at illicit hours, 1380-1382—Great improvement within witness's experience in the moral habits of the lower classes; much less intemperance than formerly, 1389-1393.

Willingness of the people to be influenced by their clergy in regard to voluntary closing of public-houses on Sunday; very general dissatisfaction and evasion if there were a compulsory measure, 1394-1397. 1471-1476. 1486, 1487—Approval of licenses for the sale of beer, spirits, &c., coupled with strict requirements as to the character of the persons to whom granted, and enlarged powers in their hands for the preservation of orders in their houses, and for refusing to supply drink in excess, 1399-1401. 1410-1414. 1425-1428. 1433-1439—Satisfactory operation of the system in France of giving powers to liquor vendors to enforce orders in their houses, 1400. 1410-1414.

Further statement that those who really wish for liquor will contrive to get it all the same even if the public-houses are closed; probability, however, of the removal of temptation being beneficial to some extent, 1402-1409. 1425—Apprehended increase of drinking on Monday if the public-houses are entirely closed on Sunday, 1405, 1406. 1422-1424—Advantage in making the publican accountable for the sobriety of those frequenting his house; non-objection in such case to licenses being very freely given, or to the houses being open for longer periods than at present, 1408. 1425-1428. 1433-1435. 1439, 1440. 1477. 1482, 1483.

Large amount of illicit traffic in drinking in Dublin, 1409. 1429-1432—Suggestion that licenses in Dublin should be granted by the divisional justices, instead of by the recorder or court of quarter sessions, 1415-1419—Recommendation that spirit-grocers should receive the same form of license as public-house keepers, 1420, 1421. 1436-1438—Doubt as to the expediency of any legislative measure for the protection of those employed in public-houses as regards their hours of labour, 1441-1443.

Advantage of the hours of opening on Sunday being continuous rather than intermittent, 1444-1449—Expected evasion of the requirement that liquor sold on Sunday must not be drunk on the premises, 1450-1454—Injurious effect upon legitimate traders, whilst illegal traffic would be fostered, by a prohibitory enactment, 1455-1462—Inconvenience to excursionists in the suburbs of Dublin if unable to procure beer, &c. in the evening of Sunday, 1457-1461.

Importance of severe penalty in the event of publicans abusing their licenses, or of the public being violent in order to procure drink, 1462. 1482, 1483—Doubt as to any benefit by closing earlier than eleven on Sunday night, 1463-1465—Question also whether any advantage would be gained if the houses were closed earlier on Saturday, 1466-1470—Different circumstances of France and of Ireland as regards the opening of places of refreshment on Sunday, there being numerous working men in France who labour on Sunday, 1478-1481—Doubt as to the opening of public-houses on Sunday having any effect in facilitating disaffection to Government, 1484, 1485.

Poverty. Conclusion as to intemperance being a very general cause of poverty, O'Shaughnessy 2400-2405; Fitzgerald 2638-2640.

Presbyterians. See North of Ireland.

Private Drinking. Conclusion that very little abuse would arise through persons assembling to drink in private houses, if public-houses were closed, De Gernon 158-167. 213-215—Less abuse in connection with card-playing in private houses than in public-houses, ib. 182-185. 245—Absence of increase of private or home drinking in Cashel diocese since the closing of the public-houses, Rev. Dr. Leahy 442-444—Less evil if people were to drink at home on Sunday than if they drunk at public-houses; belief that there would not, however, be any increase of private drinking, ib. 453, 454. 473-476.

Public, The. Very general feeling of the people in Cashel diocese and of the public-house keepers, in strong approval of the prohibition upon the sale of liquors on Sunday, Rev. Dr. Leahy 391-393. 447—Opinion of Protestant magistrates in the diocese and of Protestants generally, as well as Roman Catholics, in favour of the law introduced by witness, ib. 395. 492, 493—Belief that after a time the people would generally become reconciled to total closing under Act of Parliament, ib. 451, 452—Expectation that the people would soon be quite satisfied with compulsory regulations for closing public-houses on Sunday, though at first they might consider it class legislation, Sullivan 507. 536-538—Dissatisfaction apprehended if total closing on Sunday were compulsory, J. C. O'Donnell 940—Feeling of the public, as a rule, in favour of total closing, O'Shaughnessy 2336. 2341-2343. 2410-2412—Inoperativeness of the Bill unless supported by the moral opinion of the people themselves, ib. 2386, 2387.

Working Classes.

Publicans. Voluntary movement on the part of some publicans in Dublin, in regard to total closing, Wigham 40, 41—Difficulty in providing that publicans shall prevent excess of drinking on their premises; great advantage of some check in this respect, Ryan 326-329. 346-348—Closing of witness's houses in Dublin on Sunday; failure of an attempt by him to induce several other dealers to keep their places permanently closed on that day, Pillsworth 970-673—Feeling of many of the publicans in Belfast, and in the north, in favour of total closing, Lindsay 816. 869; Berkeley 1324.—Advantage in making the publican accountable for the sobriety of those frequenting his house; non-objection, in such case, to licenses being very freely given, or to the houses being open for longer periods than at present, Porter 1399-1408. 1425-1428. 1433-1435. 1439, 1440. 1477. 1482, 1483.

Application by the licensed vintners of Dublin in 1860, for an extension of the time of opening their houses, from nine to eleven, on Sunday evening, the houses of the spirit-grocers and beer-sellers having been open till the latter hour, Carey 1497. 1501, 1502. 1531—Desire of the licensed vintners to prevent excess in the sale of drink, so that there has been less drunkenness since the public have resorted more to their houses and less to their beershops and spirit-grocers' shops on Sunday night, ib. 1499. 1502—Anxiety of the publicans of Dublin to keep the trade respectable, and to prevent drunkenness further adverted to, ib. 1510. 1528. 1536-1540—Objection to the proposal that the publican should have larger authority, and be more fully accountable upon the question of selling drink in excess to any one, Carey 1607-1609; Carr 1693-1702.

R.

Railway Refreshment Rooms. Approval of the refreshment rooms at railway stations being still open on Sunday, as being intended for travellers, Miller 1807-1809.

Ralph, Michael John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Represents the Association of Spirit Grocers of Dublin, 575-579—Considers that if the licensing system were altered it would be very desirable to prohibit the sale of liquor in public-houses, in Dublin, on Sunday, 580-589. 635, 636—Opinion that the working classes would, generally, be opposed to interference with the public-houses, 590-592. 637, 638—Means of carrying out a provision that drink sold on Sunday should not be drunk in the public-houses.

593-596. 604. 628-633. 639-645—If the houses are to be kept open for a limited time, the best hours are from three to six, 597-604.

Limited inconvenience to be experienced through beer being wanted for supper, if the public-houses were closed in the evening; supper, in fact, is not a general meal in Ireland, 598-603. 611-614.—Suggestion that there be but one form of license for the sale of spirits and beer, whether by publicans or by grocers, and that the amount be assessed according to the valuation of the premises, 605-610. 615-634.—Considerable number of persons employed by the spirit-grocers in Dublin, and long hours for which they are engaged; great boon, in their case, if they had rest on Sunday, 646-662.

Refreshment Rooms. See Eating Houses.

Riots. Instance of the excellent effect of closing the public-houses as a check upon rioting, Lindsay 812.

Roman Catholic Clergy. Important declaration by the Roman Catholic clergy and hierarchy of Ireland, in favour of total closing on Sunday, Fitzgerald 2597. 2600. 2608.

See also Cashel Diocese. Fernes Diocese. Kilmore Diocese.

Ryan, Edmund Fitzgerald. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is resident magistrate at Wexford, his district being nearly coterminous with the diocese of Fernes, 281-283.—Operation of the system of voluntary closing of public-houses on Sunday, in the diocese of Fernes, through the influence of the Roman Catholic bishop, 284, 285.—Exceedingly beneficial effect of this system, the result being that in all Ireland there is no better ordered population than in the county of Wexford, 285 et seq.—Impossibility of carrying out voluntary closing on Sunday, in large towns and cities, 288.—Closing of the public-houses in Fernes diocese on holidays as well as Sundays, owing to the influence of the bishop, 288-291.

Satisfaction of the people with the system in question, the publicans also being well pleased with the arrangement, 292. 334. 356-358.—Doubt whether the mass of the people would, at first, be favourable to total closing on Sunday, 293.—Belief that if compulsory closing were made general by law, there would be but little evasion on the part of the people, 294.—Statement strongly in favour of total closing on Sunday, 295-319. 368, 369.—Illustration, in the case of Tullaghmore, of the importance of total closing being compulsory, 296-298.

Doubt as to any inconvenience to travellers on Sunday by reason of total closing, 299.—Steady decrease for some years in the class of migratory labourers, 299-301.—Opinion that if any open time be allowed, the best hours are from two to four, 302, 303.—Reasons for preferring that the drink should be consumed on the premises, if there are to be two hours of opening, 304. 319-322. 326-330.—Opinion in favour of limiting the number of licenses and of public-houses, 305.

Great difficulty in providing by Act of Parliament for the case of travellers on Sunday, as an exception to the rule, 306-308.—Opinion that the habits of the people of Ireland, with regard to drunkenness, have improved within the last thirty years, 309-312.—Abuse arising under the Beer Act of 1860, through the extension of the time of opening till eleven o'clock 311.—Explanation of the present practice in regard to the granting of licenses, 313-317.

Effect of total closing on Sunday that the people generally go without beer and spirits on that day, instead of being led on to drink merely through social habit, 318. 320. 331-333.—Probability of the proposed enactment creating some dissatisfaction on the ground of its being class legislation; witness would not sympathise with this complaint, 324, 325. 343-345.—Difficulty in providing that publicans shall prevent excess of drinking on their premises; great advantage of some check in this respect, 326-329. 346-348.—Opinion that the voluntary system would be impracticable in Limerick, and in large towns generally, 335-337. 353-355.

Limited operation of shebeen-houses in Wexford, whilst there are no dance-houses, 338-342.—Concurrence in the statement of a certain spirit dealer at Clonevin as to the immense benefits socially and morally, consequent on the closing of public-houses on Sunday in Wexford County, 349-352.—Objection to a provision that beer may be sold on Sunday; cover thereby for the sale of whisky, 359-363.

Less useful effect of compulsory closing in Wexford on Sunday than of the present voluntary system, which embraces holidays as well as Sundays, 371.—Statement showing that the public-houses throughout Ireland have been largely used as a means of obtaining Feenian recruits, 372.—Absence of Fenianism in Wexford, owing partly to the closing of public-houses on Sunday, 372-379.—Very religious and moral character of the people of Wexford, 378-380.

S.

Sabbath Observance. Excellent observance of the Lord's Day throughout the diocese of Cashel, since the voluntary closing of the public-houses, as compared with its former desecration, Rev. Dr. Leahy 409, 438-441, 477-479—Inconsistency in not closing public-houses as well as bakers' shops and butchers' shops, Lindsay 923—Nature of the claim of public-houses to be open on the Sabbath, whilst shops generally are closed, Carey 1561-1563, 1610-1615; Barry 1941-1943, 2009-2011.

Saturday (Hour of Closing). Numerous cases of drunkenness for trial in Cork on Monday morning, these arising, however, more from excess on Saturday evening than on Sunday, Lyons 709, 710—Suggestion that on Saturday evening the public-houses should be closed at nine, Lyons 732-735, 760, 761; J. C. O'Donnell 938, 974-976, 1027-1032; Berkeley 1329, 1330; O'Shaughnessy 2393-2397—Opinion in favour of the public-houses being closed from eight o'clock on Saturday evening till Monday morning, Lindsay 860-862—Greater evil arising from the late hour of closing on Saturday evening than on Sunday; very beneficial result if the hour for closing on Saturday were nine o'clock, Hamilton 1089-1092, 1104, 1112-1115, 1120-1123, 1133-1137, 1152.

Advantage if on Saturday evening the public-houses were closed at ten, H. O'Donnell 1214-1223, 1251, 1252—Question whether any advantage would be gained if the houses were closed earlier on Saturday, Porter 1466-1470—Objections to closing at an earlier hour than eleven on Saturday evening; inconvenience to the working classes on account of the late hour at which wages are paid, Carey 1597-1601; Barry 1864-1870, 1877-1882, 1890-1894, 1977, 1978—Objection to publicans and spirit-grocers being required to close earlier than half-past ten on Saturday night, as marketing is largely carried on up to that time, Corr 1662-1668, 1703, 1709.

Much more intoxication on Saturday evening than on Sunday, it being desirable to close the public-houses earlier on Saturday, say at seven o'clock, Miller 1744-1751, 1765-1775—Consideration as to the time of payment of wages on Saturday night, with reference to the question of the time of closing the public-houses and spirit-grocers' shops, ib. 1748-1751, 1786-1789, 1806.

Great hardship to the working classes if publicans and spirit-grocers were obliged to close early on Saturday, as the late payment of wages would interfere with purchases; approval, however, of ten o'clock as the hour for closing, Healy 2060-2079, 2084, 2106-2109, 2116-2121, 2142-2145—General feeling of the Dublin trades as to the immense inconvenience to be caused by closing earlier than the present hour on Saturday night; late payment of wages adverted to hereon, Keegan 2188, 2189.

Great mischief consequent upon the sale of drink late on Saturday evening, M^c Cabe 2223—Statement strongly in favour of public-houses, beer-shops and spirit-grocers' shops being closed on Saturday at nine o'clock; belief that but limited inconvenience would arise on account of the late payment of wages, ib. 2224-2239, 2290-2296—Feeling of a large number of the publicans and spirit-grocers in Limerick, in favour of earlier closing on Saturday, O'Shaughnessy 2397-2399—Impression that cases of drunkenness in Limerick are more numerous on Saturday than on Sunday, ib. 2418-2420.

Doubt lest the earlier closing of public-houses on Saturday night would produce more harm than good, O'Ferrall 2506-2508—Decided advantage of closing earlier on Saturday, Fitzgerald 2641-2643—The difficulty of earlier closing on Saturday, on the score of the late payment of wages would soon be obviated, ib. 2651, 2652.

Scotland. With regard to the unsatisfactory result of compulsory Sunday closing in Scotland, the same inference must not be drawn as regards Ireland, on account of the different character and habits of the two people, Rev. Dr. Leahy 424, 425.

Shebeen Houses. Impression that there are not so many shebeen-houses in witness's district as there used to be, De Gernon 237, 238—Limited operation of shebeen-houses in Wexford, whilst there are no dance-houses, Ryan 338-342—Much less drunkenness in shebeen-houses than in public-houses, ib. 342—Non-increase of shebeen-houses in in Cashel diocese since the voluntary closing of public-houses, Rev. Dr. Leahy 465, 466—Improbability of any increase of shebeen-houses if the Bill be passed, J. C. O'Donnell 1055-1059—Very few shebeen-houses in Cork, Hamilton 1154.

Examination as to the grounds for concluding that if the Bill be passed it will be much more difficult to put down shebeen-houses and illicit trading than it is at present, Barry 1985-2001, 2012-2022, 2028-2030; Healy 2054, 2055, 2078-2084, 2110-2112, 2132-2140—Increased difficulty of suppressing shebeen-houses if the public-houses were closed on Saturday at nine o'clock, Barry 2004-2008.

See also Illicit Traffic.

Sligo. Less inconvenience of total closing on Sunday in a place like Sligo than in Dublin, H. O'Donnell 1208-1213, 1224, 1225.

Soldiers. Practice of soldiers in Dublin to frequent the public-houses on Sunday more than on other days, Hamilton 1148-1151; H. O'Donnell 1296-1298.

Spirit Grocers. Injurious operation of the spirit-grocers' shops in Belfast, spirits being largely sold in them in the night time, and consumed on the premises, in evasion of the law, Lindsay 816, 817. 854. 879-884—Consideration of the measures desirable for preventing the abuse which now arises from the sale of whisky by spirit grocers; witness would suggest that every spirit-grocer's license should be withdrawn, ib. 854. 863-866—Contemplated closing of spirit-grocers' houses on Sunday as well as of public-houses, J. C. O'Donnell 1013-1015; Fitzgerald 2653-2658—Opinion of the Dublin grocers' assistants that if eating-houses and beerhouses are restricted in the same way as public-houses, total closing on Sunday may fairly be enforced, H. O'Donnell 1162-1165—Recommendation that spirit grocers should receive the same form of license as public-house keepers, Porter 1420, 1421. 1436-1438.

Constant evasion of the law as to drink sold by spirit grocers not being drunk on the premises; power also of the spirit grocers to keep open all day on Sunday by paying a small fine, Carey 1497-1500. 1503-1509. 1602-1606—The majority of the spirit grocers in Dublin violate the spirit of their license, Corr 1676. 1715—Necessity of all houses where intoxicating drinks are sold being subject to the proposed restrictions, Miller 1720 et seq.; McCabe 2321; O'Shaughnessy 2383, 2384—Contemplated closing of spirit-grocers' shops at the same hour on Saturday as public-houses, Healy 2118-2121.

Increased resort to spirit grocers and beersellers accordingly as the hours of opening of public-houses are restricted, O'Ferrall 2429-2436. 2461-2463. 2471-2473. 2501—Suggestions by the Dublin Police Commissioners for an amendment of the present system in regard to the sale of spirits by spirit grocers, ib. 2450.

Sullivan, James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a silk weaver by trade, and is foreman to Messrs. Pim of Dublin; is well acquainted with the feelings and customs of the operative classes in Dublin, 496-499—Considers that great good would result from the closing of public-houses in Dublin on Sunday, 501—Frequency of excessive drinking by the operative classes on Sunday on account of the temptation offered by the public-houses, and because of the social habits of the people, 501-506. 562—Belief that the people would soon be quite satisfied with compulsory regulations for closing public-houses on Sunday, though at first they might consider it was class legislation, 507. 536-538.

Opportunities of the working classes for providing themselves on Saturday with beer for their Sunday dinner, whilst it is not customary to have supper, so that in the latter respect there would be no difficulty if the public-houses were entirely closed, 508-511. 542-551. 556, 557—Increase of drinking among the working classes, 512, 513—Respects in which some inconvenience might be experienced through total closing on Sunday, 517-525—Opinion that if the public-houses are to be open for a time, the best hours would be from two to four, 526.

Importance, if the public-houses are to continue open for a few hours, of a requirement that the liquor must not be drunk on the premises; doubt as to this leading to club drinking in private houses, 527-533. 540. 558-566. 570-574—Objection to the sale of beer being allowed by Act, as whisky would be sold as well, 541—Long hours of the persons employed in the public-houses; advantage if these were released from Sunday work, 552-555. 567—Witness is, on the whole, strongly in favour of total closing on Sunday by Act of Parliament, 565, 566. 568, 569.

Sunday Closing. See the Headings generally throughout the Index.

Supper. Limited inconvenience to be experienced through beer being wanted for supper, if the public-houses were closed in the evening; supper, in fact, is not a customary meal in Ireland, Sullivan 511. 547-551. 556, 557; Ralph 598-603. 611-614; Pillsworth 683.

T.

Tea and Coffee Houses. Probable establishment of an increased number of tea and coffee houses if public-houses were closed throughout Sunday, Lindsay 902.

Temptation to Drink. Decrease of the facilities for drinking if the public-houses are closed; beneficial result in the case of that class of persons who drink merely for conviviality, Wigham 75-80. 108-110. 121-123; De Gernon 134, 135; Sullivan 501-506. 562; McCabe 2214, 2215—Desire of the people in the north to be protected from the temptation of open public-houses on Sunday, Berkeley 1324. 1334.

Statement that those who really wish for liquor will contrive to get it all the same even if the public-houses are closed; probability, however, of the removal of temptation being beneficial to some extent, Porter 1380-1382. 1402-1409. 1425—Admission as to

Total Closing. Data for the statement that previously to 1833 public-houses in Ireland were by law altogether closed on Sunday, Wigham 3. 19-23—Information with reference to the movement originated in Dublin in 1866, as having had in view exclusively the total closing of public-houses, ib. 24-34. 68-71. 86-88—Belief that it would be more conducive to the public good if the restriction were made complete on Sunday, instead of two or three hours being allowed for the purchase of beer and spirits not to be consumed on the premises, De Gernon 147. 216-219.

Evidence strongly in favour of the total closing of public-houses on Sunday; great benefit anticipated, Ryan 295. 319. 368, 369; Sullivan 501. 565-569; Lindsay 806-819. 860-862; Miller 1720 et seq.; Fitzgerald 2562-2565. 2584. 2607. 2634, 2635—Witness was at one time in favour of the houses being open for a few hours on Sunday, but has become a convert to total closing, on account of its excellent operation in Wexford Ryan 295—Effect of total closing on Sunday, that the people generally go without beer and spirits on that day instead of being led on to drink merely through social habit, ib. 318. 320. 331-333.

Decided objection to the provisions of the present Bill by which the public-houses are to be open for two or three hours on Sunday, Rev. Dr. Leahy 427-430. 450. 456-463. 482-485. 494, 495—Similar excesses consequent upon partial opening of public-houses on Sunday, as upon opening for the whole day, ib. 427-430—Respects in which some inconvenience might be experienced through total closing on Sunday, Sullivan 517-525—Very limited amount of inconvenience which might result in Belfast from total closing on Sunday; small per-centage of the population in whose case inconvenience might arise, Lindsay, 841-847. 856-859.

Admission that witness has not always been opposed to Sunday closing, nor always considered it impracticable, Carey 1553, 1554—Necessity of restrictions embracing all houses where intoxicating drinks are sold, Miller 1720 et seq.; M'Cabe 2321; O'Shaughnessy 2383, 2384—Witness considers the total closing of public-houses on Sunday would be extremely beneficial in Limerick and in the counties around, and would not cause much inconvenience, O'Shaughnessy 2326-2335. 2340. 2376-2398. 2410-2412.

Opinion that total closing on Sunday could not be carried out at the present time, O'Ferrall 2505—Necessity of the proposed restrictions being applied to all places where abuse is likely to arise from the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday, Fitzgerald 2580-2583. 2634-2637. 2653-2658—Any inconvenience or disadvantage would be far outweighed by the great advantages, ib. 2584. 2607.

Towns. Impossibility of carrying out voluntary closing on Sundays in large towns and cities, Ryan 288; Rev. Dr. Leahy 397-399. 434, 435; M'Cabe 2309, 2310—Opinion that the voluntary system would be impracticable in Limerick, and in large towns generally, ib. 335-337. 353-355—Absence of large towns in other dioceses, as well as Cashel, where there is voluntary closing on Sunday, Rev. Dr. Leahy 407, 408—Belief that in Cork and other large towns it would be impracticable to stop the sale of spirits, beer, &c., and that it would moreover be attended with considerable hardships, Lyons 716-718. 736-741. 765-770. 774—Expediency of the same regulation being applied in Limerick as in Cork, Hamilton 1087.

Resolution that in certain towns, as defined in the Bill, the hours of sale be from two till nine, Rep. vii—Adoption of resolution in regard to certain towns being permitted to adopt the limitation applicable to rural districts, ib.

Travellers. Doubt as to any serious inconvenience arising, in the case of migratory labourers, in the event of public-houses being entirely closed on Sunday, Wigham 101-106—Exception made in Cashel diocese in favour of persons who travel seven miles on Sunday, De Gernon 186, 187—Opinion in favour of total closing, provision being made to meet the case of travellers, ib. 216-219—Slight difficulty likely to arise in the case case of travellers on Sunday, through the public-houses being closed, De Gernon 246-248—Doubt as to the exception allowed in Cashel diocese in the case of travellers being largely made use of, ib. 259. 264-266.

Steady decrease for some years past in the class of migratory labourers in Ireland, Ryan 299-301—Great difficulty in providing by Act of Parliament for the case of travellers on Sunday as an exception to the rule, ib. 306-308—Definition of a traveller as a person who has gone seven Irish miles from home, Rev. Dr. Leahy 387, 388—Slight difficulty anticipated in the case of travellers, as an exception under a compulsory law, ib. 403, 404. 437.

Apprehended evasion of the law in the event of a provision that travellers may be supplied with liquor at public-houses or eating houses, Lindsay 903-905. 914-917. 920, 921. 924—Limited extent to which the closing of public-houses in Belfast on Sunday would be inconvenient as regards the travelling class; difficulty of any distinction in favour of this class, J. C. O'Donnell 954-956. 977-982—Little if any inconvenience in the case of travellers and excursionists under the hours of closing contemplated by witness, Hamilton 1107-1109. 1140-1147—Difficulty at Cork of carrying out a relaxation in favour of travellers, ib. 1119.

Absence of any sensible inconvenience to travellers and excursionists by closing the public-houses at five or six, H. O'Donnell 1203-1207. 1226-1228—Limited inconvenience in the case of travellers through Sunday closing, Berkeley 1325—Exception contemplated in the case of travellers; this could be carried out without difficulty, Miller 1729-1732.

Tullaghmore. Illustration, in the case of Tullaghmore, of the importance of total closing being compulsory, Ryan 296-298.

V.

Voluntary Closing. Considerable extent to which the voluntary closing of public-houses on Sunday is now carried out in different parts of Ireland, Wigham 111-120—Necessity of very harmonious co-operation between the clergy of different denominations before the system in force in Tipperary could be extended to the rest of Ireland, De Gernon 145. 146—Impossibility of efficiently carrying out an ecclesiastical or voluntary law in all the dioceses in Ireland; difficulty wherever there are large towns, Ryan 288. 335-337. 353-355; Rev. Dr. Leahy 397-399. 434, 435—Impracticability of carrying out in Dublin or Kingstown the system of voluntary closing adopted through the influence of the clergy in the archdioceses of Cashel and Wexford, McCabe 2309, 2310.

W.

Week Days. Suggestion that on week days public-houses should be closed at ten instead of eleven, H. O'Donnell 1257-1262.

Wexford County. Exceedingly beneficial effect of the voluntary system of closing public-houses in the diocese of Fernes, the result being that in all Ireland there is no better ordered population than in the county of Wexford, Ryan 285 et seq.—Since witness has been stationed in Wexford he has never seen a drunken man on Sunday, ib. 285. 331—Concurrence in the statement of a certain spirit dealer at Clonevin as to the immense benefits, socially and morally, consequent on the closing of public-houses on Sunday in Wexford county, ib. 352—Less useful effect of compulsory closing in Wexford on Sunday than of the present voluntary system, which embraces holidays as well as Sundays, ib. 371—Very religious and moral character of the people of Wexford, ib. 378-380.

Whisky, Price of. Effect of the increased price of whisky in diminishing the amount of drunkenness, Lyons 771-773.

Wigham, Henry. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is one of the honorary secretaries of the Irish Association for putting a stop to the sale of liquors on Sunday in Ireland, 1, 2—Closing of public-houses on Sunday in Ireland previously to Mr. Perrin's Act, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 68, under which Act the sale of liquors on Sunday was legalised from two o'clock to eleven o'clock, 3-6—Appointment in 1834 of a Committee to inquire into the operation of Perrin's Act, a further Act on the subject having been passed in 1836, which limited the hours of sale from two to nine o'clock, 7-12. 57-67—Re-extension of the time of sale from two to eleven o'clock, under the operation of the Wine Licenses Act of 1860, 13-18.

altogether closed on Sunday, 19-23—Influential movement set on foot in Dublin in 1866 in favour of total closing on Sunday; numerous signed petitions subsequently adopted, 24-34. 68-71—Very few petitions against the Bill for Sunday closing, 35, 36—Majority of Irish Members on the division in 1867 for going into Committee of the House on the Bill of that year, 37-39—Voluntary movement on the part of some publicans in Dublin in regard to total closing, 40, 41.

Statistics of the amount of drunkenness in Dublin since the year 1862; large proportion of cases which occur on Sunday, 42-49—Considerable diminution apparently in the number of cases since 1865; explanation on this point, 50-54—Further reference to the movement originated in Dublin in 1866 as having had in view exclusively the total closing of public-houses, 68-71. 86-88—Conclusion that if the Bill be passed there will be a great decrease of intemperance, and that the public morals and public safety will be largely benefited, 72-85.

Decrease of the facilities for drinking if the public-houses are closed; beneficial result in the case of that class of persons who drink merely for conviviality, 75-80. 108-110. 121-123—State of public opinion before the passing of Perrin's Act adverted to; increase of drunkenness after the passing of the Act, 89-93. 99, 100—Long period for which in the north of Ireland there has been a movement in favour of Sunday closing, 97, 98—Doubt as to any serious inconvenience arising in the case of migratory labourers in the event of public-houses being entirely closed on Sunday, 101-106.

Impracticability of providing that beer only should be sold, and not spirits, 107—Considerable extent to which the voluntary closing of public-houses on Sunday is now carried out in different parts of Ireland, 111-120—Question considered whether the same prohibition should not apply in the case of clubs as of public-houses; doubt as to habits of intoxication in the former case, 124-126.

Witnesses' Expenses. List of the expenses of witnesses in attendance before the Committee; total of 224*l.* 14*s.* 3*d.*; Rep. viii.

Women. General feeling of the women in favour of increased restriction, M'Cabe 2221. 2240—Unanimity of female opinion in favour of Sunday closing, Fitzgerald 2603-2606.

Working Classes. Opportunities of the working classes for providing themselves on Saturday with beer for their Sunday dinner, whilst it is not customary to have supper, so that in the latter respect there would be no difficulty if the public-houses were entirely closed, Sullivan 508-511. 542-551. 556, 557—Increase of drinking among the working classes, ib. 512, 513—Opinion that the working classes would generally be opposed to interference with public-houses, Ralph 590-592. 637, 638—Practice of the working classes not to have supper as a meal, Ralph 598-603. 611-614; Pillsworth 683—Great boon to the labouring classes if Sunday closing be enforced, Lindsay 922.

Opinion that the total closing of public-houses on Sunday would lead to much inconvenience, and would be justly objected to by the working classes, Hamilton 1067-1071. 1112. 1153—As a rule, the working classes do not have beer with their meals, the drinking going on chiefly in the public-houses, ib. 1079-1085—Large number of operatives in Dublin to whom total closing on Sunday would cause much inconvenience and discontent, Carey 1511. 1525-1527—Dissent from the view that further restrictions would be any benefit to the working classes in a moral sense, or would diminish drunkenness, ib. 1625-1632.

Strong objection by the working classes to being compelled to drink at their homes; question considered as to the data for such objection, Keegan 2159, 2160. 2168-2177—Grounds for concluding that the working classes of Dublin are not, as a rule, drunkards, ib. 2161, 2162.

Belief that a reasonable hour being allowed for refreshment, the working classes would, as a rule, willingly submit to increased restriction on Sunday, M'Cabe 2221, 2222. 2240.
